1666. The case of Nathaniel Rounsavell, a recalcitrant witness, in 1812.

A witness having declined to answer a pertinent question before a select committee, he was arraigned before the House, and, persisting in contumacy, was committed.

In 1812 the opinion of the House seems to have been against permitting counsel to a contumacious witness arraigned at the bar of the House (footnote).

On April 6, 1812,[2] after the closing of the doors and a secret session, the doors were opened and the following preamble and resolution were agreed to:

Whereas on the 3d day of April, 1812, a committee was appointed to inquire whether there has been any, and, if any, what, violation of the secrecy imposed by this House during the present session as to certain of its proceedings, etc.; and it appearing to this House, by a report made by said committee, that, in pursuance of the powers vested in them, they had called before them Nathaniel Rounsavell for the purpose of obtaining his testimony relative to the subject of the inquiry, and that he has refused to answer on oath certain interrogatories pertinent to the subject about which the committee were empowered to inquire· Therefore,

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to bring the said Nathaniel Rounsavell immediately to the bar of this House, to answer such interrogatories as may be propounded to him by the Speaker, under the direction of the House.

[1] Two important cases, that of Hallet Kilbourn in the House (see sections 1608–1611 of Volume II) and Elverton R. Chapman in the Senate (see sections 1612–1614 of Volume II), might also be included in this chapter, but are classified rather with reference to the prerogatives of the House.

Then the House resolved that certain questions be put, the first being "From the conversation of what Member did you collect the information of which you spoke in your deposition before the committee, given on the 4th instant?"

Rounsavell then appeared at the bar of the House, in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and the Speaker administered him an oath of truthfulness.

Then Rounsavell refused to answer, and it was resolved that he be committed to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms until further order of the House. An attempt to interdict his communication with anyone except the Sergeant-at-Arms during confinement failed, 62 to 22.

April 7 the Speaker laid before the House a letter from Rounsavell in which the latter declared that he had no intention of treating the House with disrespect or indecorum, or of violating any of its privileges, or of appearing contumacious in the publication of any of its secret proceedings, etc.

Then it was voted that he should be brought to the bar and questioned. This was done and he professed his readiness to reply. But then a resolution was adopted purging him of contempt, and declaring that, by reason of the explanation of a Member, it was not necessary to inquire further. The Speaker then directed the Sergeant-at-Arms to discharge him.[1]

1667. In 1837, for refusing to obey the subpœna of a committee, Reuben M. Whitney was arrested and tried at the bar of the House.

Discussion of the right of the House to punish for contempt, with reference to English precedents.

In the resolution ordering the arrest and arraignment of Whitney the House at the same time gave him permission to have counsel.

The House ordered that Whitney, under arrest for contempt, should be furnished with a copy of the report as to his alleged contempt before arraignment.

On January 17, 1837,[2] the House agreed to this resolution:

Resolved, That so much of the President's message as relates to the "conduct of the various Executive Departments, the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted, the vigilant and faithful discharge of the public business in all of them, and the causes of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which they have fulfilled the objects of their creation," be referred to a select committee, to consist of nine members, with power to send for persons and papers, and with instructions to inquire into the condition of the various Executive Departments, the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted, into the manner in which the public business has been discharged in all of them, and into all causes of complaint from any quarter at the manner in which said departments, or their bureaus or offices, or any of their officers or agents of every description whatever, directly or indirectly connected with them in any manner, officially or unofficially, in duties pertaining to the public interest, have fulfilled or failed to accomplish the objects of their creation, or have violated their duties, or have injured and impaired the public service and interest; and that said committee, in its inquiries, may refer to such periods of time as to them may seem expedient and proper.

[1] The Annals show that Rounsavell was an editor of the Alexandria Herald, who gave the information to be published in the Georgetown paper called the Spirit of Seventy-six. The information concerned proceedings on the embargo, which went on behind closed doors, and which was published before the injunction of secrecy was removed. The debate on the case of Rounsavell occupied two days in the House. There was doubt of the power of the House to compel the witness to answer, one Member saying that parliamentary history furnished them but one precedent, that of Wilkes. On the other hand, it was urged that as the House had the power to inquire it must have the power to make that inquiry effectual. The question of allowing the prisoner counsel came up, but it was replied that he was a witness, not a prisoner.

The following were appointed as the committee: Messrs. Henry A. Wise,[1] of Virginia; Dutee J. Pearce, of Rhode Island; Henry A. Muhlenberg, of Pennsylvania; Robert B. Campbell, of South Carolina; Edward A. Hannegan, of Indiana; Gorham Parks, of Maine; Levi Lincoln, of Massachusetts; Abijah Mann, jr., of New York, and John Chaney, of Ohio.

On February 9,[2] Mr. Wise made a report, in pursuance of the following proceeding of the select committee, which he handed in at the Clerk's table:

Reuben M. Whitney, who has been summoned as a witness before this committee, having, by letter,[3] informed the committee of his peremptory refusal to attend, it becomes the duty of the committee to make the House acquainted with the fact: Therefore,

Resolved, That the chairman be directed to report the letter of Reuben M. Whitney to the House, that such order may be taken as the dignity and character of the House require.

On the succeeding day this report was discussed and various propositions were made—to arrest Whitney for contempt, to summon him to appear and show cause why an attachment should not issue against him for contempt, and to cause the committee to report to the House certain circumstances occurring in the committee room during an examination of Whitney on a preceding day. The letter of Whitney was apparently read to the House, but does not appear in the Journal. There was a question as to the right of the House to punish for contempt in such a case, and elaborate arguments were made to show that the precedents of the English parliament could not be followed so far by a house of powers limited by a written constitution.

Finally, the House, by a vote of 99 yeas to 86 nays, agreed to the following:

Resolved, That whereas the select committee of this House, acting by authority of the House under a resolution of the 17th of January last, has reported that Reuben M. Whitney has peremptorily refused to give evidence in obedience to a summons duly issued by said committee, and has addressed to the committee the letter reported by said committee to the House: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Speaker of this House issue his warrant, directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms, to take into custody the person of Reuben M. Whitney, that he may be brought to the bar of the House to answer for an alleged contempt of this House; and that he be allowed counsel on that occasion should he desire it.

In the Whitney case the validity of the subpœna, signed only by the chairman of a committee, was challenged, but sustained.

The respondent retired while the House deliberated on the mode of procedure in a case of contempt.

A person on trial at the bar of the House for contempt was given permission to examine witnesses.

[1] Mr. Wise belonged to the minority party, and was made chairman according to the old usage, because he moved the resolution.

[2] Journal, pp. 367-372; Debates, pp. 1685-1707.

[3] For this letter see House Report No. 194, Second session Twenty-fourth Congress, journal of the committee, p. 83. Mr. Whitney declares that he had been insulted and menaced, and declined to appear until his wrongs should be redressed and his safety assured.

In a trial at the bar of the House both questions to witnesses and their answers were reduced to writing and appear in the Journal.

In a trial at the bar of the House for contempt a committee was appointed to examine witnesses for the House.

Rule adopted in the Whitney case for disposing of objections to questions proposed to witnesses.

When a case is on trial at the bar of the House, Members are examined in their places.

In the Whitney case a proposition to examine the respondent was ruled out of order while witnesses were being examined.

On February 11[1] the Speaker announced to the House that the Sergeant-at-Arms had made return of the service of the warrant against Reuben M. Whitney, and that the said Whitney was in custody.

This announcement was made during proceedings on another matter, at the conclusion of which Mr. John Calhoon, of Kentucky, offered this resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That Reuben M. Whitney, now in custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, be brought to the bar of this House to answer for an alleged contempt of the House in peremptorily refusing to appear and give evidence as a witness, on a summons duly issued by a select committee acting by the authority of this House, under a resolution of the 17th of January last, and in the matter of a letter, expressing said refusal, addressed by the said Reuben M. Whitney to the committee, and by the committee referred to the House; and that he be forthwith furnished with a copy of the report of said committee, and of the letter aforesaid.

On the succeeding day the Speaker announced to the House that Reuben M. Whitney was in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, without the bar, awaiting the further order of the House in the premises; and that he had been furnished by the Clerk with the copies of papers, as directed by the order of the 11th instant.

Whereupon, on motion of Mr. John M. Patton, of Virginia, it was Ordered, That Reuben M. Whitney be brought to the bar of the House.

Reuben M. Whitney was then brought to the bar of the House by the Sergeant-at-Arms, when the Speaker addressed him as follows:

Reuben M. Whitney: You have been brought before this House, by its order, to answer the charge of an alleged contempt of this House, in having peremptorily refused to give evidence in obedience to a summons duly issued by a committee of this House; which committee had, by an order of the House, power to send for persons and papers.

Before you are called upon to answer, in any manner, to the subject-matter of this charge, it is my duty, as the presiding officer of this House, to inform you that, by an order of the House, you will be allowed counsel should you desire it. If you have any request to make in relation to this subject, your request will now be received and considered by the House. If, however, you are now ready to proceed in the investigation of the charge, you will state it; and the House will take order accordingly.

To which the said Reuben M. Whitney answered as follows:

The undersigned answers that his refusal to attend the committee, upon the summons of its chairman, was not intended, or believed by him, to be disrespectful to the honorable the House of Representatives; nor does he now believe that he thereby committed a contempt of the House.

His reasons for refusing to attend the committee are truly stated in his letter to that committee.

He did not consider himself bound to obey a summons issued by the chairman of the committee.

He had attended, in obedience to such a summons, before another committee, voluntarily and without objection to the validity of the process; and would have attended in the same way before the present committee but for the belief that he might thereby be exposed to insult and violence.

He denies, therefore, that he has committed a contempt of the House; because,

First. The process upon him was illegal, and he was not bound to obey it; and,

Secondly. Because he could not attend without exposing himself thereby to outrage and violence.

If the House shall decide in favor of the authority of the process, and that the respondent is bound to obey it, then he respectfully asks, in such case, that, in consideration of the peculiar circumstances in which he is placed, as known to the House, the committee may be instructed to receive testimony upon interrogatories to be answered, on oath, before a magistrate, as has been done in other instances in relation to other witnesses; or that the committee be instructed to prohibit the use or introduction of secret and deadly weapons in the committee room during the examination of the witnesses.

And, in case he shall think it necessary, he prays to be heard by counsel, and to be allowed to offer testimony on the matter herein submitted.

R. M. WHITNEY.

The House was proceeding to consider the method of procedure when Mr. John M. Patton, of Virginia, made the point of order that the respondent ought to retire during the deliberations.

The Speaker[1] said that such had been the uniform course in former cases, and, believing it to be the sense of the House, he would direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to take Reuben M. Whitney from the bar, which was done.

Propositions were then made for the appointment of a committee of privileges to report a mode of procedure, and also that the respondent be discharged. Finally, under the operation of the previous question, the House agreed to the following resolution proposed by Mr. Samuel J. Gholson, of Mississippi:

Resolved, That Reuben M. Whitney be now permitted to examine witnesses before this House in relation to his alleged contempt, and that a committee of five be appointed to examine such witnesses on the part of this House; that the questions put shall be reduced to writing before the same are proposed to the witness, and the answers shall also be reduced to writing. Every question put by a Member, not of the committee, shall be reduced to writing by such Member, and be propounded to the witness by the Speaker, if not objected to; but, if any question shall be objected to, or any testimony offered shall be objected to by any Member, the Member so objecting, and the accused or his counsel, shall be heard thereon; after which the question shall be decided without further debate. If parol evidence is offered, the witness shall be sworn by the Speaker and be examined at the bar, unless they are Members of the House, in which case they may be examined in their places

The following committee was then appointed: Messrs. Gholson, of Mississippi; Levi Lincoln, of Massachusetts; Francis Thomas, of Maryland; Benjamin Hardin, of Kentucky, and George W. Owens, of Georgia.

Reuben M. Whitney was then again placed at the bar and the resolution adopted by the House was read to him; and, being asked by the Speaker if he was ready to proceed in the trial of the case, he answered:

I am not ready to proceed at this time, and ask to be indulged until Wednesday next to make preparation. I herewith hand in a list of names of sundry persons, and respectfully request that they be summoned to attend as witnesses in the trial of the case.

This list, which appears in the Journal, contains the names of four Members of the House and two citizens.

[1] James K. Polk, of Tennessee, Speaker.

It was then

Ordered, That further proceedings in this trial be postponed until Wednesday next; and that Reuben M. Whitney be furnished with a copy of the resolution adopted by the House this day.

It was also Ordered, That subpœnas issue for the witnesses named by Reuben M. Whitney, with directions to attend on Wednesday, the 15th of February instant.

On February 15, 1837,[1] the Sergeant-at-Arms was directed to place Reuben M. Whitney at the bar of the House; whereupon Reuben M. Whitney was placed at the bar of the House, accompanied by Walter Jones and Francis S. Key, as his counsel.

The Speaker addressed him as follows:

Reuben M. Whitney: You stand charged before this House with an alleged contempt of the House, in having peremptorily refused to give evidence in obedience to a summons duly issued by a committee of this House, which committee had, by an order of the House, power to send for persons and papers.

You will say whether you are now ready to proceed to trial, in the mode prescribed by the order of the House, of which you have been informed, or whether you have any request to make of the House before you are put upon your trial; if you have, it will now be received and considered by the House.

To which the said Reuben M. Whitney answered as follows: "I am ready to proceed to trial."

A motion was then made by Mr. George N. Briggs, of Massachusetts, in the words following:

Whereas, by the Eleventh rule of this House, all acts, addresses, and joint resolutions shall be signed by the Speaker; and all writs, warrants, and subpœnas, issued by order of the House, shall be under his hand and seal, attested by the Clerk;[2]

And whereas, the subpœna by virtue of which Reuben M. Whitney, now in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House, by order of the House, for an alleged contempt, for refusing to appear and give testimony before one of the select committees of the House, was not under the hand and seal of the Speaker, attested by the Clerk, but signed by the chairman of the said select committee; therefore,

Resolved, That the refusal of Reuben M. Whitney to appear before said committee was not a contempt of this House

Resolved, That said Whitney be forthwith discharged from the custody of this House.

In the course of debate on this resolution Mr. Abijah Mann, jr., of New York, said that this question had been raised in several other cases, notably in the committee sent to Philadelphia to investigate the affairs of the Bank of the United States. In the latter case the committee were called upon to issue the highest process in its power; and the question was then raised and mooted, with a former Speaker or with the present, he was not certain which, whether the process issued by that committee, under the powers given them to send for persons and papers, should be signed by the Speaker of the House and attested by the Clerk. The committee decided, and in that decision, if he was not mistaken, the incumbent of the chair coincided, that the summons the committee were authorized to issue, by the power to send for persons and papers, need only be signed by the chairman of that committee. When the House issued an order or warrant in a particular case, under this rule, the Speaker must issue the summons under his hand and seal, and it must be attested by the Clerk; but when the power was granted to a committee to send for persons and papers in a particular case, a summons signed by the chairman of the committee was sufficient.

The motion of Mr. Briggs was ordered to lie on the table by a vote of 157 yeas to 33 nays.

The House having voted to proceed, those witnesses who were Members of the House were called and sworn. Mr. John Fairfield, of Maine, was first examined. To the first question, addressed by the accused to the witness, Mr. John Calhoon, of Kentucky, objected, and was heard in support of his objection. The counsel of the accused was also heard in support of the interrogatory.

The Speaker was about to put the question, "Shall the interrogatory be propounded to the witness?" when Mr. John Bell, of Tennessee, asked the sense of the House to be taken whether, under the order of the House, the Member objecting to a question has not the right to reply to the counsel of the accused.

And the question being put to the House, "Shall a Member who objects to a question have the right to reply to the counsel of the accused?"

And it passed in the negative—yeas 94, nays 103.

Then the question was put, "Shall the interrogatory be put to the witness?" and it passed in the affirmative—yeas 131, nays 52.

While the witness was framing his answer Mr. John Chambers, of Kentucky, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the further examination of witnesses in the case of Reuben M. Whitney be suspended until he be examined on oath, touching the contempt of this House alleged against him; and that the committee appointed to examine witnesses in his case proceed to examine him accordingly.

The Speaker decided that, at this stage of the proceeding, the resolution was not in order.

Mr. Chambers having appealed, the appeal was laid on the table—yeas 104, nays, 66.

Mr. Fairfield then answered, and was questioned by the committee and by various Members.

Then, on motion of Mr. Thomas, it was Ordered, That further proceedings in the case of R. M. Whitney be postponed until 12 o'clock to-morrow; and that the Clerk of the House furnish to the three other witnesses, Members of this House, who are sworn, copies of all the questions that have been propounded to the witness just examined, that they may be prepared to answer them in writing to-morrow.

The examination of witnesses was continued until February 20,[1] the record of questions and answers appearing in the Journal. From the examination it appeared that there had been personal difficulty between the respondent and Messrs. Peyton and Wise of the investigating committee, and that there had occurred in the committee room a difference which had seemed likely at one time to result in the use of weapons. The idea that the witness had been deterred by fear from responding to the subpœna of the committee was broached. Finally Mr. Amos Lane, of Indiana, offered this resolution:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to prosecute further the inquiry into the alleged contempt of R. M. Whitney against the authority of this House; and that the said Whitney be now discharged from custody.

This resolution was agreed to, yeas 99, nays 72.

And the said Reuben M. Whitney was discharged accordingly.

1669. James W. Simonton, a witness before a House committee, was arrested and arraigned at the bar for declining to answer a material question.

In the absence of the Sergeant-at-Arms his deputy, by special resolution of the House, was empowered to serve a warrant.

Form of arraignment of a recalcitrant witness at the bar of the House.

A witness arraigned at the bar of the House for contempt was permitted to answer orally.

A recalcitrant witness, having remained obdurate when arraigned at the bar, was committed to custody.

Form of resolution authorizing investigation of published statements that Members had entered into corrupt combinations in relation to legislation.

Instance wherein a newspaper correspondent was expelled from the House for an offense connected with pending legislation.

On January 9, 1857,[1] the House agreed to the following:

Whereas certain statements have been published charging that Members of this House have entered into corrupt combinations for the purpose of passing and of preventing the passage of certain measures now pending before Congress; and whereas a Member of this House has stated that the article referred to "is not wanting in truth:" Therefore,

Resolved, That a committee, consisting of five Members, be appointed by the Speaker, with power to send for persons and papers, to investigate said charges; and that said committee report the evidence taken, and what action, in their judgment, is necessary on the part of the House, without any unnecessary delay.

On January 21,[2] Mr. James L. Orr, of South Carolina, from this committee, made the following report:

That during the progress of their investigation they have summoned as a witness J. W. Simonton, the correspondent of the New York Times; that among others, the following question was propounded to him: "You state that certain Members have approached you, and have desired to know if they could not, through you, procure money for their votes on certain bills, will you state who these Members were?"

And the said Simonton made thereto the following response: "I can not, without a violation of confidence, than which I would rather suffer anything."

In response to other questions of similar import, he said: "Two have made them direct; others have indicated to me a desire to talk with me upon these subjects, and I have warded it off, not giving them an opportunity to make an explicit proposition."

To the question, "What do I understand you to mean when you say these communications were made direct?"

Simonton replied, "I mean that, after having obtained my promise of secrecy in regard to them, they have said to me that certain measures pending before Congress ought to pay; that parties interested in them had the means to pay; that they individually needed money, and desired me specifically to arrange the matter in such way that if the measures passed they should receive pecuniary compensation."

The committee were impressed with the materiality of the testimony withheld by the witness, as it embraced the letter and spirit of the inquiry directed by the House to be made, but were anxious to avoid any controversy with the witness. They consequently waived the interrogatory that day to give the witness time for reflection on the consequences of his refusal, and to give him an opportunity to look into the law and practice of the House in such cases, notifying him that he would, on some subsequent day, be recalled. This was the 15th of January instant. On Tuesday, the 20th instant, the said J. W. Simonton was recalled, and the identical question first referred to was again propounded, after due notice to him that if he declined the committee would feel constrained to report his declination to the House and ask that body to enforce all its powers in the premises to compel a full and complete response. To that interrogatory he made the following reply, and we give it in full, that no injustice may be done to Simonton in this report. He said:

"Before stating the determination to which I have come on this subject I desire to say that I do not here dispute the power of the committee and I have not heretofore declined to answer the question upon any such ground. I have all respect for the committee and the House. I do not decline in order to screen the Members; my declination was based upon my convictions of duty. Since I was last before the committee, in deference to their judgment and wishes I have examined the case of Anderson v. Dunn, to which they referred me, and have considered very fully what I ought to do, in view of that decision as well as in view of other considerations. The result of my deliberations upon the subject has been to confirm me in the opinion that, whatever penalty I may suffer, I can not answer that question. I beg the committee to understand that I have no other motive whatever in declining but the simple one that I have stated before—that I do not see how I can answer it without a dishonorable breach of confidence The answer to the question can by no possibility be supposed to reflect discredit upon myself, and I presume that my statement of that motive is corroborated by the facts as they appear before the committee. I must insist upon declining to answer that question."

The House will preceive that the foregoing statement shows the materiality of the testimony, and the duty of the committee to insist upon its disclosure. It shows the settled and deliberate purpose of the witness to withhold such testimony rightfully and properly demanded, and the absolute necessity for the House to interpose, with promptitude and firmness, its authority, if it intended to expose and punish corruption which may exist among its Members by ordering the investigation your committee have been pursuing, etc.

The committee consider it unnecessary to enter into an elaborate argument to establish the power of the House in this case. The summons issued under the hand of the Speaker, and was tested by the Clerk of the House; and the contumacy of the witness is a contempt of that authority. If there is doubt whether this authorizes the arrest of the party in contempt, and his confinement until the contempt is purged, besides the right to inflict other punishment afterwards, it seems to your committee that none will question the authority of the House when they recur to the statute book. By an act passed May 3, 1798 (1 U. S. Statutes, 554), authority is given to the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, a Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, or a chairman of a select committee of either House, to administer oaths to witnesses in any case under their examination, and willful, absolute, and false swearing before either is declared perjury and is punishable as such. Here is express authority to swear witnesses; and false swearing is punishable as perjury. Is it, then, no contempt of the authority of this House (and the committee are acting as and for the House in this investigation) for a witness to refuse to testify to material facts within his knowledge?

The committee concur unanimously in the opinion that the House is clothed with ample power to order the party into custody, there to remain until released by the same authority or upon the expiration of the present Congress. The committee recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Speaker issue his warrant, directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms, commanding him (the said Sergeant-at-Arms) to take into custody the body of the said James W. Simonton, wherever to be found, and the same forthwith to have before the said House," at the bar thereof, to answer as for a contempt of the authority of this House--accompanied by a bill (H. R. 757) more effectually to enforce the attendance of witnesses on the summons of either House of Congress and to compel them to discover testimony [1]

The resolution ordering the arrest of Simonton was agreed to, yeas 164, nays 16.

A warrant pursuant to the said resolution was accordingly prepared, signed by the Speaker, under the seal of the House, attested by the clerk, and delivered to William G. Flood, clerk of the Sergeant-at-Arms, the latter being absent.

Subsequently, on motion of Mr. Orr, the House agreed to the following:

Resolved, That in the absence of A. J. Glosbrenner, Sergeant-at-Arms, on the business of the House, it is ordered that William G. Flood, clerk of the Sergeant-at-Arms, be authorized and directed to execute the orders of the House, directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms, during the absence of the said Sergeant-at-Arms.

Soon after William G. Flood appeared at the bar of the House and reported that he had executed the warrant of the Speaker, and that he had the body of J. W. Simonton at the bar of the House.

Thereupon a question arose as to the proper mode of procedure. Mr. Henry Winter Davis, of Maryland, proposed this resolution:

Resolved, That the Speaker do read to the person in custody the proceedings of the House touching the alleged contempt of the prisoner, and do call on him to show cause why he should not be committed for his refusal to answer the questions propounded to him by the select committee, and that he have leave to be heard now, or to-morrow at 1 o'clock, and that he have the aid of counsel if he desires it, and that in the mean time he remain in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

This resolution was criticised on the ground that it opened again the question of the witness's contempt, which was ascertained and was the justification of the arrest. Finally the House agreed to the following substitute resolution, presented by Mr. Robert P. Trippe, of Georgia, and, modified in accordance with suggestions from Mr. Orr:

Resolved, That the Speaker do forthwith inform J. W. Simonton of the charge upon which he has been arrested, and propound to him the question: Are you ready to show cause why you should not be further proceeded against for the said alleged contempt, and do you desire to be heard in person or by counsel, now or at what time?

The said J. W. Simonton was thereupon arraigned, when the Speaker addressed him as follows:

James W. Simonton: You have been arrested by the order of the House, and now stand at its bar charged with an alleged contempt of its authority in refusing to answer questions propounded to you by the select committee appointed to make investigations in relation to certain charges made against the honor and character of the House. The report of the committee, upon which the arrest has been made, will be read to you.

The said report having been read, the Speaker resumed:

The resolution which has been read to you has been adopted by the House, and in virtue thereof you have been arrested and now stand at the bar charged with the offense named. In obedience to the instructions of the House, I now put to you the following interrogatories: "Are you ready to show cause why you should not be further proceeded against for the said alleged contempt, and do you desire to be heard in person or by counsel, now or at what time?"

In response to the address of the Speaker, the witness at the bar signified his desire to answer orally. The Speaker thereupon propounded the question: Shall he have leave to answer orally?

Thereupon a discussion arose, Mr. Hunphrey Marshall, of Kentucky, insisting that the witness should purge himself of contempt in writing and under oath; but the House decided the question in the affirmative.

Mr. Simonton thereupon addressed the House at some length, concluding with the request that he might be heard further hereafter by counsel.

The House then considered the disposition of the respondent, several propositions being made—to confine him in the common jail, to expel him from his reporters' seat on the floor, etc.; but finally the following was agreed to, yeas 136, nays 23:

J. W. Simonton having appeared at the bar of the House, according to its order, and the cause assigned for the said contempt being insufficient: Therefore,

Resolved, That the said J. W. Simonton be continued in close custody by the Sergeant-at-Arms, or, in his absence, by Mr. William G. Flood, during the balance of this session, or until discharged by the further order of the House, to be taken when he shall have purged the contempt upon which he was arrested, by testifying before said committee.

On February 2[1] Mr. Kelsey, claiming the floor on a question of privilege, offered this resolution, which was agreed to without debate:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House be, and he is hereby, instructed to bring James W. Simonton, now in his custody by order of the House, before the select committee appointed on the 9th ultimo, to answer, on the summons of the Speaker, such questions as may be propounded to him touching the subject-matter of said investigation by said committee.

On February 9[2] Mr. Kelsey, from the select committee, reported that J. W. Simonton had again been summoned before the committee, and his answers to the questions propounded to him were such as to render unnecessary any further examination. Under these circumstances they did not desire that he be detained longer in custody, and therefore recommended the adoption of the following:

Resolved, That James W. Simonton, now in custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House, be discharged.

This resolution was agreed to.

On February 28, on report of the committee, Simonton was expelled from his seat as a reporter on the floor.

1670. In 1857 the House arrested and arraigned at its bar Joseph L. Chester, a contumacious witness.

A contumacious witness arraigned at the bar of the House was required to answer in writing and under oath.

A contumacious witness having given a respectful and sufficient answer at the bar of the House was ordered to be discharged.

On January 16, 1857,[3] Mr. William H. Kelsey, of New York, as a question of privilege, from the Select Committee on Certain Alleged Corrupt Combinations,[4] reported the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas Joseph L. Chester has been duly summoned to appear and testify before a committee of this House, appointed, in pursuance of a resolution passed on the 9th instant, to investigate certain charges of corrupt combinations of Members of this House for the purpose of passing and of preventing the passage of certain measures during the present Congress, and whereas the said Joseph L. Chester has neglected to appear before said committee pursuant to said summons; therefore,

[4] See preceding section for authorization of this committee.

Resolved, That the Speaker issue his warrant, directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms, commanding him, the said Sergeant-at-Arms, to take into custody the body of the said Joseph L. Chester, wherever to be found, and the same forthwith to have before the said House, at the bar thereof, to answer as for a contempt of the authority of this House.

It being objected that the House had no power to arrest the man, it was replied by Mr. James L. Orr, of South Carolina, that the language of the resolution was exactly that used for the arrest of the man who offered a bribe to Mr. Lewis Williams in 1818,[1] a case in which the Supreme Court had sustained the right of the House.

The resolution was then agreed to and a warrant was issued accordingly.

On January 24[2] the Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House and reported that, in pursuance of the warrant of the Speaker of the 16th instant, he had arrested Joseph L. Chester, and had him then at the bar of the House.

Mr. Kelsey submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to under the operation of the previous question:

Resolved, That the Speaker propound to Joseph L. Chester the following questions, viz:

What excuse have you for not appearing before the select committee of this House pursuant to the summons served on you on the 14th instant?

Are you ready to appear before said committee and answer to such proper questions as shall be put to you by said committee?

Mr. John Letcher, of Virginia, moved that the respondent be required to answer in writing and under oath. After debate as to the practice in analogous cases in the States, the motion was agreed to. The said Chester was conducted from the bar by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

On January 26 the Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar and announced that Joseph L. Chester, heretofore arrested under the warrant of the Speaker, was now ready to answer the questions which the House had directed should be propounded to him.

The said Chester was arraigned thereupon and the following questions put to him by the Speaker:

Thereupon the said Chester handed to the Clerk, as his answer to the said interrogatories, a paper which was read, and appears in the journal of the House. This answer appears with the fact that it was sworn to and subscribed, duly certified by a justice of the peace. It is as follows:

To the Honorable Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States:

To the first interrogatory propounded to me under the resolution of the House of the 24th instant, I respectfully answer that in departing from this city the day after having been subpœnaed to appear before the committee, I neither entertained nor intended any disrespect whatever to the committee or to the House; but having made arrangements before the service of the subpœna to leave for my home in Philadelphia on private business of emergency, after having been absent for a period of six weeks, I could not, without great detriment to my own affairs postpone my visit. I had every reason to believe that the committee would yet be in session some days, and, not having read the subpœna carefully, nor observed the clause requiring me not to depart without leave; and presuming that my appearance before the committee on Monday morning at farthest would be in sufficient time for their purpose, I left, announcing to Russell Frisbie, jr., with whom I board, my intention to return the next night, if possible, so as to be before the committee even on Saturday. Indeed, I did not imagine, under the exigencies of my own private affairs, that it was absolutely necessary that I should appear before the committee on the exact day; and, had not the recent storm intervened, I should have been of my own accord before the committee on Wednesday last, without the services of the Sergeant-at-Arms. That officer I am sure will bear me witness that I evinced no disposition, either by habeas corpus or otherwise, to evade the arrest or a return to Washington. So occupied was I with my business at home that I did not even read or hear of the proceedings of the House in my case until late on Saturday, the 17th, when I went quietly to my home and there remained with my family awaiting the arrival of your officer. From all which I trust that your honorable body will attribute to me no disrespect nor disposition to avoid its mandate.

To the second interrogatory, I answer that I am entirely ready and willing so to appear and answer.

JOSEPH L. CHESTER.

And then it was Ordered, That inasmuch as the answers of Joseph L. Chester are respectful and sufficient he be discharged from custody.

1671. In 1858 the House imprisoned John W. Wolcott for contempt in refusing as a witness to answer a question which he contended was inquisitorial, but which the House held to be pertinent.

A committee, in reporting the contumacy of a witness, included a transcript of the testimony, so as to show in what the contempt consisted.

A witness contumacious before a committee is not given a second opportunity in the committee before the House orders his arrest for contempt.

Form of warrant and return in case of arrest of a witness for contumacy.

Form of arraignment adopted in the Wolcott case.

In the Wolcott case the respondent, when arraigned, presented two answers, each in writing, sworn and subscribed, one of which appears in the Journal, while the other does not.

In the Wolcott case the House provided that the resolution ordering him to be taken into custody should be a sufficient warrant.

On January 15, 1858,[1] the House had agreed to the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of five Members be appointed to investigate the charges preferred against the Members and officers of the last Congress growing out of the disbursements of any sum of money by Lawrence, Stone & Co., of Boston, or other persons, and report the facts and evidence to the House, with such recommendations as they may deem proper, with authority to send for persons and papers.

The committee was, on January 18, constituted as follows: Messrs. Benjamin Stanton, of Ohio; Sydenham Moore, of Alabama; John C. Kunkel, of Pennsylvania; Augustus R. Wright, of Georgia, and William F. Russell, of New York.

On February 11[2] they made a report of the contumacy of John W. Wolcott, of Boston, Mass., bringing to the attention of the House the following testimony:

Q. Had you any funds placed in your hands, belonging to any of the manufacturers in Massachusetts, for the purpose of influencing Members of Congress upon the passage of the tariff act?—A. I had not.

[2] Journal, p. 371; Globe, pp. 684–692.

Q. Were you ever authorized by any of them to make any promises of future benefits, in the event of the passage of that act?—A. I was not.

Q. Did you, after the close of the last session of Congress, receive from the manufacturers, either in Boston or elsewhere, any funds, money, negotiable securities, or anything of that sort, to be used in that way?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you, at any time during the months of March or April, 1857, receive from Mr. Stone any negotiable securities, or money, or credits of any kind?—A. Never. Never for any such purpose as that, either directly or indirectly.

Q. Did you receive at any time in the early part of March a considerable sum of securities for any purpose?—A. Never for any purpose connected with the tariff, either to be paid to Members of Congress, for the purpose of influencing their action, or to be paid to their agents.

Q. Nor for their benefit?—A. Nor for their benefit, either directly or indirectly.

Q. Nor in satisfaction of previous arrangements or promises?—A. Nor in satisfaction of previous arrangements or promises.

Q. Did you receive any securities at any time during the month of March last to the amount of $30,000 at one time?—A. Not for any purpose of that sort.

Q. Did you ever for any purpose?—A. Well, that would be a matter of strictly private business; I did not for the purpose of influencing Members of Congress or their agents.

The committee report that thereupon the witness asked and was granted time to consult counsel in regard to his obligation to answer the last question. On March 11 he again appeared and peremptorily refused to answer, as follows:

Q. Did you receive from the firm of Lawrence, Stone & Co. some time in March last a sum of securities or money of the amount of $30,000, more or less?—A. I did not, in March last nor at any other time, receive from Lawrence, Stone & Co. any money or securities of any amount for the purpose of influencing, or to be used in influencing, directly or indirectly, the action or vote of any Member or officer of the present or last Congress upon the tariff or any other act or measure considered by Congress, or before it, or contemplated to be before it; nor did I ever pay or promise to pay, directly or indirectly, any money or pecuniary consideration to any officer or Member of any Congress for his vote or services in the passage of, or to influence his action in relation to, the tariff or any other law; nor did I ever give any money or securities to any person for the purpose of being paid to any officer or Member of Congress for his vote or influence, directly or indirectly, upon any act under the consideration of Congress; nor have I any knowledge that any such act or thing was done by any other person.

I am advised by my counsel, Messrs. Reverdy Johnson and James M. Keith, whose opinion I have obtained since the present question was propounded to me, that the above answer is a full answer to everything which such a question may involve, falling under the jurisdiction of the House of Representatives, touching the inquiry which the committee are constituted, and could only be constituted, to investigate. And, acting under the same legal advice, I most respectfully submit that the question in its present form is not of itself "pertinent" to the only inquiry which the House, in this instance, has a legal right to institute.

If, acting under such a power, a committee of the House can compel a witness to answer such a question as this except by saying that he did not use at all, directly or indirectly, any money, coming from any quarter, to influence, directly or indirectly, the action or vote of any Member of Congress, and that he has never paid any money to any one for such a purpose, and has no knowledge that any money was used for that purpose, or any other illegal purpose, regarding Congress or any of its officers, I respectfully submit that it gives to the committee or the House the right to inquire into my private business and social relations, which, except so far as they may tend to prove the alleged improper influencing of Members of Congress in some official duty, is as much beyond the jurisdiction of the House, and, of course, of the committee, as it would be beyond their power to investigate the private business and social relations of any other citizen, without such a charge or implication of corruption, or attempt to corrupt Congress or any of its Members, having been made.

The committee in the report then go on to say that as they have evidence that the firm of Lawrence, Stone & Co. paid to Wolcott, early in March, 1857, the sum of $58,000 in two payments, one of $33,000 and the other of $25,000, which constituted a part of a charge of $87,000, which appeared on the books of the firm to have been expended in procuring the passage of the tariff of 1857, they believe it to be very material and important to the elucidation of the matter referred to them to know from Mr. Wolcott whether he admits the receipt of any such sum; and if so, how it was expended.

The committee thereupon recommend the adoption of this resolution:

Resolved, That the Speaker be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to issue his warrant to the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House, commanding him to arrest the said John W. Wolcott wheresoever he may be found, and have his body at the bar of the House forthwith to answer as for contempt in refusing to answer a proper and competent question propounded to him by a select committee of the House, in pursuance of the authority conferred by the House upon said committee.

This resolution was debated at length in respect to the sufficiency of the witness's answers; and also the House considered whether the fact of the contumacy should not be certified to the district attorney in accordance with the provisions of the statute recently enacted; also whether the witness was actually in contempt until the House had passed upon the questions propounded by the committee and given the witness a second opportunity to answer.

An amendment proposed by Mr. Daniel E. Sickles, of New York, proposed that the witness be again subpœnaed before the committee and that the interrogatory be again propounded to him, and then, if the answer should not be given freely and fully, the Speaker should issue his warrant for the arrest of the witness and that he should be brought before the bar of the House to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt. This amendment was disagreed to.

The original resolution as reported from the committee was agreed to, after a consideration of the answers of the witness and the powers of the House.

On February 12,[1] the Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House and reported that, in obedience to the warrant of the Speaker of the 11th instant, he had arrested John W. Wolcott, and now produced the said Wolcott in person to answer the same. This return seems to have been made in writing and to have been reported to the House by the Speaker:

In obedience to the written warrant, I arrested the within-named John W. Wolcott at his lodgings in this city (at Willard's Hotel) this 11th day of February, 1858.

And now, February 12, 1858, I produce the within-named John W. Wolcott in person at the bar of the House of Representatives to answer as within ordered.

A. J. GLOSSBRENNER,
Sergeant-at-Arms, House of Representatives, United States.

The warrant of the Speaker was as follows:

To A. J. Glossbrenner, Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives:

You are hereby commanded to arrest John W. Wolcott, wheresoever he may be found, and have his body at the bar of the House forthwith to answer as for a contempt in refusing to answer a proper and competent question propounded to him by a select committee of the House of Representatives, in pursuance of the authority conferred by the House upon said committee.

Witness my hand and the seal of the House of Repsesentatives of the United States at the city of Washington this 11th day of February, 1858.

[L. S.] JAMES L. ORR, Speaker.

Attest:

J. C. ALLEN, Clerk.

[1] Journal, pp. 373, 374; Globe, p. 690.

Mr. Stanton submitted, as in accordance with the established practice of the House, the following resolution:

Resolved, That John W. Wolcott be now arraigned at the bar of the House and that the Speaker propound to him the following interrogatories:

"What excuse have you for refusing to answer the question propounded to you by the select committee of this House, before whom you were summoned to appear, as to whether you had received any sum of money from Lawrence, Stone & Co. some time in March, 1857?

"Are you now ready to answer that and all other questions that may be propounded to you by that committee?"

And that the said John W. Wolcott be required to answer the same in writing and under oath.

This resolution was agreed to without division, and thereupon the said Wolcott was arraigned and the interrogatories directed by the foregoing resolution were propounded to him by the Speaker.

The said Wolcott then submitted a paper in writing, subscribed and sworn to before the Speaker. This paper, which appears in full in the Journal, disclaims all intention of contempt of the House and asks until Monday, with the assistance of counsel, to purge himself of the alleged contempt.

After some debate, the following was agreed to:

Resolved, That J. W. Wolcott have until Monday next, at 1 o'clock p. m., to file his answers to the interrogatories propounded to him, and that in the meantime he remain in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, with the privilege of seeing counsel.

On February 15,[1] the Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House with J. W. Wolcott, who submitted a paper in writing, under oath, in answer to the interrogatories heretofore propounded to him. This paper does not appear in the Journal of the House. It is a lengthy argument to show that the committee had no right to ask any question except such as related to the subject committed to them by the House by the resolution authorizing the committee. But the last question was not within the power of the House to authorize. It was not a pertinent question to the inquiry and it invaded the private affairs of a citizen. The decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Anderson v. Dunn was reviewed briefly, as well as the act of January 24, 1857, and the conclusion is reached that the committee had no authority to ask any but questions pertinent to the inquiry. And the refusal to answer an inquiry which was made without authority or was impertinent was not contempt. The respondent called attention to the fact that he had answered fully all the antecedent questions relating to the use of money to influence improperly the House. But the last inquiry, in his view, concerned his private business, which, he claimed, the House had no power to inquire into.

A resolution relating to the discharge of a person in custody for contempt, is a matter of privilege.

Although the House imprisoned Wolcott for contempt, the Speaker also certified the case to the district attorney, in pursuance of law.

The Journal did not record the Speaker's act in certifying the Wolcott case to the district attorney.

[1] Journal, p. 386; Globe, p. 711.

A witness imprisoned by the House for contempt was indicted under the law, whereupon the House ordered his delivery to the officers of the court.

The answer of the witness having been read, Mr. Stanton offered the following:

Whereas John W. Wolcott has failed satisfactorily to answer the questions propounded to him by order of this House and has not purged himself of the contempt with which he stands charged: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the said John W. Wolcott be committed by the Sergeant-at-Arms to the common jail of the District of Columbia, to be kept in close custody until he shall signify his willingness to answer the questions propounded to him by the select committee of this House, and all other legal and proper questions that may be propounded to him by said committee; and for the commitment and detention of the said John W. Wolcott this resolution shall be a sufficient warrant.

Resolved, That whenever the officer having the said John W. Wolcott in custody shall be informed by said Wolcott that he is ready and willing to answer the questions heretofore propounded, and all proper and legal questions that may hereafter be propounded to him by said committee, it shall be the duty of such officer to deliver the said John W. Wolcott over to the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House, whose duty it shall be to take the said Wolcott immediately before the committee before whom he was summoned to appear for examination and to hold him in custody, subject to the further order of the House.

After debate, and after the House had refused, yeas 34, nays 158, to lay the resolutions on the table, they were agreed to, yeas 133, nays 55.

On March 22,[1] Mr. Alexander H. Stephens, of Georgia, offered the following resolution, with a preamble, as a question of privilege:

Whereas on the 15th day of February last, this House, by its resolution, did commit John W. Wolcott to the common jail of the District of Columbia for an infringement of the privileges of the House in refusing satisfactorily to answer certain questions put to him by order of the House, and is still held in custody under said order; and whereas afterwards, in pursuance with the provisions of law, the Speaker of the House did certify to the district attorney of the District of Columbia the facts pertaining to said case,[2] and the same were laid before the grand jury of said District, and a presentment was thereupon found against said Wolcott for the same offense; and whereas the court in which said presentment is pending have determined that said Wolcott can not be tried on said presentment so long as this House hold him in custody under its rights of privilege: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms is hereby authorized and directed to cause said Wolcott to be released from jail and to deliver him over to the marshal of said District of Columbia, or other person authorized to receive him, to answer to the presentment pending in said court.

Mr. John Letcher, of Virginia, made the point of order that this resolution might not be presented as a question of privilege.

The Speaker[3] said:

The witness is under execution of the sentence of the House. The order of the House has not been executed. It is being executed. The witness is in prison because of his breach of the privilege of the House, inasmuch as he was adjudged to be guilty of a contempt of the House in refusing to answer a proper and pertinent question propounded to him by one of the committees of the House. The matter came before the House as a question of privilege. He was imprisoned by virtue of the order of the House arising out of that question of privilege; and the Chair is of opinion that the resolution presented, under the circumstances, involves a question of privilege.

Debate arose as to whether it would be advisable to release the prisoner unconditionally or merely to suspend the execution of the order of the House for the convenience of the court, but the latter proposition was disagreed to. Also the House, by a vote of 22 yeas to 161 nays, disagreed to a proposition to discharge the prisoner unconditionally.

The resolution of Mr. Stephens was then agreed to, yeas, 125; nays, 67. The preamble was also agreed to.[1]

1673. In 1858 the House arrested and arraigned J. D. Williamson for contempt in declining to respond to a subpœna.

Form of subpœna and return used in the case of Williamson.

The Sergeant-at-Arms indorses on a subpœna his authorization of his deputy to act in his stead.

The Sergeant-at-Arms, having arrested Williamson by order of the House, made his return verbally.

Form of arraignment adopted in the case of Williamson.

A witness arraigned for contempt, having in his answer questioned the power of the House, was permitted to file an amended answer, which was printed in full in the Journal.

On February 1, 1858,[2] Mr. Benjamin Stanton, of Ohio, from the select committee appointed to investigate certain alleged corruption in connection with recent tariff legislation, reported the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas J. D. Williamson, of the city of New York, was, on the 27th day of January, A. D., 1858, duly summoned to appear and testify before a committee of this House, appointed to investigate certain charges growing out of the alleged expenditure of money by Lawrence, Stone & Co., of Boston, in the State of Massachusetts, to influence the passage of the tariff of 1857, and has failed and refused to appear before said committee pursuant to said summons: Therefore

Resolved, That the Speaker issue his warrant directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms, commanding him to take into his custody the body of the said J. D. Williamson wherever to be found, and to have the same forthwith before the bar of this House to answer as for a contempt of the authority of this House.

Mr. Stanton also reported for the information of the House the subpœna and the returns thereon, and the answer of Mr. Williamson to the officer of the House. The subpœna was as follows:

By the authority of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States of America.

To A. J. Glossbrenner, Sergeant-at-Arms:

You are hereby commanded to summon Captain J. D. Williamson (of the firm of Williamson, O'Reilly & Co., Trinity buildings, New York,) to be and appear before the select committee of the House of Representatives of the United States, appointed to investigate the charges preferred against Members and officers of the last Congress growing out of the disbursement of any sum of money by Lawrence, Stone & Co., of Boston, or other persons, to bring with him any papers in his possession connected with or referring to the expenditure of money to procure the passage of the law modifying the tariff, forthwith in their chamber at their Capitol in the city of Washington, then there to testify touching the matter of inquiry committed to said committee; and he is not to depart without the leave of said committee.

JAMES L. ORR, Speaker.

Attest:

J. C. ALLEN, Clerk.

Indorsed as follows:

WASHINGTON, January 26, 1858.

I hereby depute J. W. Jones for me and in my stead to execute the within order of the Speaker.

A. J. GLOSSBRENNER,

Sergeant-at-Arms, House of Representatives, United States.

I hereby certify that I served a copy of the within summons upon J. D. Williamson, at the city of New York, on the 27th day of January, 1858, by delivering said copy to him personally, and I know the person served to be the person named in said summons.

J. W. JONES.

The following letter was also read:

MY DEAR SIR: I most respectfully decline attending before the committee of the House of Representatives at Washington, in relation to the affairs of Lawrence, Stone & Co., according to a copy of a summons I received from you in our office on the 27th instant, for reasons which my attorney advises me are sufficient to prevent me from leaving the city of New York.

J. D. WILLIAMSON.

A. J. GLOSSBRENNER, Sergeant-at-Arms, etc.

These documents having been read, the House agreed to the preamble and resolution without debate.

On February 3, 1858, the Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House, and announced that he had executed the warrant of the Speaker, issued on the 1st instant, for the arrest of J. D. Williamson, and that, in pursuance thereof, he had the body of said Williamson now at the bar of the House.

Mr. John Letcher, of Virginia, having asked if the return of the Sergeant-at-Arms was in writing, the Speaker[1] said that the announcement that the witness was in custody was made verbally by the officer, in accordance with the order of the House.

Mr. Stanton thereupon stated that the members of the committee had approved a course similar to that pursued in the case of Chester in the preceding Congress, and offered the following:

Resolved, That J. D. Williamson, esq., of the city of New York, now in custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms on an attachment for contempt in refusing obedience to the summons requiring him to appear and testify before a committee of this House, be now arraigned at the bar of the House, and that the Speaker propound to him the following interrogatories.

"1. What excuse have you for not appearing before the select committee of this House, in pursuance of the summons served on you on the 27th ultimo?

"2. Are you now ready to appear before said committee and answer such proper questions as shall be put to you by said committee?"

and that the said J. D. Williamson be required to answer said questions in writing and under oath.

Then, on motion of Mr. Stanton,

Ordered, That J. D. Williamson be remanded to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and that he have until 1 o'clock p. m. to-morrow to make answer to the questions directed to be propounded to him by the foregoing resolution.

On February 4, in accordance with the order, the Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar with the respondent and announced that the latter was ready to answer the questions propounded to him.

The said Williamson was thereupon arraigned, and the interrogatories were propounded to him as directed by the House.

[1] James L. Orr, of South Carolina, Speaker.

Thereupon the said Williamson handed in the answers in writing and under oath. The answers do not appear in the Journal. To the first question he responded:

I was under the authority of the sheriff of the city and county of New York, not to leave the city without his consent, and was so advised by him and my counsel, with whom I consulted on the subject; also that it always was my opinion, and is still, that neither the House of Representatives nor the Senate has any legal right or authority to compel me to come before them or their committees to divulge the private transaction of my business which I see fit to transact in a perfectly lawful manner, and which if divulged would destroy all the business of my office, by which I am dependent on to support my family, as no person would intrust their confidential business to a firm who, to suit the different political parties that spring into power every year, would call the firm before them to expose their most confidential and private affairs, which concern only themselves, and which the Constitution of our common country gives to every man who does not violate any of the laws of the land, which I solemnly swear I have never done or violated up to this day.

The respondent further states that he had at one time the intention of testing the right of the House in this respect in the courts.

To the second interrogatory he responds that he will answer any proper questions that do not require him to violate his oath or promise or affect his integrity.

A discussion arose as to the proper course, in view of the question of privilege which the respondent had raised as to the authority of the House. The law prescribing method of procedure in the case of contumacious witnesses was examined and considered in relation to the powers which the House had formerly exercised.

Mr. Stanton proposed that the witness be remanded until the succeeding day, when the question could be further considered, but after discussion the House adopted the following substitute proposed by Mr. Alexander H. Stephens, of Georgia:

Resolved, That J. D. Williamson have leave, by his request, to withdraw his answers, and to submit amended answers, such amended answers to be submitted to-morrow at 1 o'clock p. m.; and, in the mean time, that said Williamson remain in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

On February 5 J. D. Williamson appeared at the bar of the House and submitted his amended answer, which appears in full in the Journal. The respondent explains that when the subpœna was served he was under heavy bonds, and that he was advised that they would be forfeited if he left New York voluntarily, but that the bail would not be forfeited if his attendance was compelled. He acted on this advice, not knowing that he was thereby in contempt of the House. He states that he is ready to go before the committee and answer "such proper questions" as should be put by the committee. This answer is in writing and signed and sworn to.

The answer having been read, on motion of Mr. Stanton it was Ordered, That the said Williamson be discharged from the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

1674. A person who had failed to respond to a summons was arrested and arraigned; and his excuse being satisfactory, the House ordered that he be discharged when he should have testified.

The written and sworn answer of a witness arraigned for neglecting a summons did not appear in the Journal.

On May 6, 1858, the House directed the Speaker to issue his warrant for the arrest of Robert W. Latham, who had failed to respond to a summons to appear and testify before the select committee appointed to investigate the sale of property at Willets Point, Long Island, N. Y. On May 15 the Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House with the said Latham, announcing that the latter had "appeared voluntarily, this morning, at his office, and avowed himself ready to answer." The Speaker thereupon asked the said Latham what excuse he had to offer, and the latter submitted a written answer. This answer, which does not appear in the Journal, shows that the witness had not intended to refuse to obey the summons, but had left town under a misapprehension. The House agreed to a resolution ordering his discharge when he should have appeared before the select committee and given his testimony. In this case the Sergeant-at-Arms appears, from the Globe account, to have made the return on the warrant in writing.[1]

1675. On February 15, 1859,[2] Mr. George Taylor, of New York, as a question of privilege, from the select committee on the accounts of the late Superintendent of Public Printing, presented a preamble and resolution in the form usual at this time, for the arrest of John Cassin, who had refused to appear before the committee as a witness. The resolution was agreed to, and on February 17th the Sergeant-at-Arms presented the said Cassin at the bar of the House. The House thereupon adopted a resolution similar to that adopted in the case of Wolcott, requiring the respondent to answer in writing and under oath, giving his excuse for not appearing, and stating whether or not he would now appear and answer. The respondent presented his answers, which do not appear in the Journal, and they being satisfactory, the House ordered his discharge.

1676. Persons in contempt for declining to testify or obey a subpœna have frequently given their testimony and been discharged without arraignment before the House.—On Febraury 21, 1859,[3] the House, in the usual form, ordered the arrest of Harry Connelly, who had refused to testify before the committee appointed to examine the accounts of the late superintendent of public printing. On February 22 Mr. John Covode, of Pennsylvania, from the same committee, as a question of privilege, stated that Mr. Connelly, when he learned of the action of the House, had presented himself before the committee to testify. The committee, however, thought it proper that he should give himself up to the Sergeant-at-Arms, who was executing the order of the House. This had been done, and now Mr. Covode proposed an order that the said Harry Connelly be discharged from the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms. This order was agreed to; so the said Connelly was discharged without being arraigned before the House.

1677. On January 20, 1862,[4] Mr. William S. Holman, of Indiana, from the select committee appointed to investigate Government contracts, presented the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to bring before the bar of this House Benjamin Higdon, of Cincinnati, Ohio, to answer to an alleged contempt of its authority in refusing to obey a subpœna to appear before the special committee for the investigation of Government contracts.

[4] Second session Thirty-seventh Congress, Journal, pp. 210, 336; Globe, pp. 400, 909.

On February 20 Mr. Holman presented in the House a report of the Sergeant-at-Arms in which he states that Mr. Higdon was arrested on February 4 at Cincinnati, but that before the arrest and after the issuing of the attachment he had gone before the committee and been permitted to testify on condition that he would pay the expenses of the Government growing out of the attachment. Mr. Higdon had paid this sum and was in Cincinnati in legal custody. Before going to the expense of bringing him to Washington it was desirable that the House should take action.

Thereupon it was Ordered, That Benjamin Higdon be released from the service of the Speaker's warrant heretofore issued by the order of the House for his arrest.

1678. On January 14, 1863,[1] Mr. William S. Holman, of Indiana, from the select committee on Government contracts, offered the following:

Whereas Simon Stevens, a witness subpœnaed by the select committee of the House of Representatives on Government contracts, in their examination of the facts in connection with the "terms, considerations, and profits of the labor contract for the storing, hauling, and delivery, etc., of foreign goods in the city of New York," concerning which said committee were directed by the House to make inquiries, refused to answer the following inquiries propounded to him by said committee:

"How much money in the aggregate has been paid over, under the labor contract, to William Allen Butler, or to his account, or to Mr. George W. Parsons, his law partner, for account of Mr. Butler?"

"You say you held the contract from May 11, 1861, until its expiration, by its own terms, September 5, 1862. State the net profits of that contract during that time."

Now therefore

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to bring the said Simon Stevens before the bar of this House to answer said contempt.

On January 16 Mr. Holman announced to the House that Simon Stevens had been brought to the Capitol by the Sergeant-at-Arms and had appeared before the committee and answered the interrogatories satisfactorily. Therefore Mr. Holman offered the following, which was agreed to:

Ordered, That Simon Stevens, now in the custody of the Seageant-at-Arms, be discharged upon the payment of costs.

1679. On January 24, 1867,[2] Mr. Robert S. Hale, of New York, as a question of privilege, submitted the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas J. F. Tracy was duly summoned to appear before the Joint Select Committee on Retrenchment to testify relative to an inquiry directed by a resolution of this House; and whereas the said Tracy has refused or neglected to obey the subpœna duly served upon him: Therefore Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to produce the body of said J. F. Tracy before the bar of the House to answer for his said contempt.

On the next day a proposition was made to reconsider the vote by which the preamble and resolution had been agreed to, a request having been made that Mr. Tracy might be allowed to attend an important meeting of the directors of the railroad of which he was president. The House, however, laid on the table the motion to reconsider, on the ground that private business should not be allowed to interfere with the mandate of the House. On January 28, 1867, Mr. Hale informed the House that Mr. Tracy had appeared before the committee, testified, and satisfied them that he intended no contempt against the House. Therefore, on motion of Mr. Hale, Ordered, That all further proceedings under the process against J. F. Tracy be suspended and that he be discharged from custody upon the payment of the fee.

1680. On July 20, 1867,[1] Mr. James F. Wilson, of Iowa, as a question of privilege, and by direction of the Judiciary Committee, offered the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas Lafayette C. Baker was, on the 2d day of July, 1867, duly summoned to appear and testify before a standing committee of this House on the Judiciary, charged with the investigation of certain allegations against the President of the United States, and has neglected to appear before said committee pursuant to said summons, therefore,

Resolved, That the Speaker issue his warrant directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms, commanding him to take into custody the body of said Lafayette C. Baker, wherever to be found, and to have the same forthwith brought before the bar of the House to answer for contempt of the authority of the House in thus failing and neglecting to appear before said committee.

On November 26 (a recess from July 20 to November 21 having intervened) Mr. Wilson announced to the House that Mr. Baker had appeared before the committee and testified, and the case did not seem to be of enough importance to ask further action of the House. Accordingly, on motion of Mr. Wilson:

Ordered, That L. C. Baker, heretofore arrested under order of the House, be discharged upon the payment of costs.

1681. On November 25, 1867, the Senate ordered the arrest of Edward E. Dunbar, a contumacious witness. On November 29 Mr. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, on whose motion the arrest had been ordered, reported that the witness had appeared before the Committee on Retrenchment, answered the questions, and explained that he intended no contempt. Therefore, by direction of the committee, Mr. Edmunds reported a resolution for the discharge of the witness, which was agreed to.[2]

1682. On April 4, 1874,[3] the Committee on the Judiciary reported a preamble and resolution providing for the arrest of George H. Patrick, who had failed to appear before the committee and bring with him certain papers, as commanded by a subpœna issued by the committee in the course of its examination of the charges against Judge Richard Busteed.

The resolution and preamble were agreed to.

On April 20 the committee proposed the following, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That George H. Patrick, a witness in proceedings for the impeachment of Richard Busteed, United States district judge of the district of Alabama, and against whom the attachment of the House issued as for contempt, having appeared and testified before the subcommittee on the Judiciary, and his explanation of his previous nonattendance being satisfactory to the House, be, and he is hereby, discharged from arrest.

1683. In 1860 a proposition to arrest a Government official for refusing to produce a paper which he declared to be entirely private in its nature, was abandoned after discussion.—On April 6, 1860,[1] Mr. John Covode, of Pennsylvania, from the select committee on the subject of the alleged interference of the Executive with the legislation of Congress, submitted a report accompanied by the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Speaker issue his warrant, directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms, commanding him (the said Sergeant-at-Arms) to take into custody the body of Augustus Schell, and the same forthwith to bring before the House, at the bar thereof, to answer as for a contempt of the authority of this House in refusing to produce a paper when thereunto required by committee of this House.

The select committee, of which Mr. Covode was chairman, was authorized by the resolution creating it to make an inquiry suggested by a letter of the President referring to "the employment of money to carry elections," and was directed by the resolution to—inquire into and ascertain the amount so used in Pennsylvania, and any other State or States, in what districts it was expended, and by whom, and by whose authority it was done, and from what sources the money was derived, and report the names of the parties implicated. And for the purpose aforesaid said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers and to report at any time.[2]

Mr. Schell, who was collector of the port of New York at the time of this examination, was required by the committee to give a list of certain contributors to a fund which had been raised in New York for use in New York and Pennsylvania in the election of 1856. Mr. Schell declined to furnish the list on the ground that it would involve a breach of confidence, and expressed the opinion that—the power was not given the committee to ask for the production of a paper entirely private in its character.[3]

The committee, in the report which they made to the House recommending the arrest of Mr. Schell for contempt, reported the questions propounded to him and his answers thereto, and expressed the opinion that the information required was "material to the proper investigation of the matters referred to them by the House." This report was signed by Mr. Covode, Mr. A. B. Olin, of New York, and Mr. Charles R. Train, of Massachusetts. Messrs. Warren Winslow, of North Carolina, and James C. Robinson, of Illinois, signed minority views, in which the ground was taken that inquiries by the House into the acts of individual citizens in the States, if made at all, must be made of objects within its jurisdiction. "It may," they say, "in the first place, act on individual persons, private citizens, or others, in the maintenance of its own parliamentary prerogatives; secondly, it may inquire into facts in order to legislate thereon, and, thirdly, it may investigate the conduct of public officers with a view to their impeachment before the Senate." The minority then go on to argue that the question propounded to Schell had no relation essential to either of the three named objects.

On April 9 this report was recommitted.

1684. In 1862 Henry Wikoff was imprisoned by the House for refusing to testify before a committee.

A witness having responded orally, when arraigned for contempt, it was required that the answer be in writing.

It is for the House and not the Speaker to determine whether or not a person arraigned for contempt shall be heard before being ordered into custody.

The House, having ordered a person into custody "until he shall purge himself of said contempt," he was, on purging himself, discharged without further order.

On February 12, 1862,[1] Mr. John Hickman, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported the following preamble and resolution, which were agreed to by the House:

Whereas Henry Wikoff, a witness subpœnaed by the Committee on the Judiciary in their examination of the facts in connection with the alleged censorship over the telegraph, concerning which said committee were directed by the House to make inquiry, has stated that a portion of the substance of the message of the President of the United States, communicated to Congress on the 3d day of December last, was transmitted by telegraph, through his agency, to the New York Herald prior to the receipt of the said message by Congress, and has refused to state from whom he received the matter thus revealed to the public: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to bring the said Henry Wikoff before the bar of this House to answer said contempt.

On the same day the Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House and reported that he had executed the warrant of the Speaker, issued this day, for the arrest of Henry Wikoff, and that he had the body of the said Wikoff then at the bar of the House.

The said Wikoff having been arraigned, the Speaker addressed him as follows:

Henry Wikoff: You have been arrested by order of the House and now stand at its bar charged with an alleged contempt of its authority in refusing to answer a question propounded to you by the Committee on the Judiciary, which was directed to make inquiry as to an alleged censorship over the telegraph. What have you to say in answer to this charge of contempt?

The said Henry Wikoff having responded orally, Mr. Thaddeus Stevens, of Pennsylvania, raised a question that the response should be in writing, in order that the record might be complete. Thereupon, on motion of Mr. Hickman, the response was reduced to writing and submitted to said Wikoff and approved by him, as follows:

Nothing; but that while hoping not to be considered wanting in any respect to the Judiciary Committee or to the House, the information which the committee demanded of me was received, such as it was, under a pledge of strict secrecy, which I felt myself bound to respect.

Mr. Hickman thereupon presented the following:

Whereas Henry Wikoff, a witness subpœnaed to appear and testify before the Committee on the Judiciary in the matter of the investigation by said committee into the alleged telegraphic censorship of the press, and refusing to answer certain questions propounded to him on his examination, upon being brought before the bar of the House has failed to satisfy the House of the propriety of his refusal: Therefore,

[1] Second session Thirty-seventh Congress, Journal, pp. 298, 302, 310; Globe, pp. 775, 784, 785, 831.

Resolved, That the said Henry Wikoff, by reason of the premises, is in contempt of this House, and that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to hold said Henry Wikoff in close custody until he shall purge himself of said contempt or until discharged by order of the House.

The previous question having been demanded, Mr. Charles A. Wickliffe, of Kentucky, raised a question of order that the prisoner should not be deprived of his opportunity to be heard by the previous question.

The Speaker [1] held that this was a matter for the House to determine by its vote on the motion for the previous question.

The resolution was then agreed to.

On February 14, Mr. Hickman, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported that the witness had answered the question propounded to him by the said committee and had thereby purged himself of the contempt of the House for which he was held in custody.

The Journal then has this entry:

The said Wikoff is therefore, under the terms of the resolution directing his arrest, released from custody.

1685. The case of Charles W. Woolley, in contempt of the House in 1868.

An instance wherein the managers of an impeachment were endowed by the House with the functions of an investigating committee.

With the adjournment of a court of impeachment the functions of the managers cease, but the House may continue them to complete an investigation already begun.

Pending consideration of a question of contempt the Speaker admitted as privileged a resolution relating to the existence of the committee which suggested the proceedings.

A contumacious witness should not be proceeded against for contempt, either before the House or under the law, until he has been arraigned and answered at the bar of the House.

A person under arrest for contempt is arraigned before being required to answer.

The answers at the arraignment in the Woolley case were in writing and one was sworn to, but neither appears in the Journal.

In the Woolley case the House did not furnish to the respondent a copy of the report of the committee at whose suggestion he was arraigned.

On May 16, 1868,[2] the House agreed to the following:

Whereas information has come to the managers which seems to them to furnish provable cause to believe that improper and corrupt means have been used to influence the determination of the Senate upon the articles of impeachment exhibited to the Senate by the House of Representatives against the President of the United States: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That for the further and more efficient prosecution of the impeachment of the President the managers be directed and instructed to summon and examine witnesses under oath, to send for persons and papers, to employ a stenographer, and to appoint subcommittees to take testimony, the expenses thereof to be paid from the contingent fund of the House.

On May 25,[1] under instruction by the managers, Mr. Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts, submitted a report, accompanied by a transcript of testimony, showing that a witness, Charles W. Woolley, of Cincinnati, had both evaded the committee and declined to answer certain questions as to the receipt and disbursement of a sum of money, alleging that they were not material. The committee therefore recommended the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That Charles W. Woolley, a witness heretofore duly summoned before the Committee of Managers of this House, and who, as appears by the report of the managers, has refused to answer proper inquiries put to him in the course of the investigation ordered by the House, and who has not attended upon the sessions of the committee according to its orders, but has, in contempt thereof and the orders of this House, left the city of Washington and remained absent and has not yet reported himself to the committee, be forthwith arrested by the Sergeant-at-Arms and be brought before the House at its bar by the warrant of the House duly issued by the Speaker under his hand and the seal of the House, and that said Woolley be detained by virtue thereof by the Sergeant-at-Arms until he answer for his contempt of the order of the House and abide such further order as the House may make in the premises.

Mr. Charles A. Eldridge, of Wisconsin, raised the question that the witness should be dealt with under the statute rather than by the process proposed by the managers.

The Speaker[2] said:

The Chair overrules the point of order on the ground that the uniform usage of the House from the Twelfth Congress down to the present time has been that where a witness is before a committee of the House that is authorized to send for persons and papers and refuses to testify he is first to have an opportunity to explain to the House of Representatives why he refuses to testify. He can not be held to answer until the committee shall present the question to the House and the House shall, at its bar, through the Speaker, present to him the question and ascertain why he has refused to answer it. The very statute at large quoted by the gentleman from Wisconsin was enacted subsequent to the refusal of a witness before a committee to testify after having been imprisoned by the order of the House for his persistent refusal. The committee who had the subject under consideration reported this law, which is to be found on page 155, volume 11 of the Statutes at Large. It reads as follows:

"Shall, in addition to the pains and penalties now existing, be liable to indictment as for a misdemeanor."

Previous to that time there had been no power of punishment except the power of the House of Representatives, and that power ended whenever the House adjourned. If therefore a witness, just at the close of a constitutional term of Congress, on the 3d of March, should refuse to testify, the House of Representatives could not imprison him for a longer time than until the 4th of March, when their term expired. The bill reported by that committee was passed with the general assent of all parties in Congress, was signed by the President, and become a law. And it goes on to provide that: "When a witness shall fail to testify as above, and the facts shall be reported to the House, it shall be the duty of the Speaker to certify the fact, under the seal of the House, to the district attorney of the District of Columbia."

This law was enacted in 1856 or 1857. The Chair was a Member of the House at the time, and remembers the enactment of the law, because a witness not only refused to testify before the committee, but when brought to the bar of the House still further refused to testify.

In debate on the resolution the point was made that the House had no right to make the proposed inquest into private affairs.

The resolution was agreed to.

On May 26 [1], the Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House having in custody the body of Charles W. Woolley. Thereupon a question arose as to the proper course of procedure, and the Speaker cited the precedent in the case of the witness John Cassin, in the Thirty-fifth Congress, saying that the witness could not be heard until the House had adopted some order on the subject.

Thereupon, Mr. Butler, following the precedent referred to by the Speaker, offered the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That Charles W. Woolley, esq., of the city of Cincinnati, Ohio, now in custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms on an attachment for a contempt in refusing or neglecting obedience to the summons requiring him to appear and testify before the committee of managers of the House, be now arraigned at the bar of this House and that the Speaker propound to him the following interrogatories:

1. What excuse have you for refusing to answer before the managers of impeachment of this House in pursuance to the summons served on you for that purpose?

2. Are you now ready to appear before said managers and answer such proper questions as shall be put to you by said managers of impeachment?

The said Woolley was thereupon arraigned and the interrogatories, as directed in the foregoing resolution, were propounded to him by the Speaker.

The said Woolley thereupon handed in a paper, subscribed and sworn to by himself,[2] in which he protested that he had not been guilty of contempt of the House, stated that he had not been able to obtain a copy of the report of the managers on which the resolution of arrest was based, and so had not seen the specific inquiries proposed to him and referred to, and finally asking that he be allowed a reasonable time to examine the report and consult counsel.

Mr. Charles A. Eldridge, of Wisconsin, moved that he be furnished with a copy of the report, and that he have until 12 o'clock on the next day to make further answer, and that in the meantime he remain in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms. After debate the motion was laid on the table, yeas 93, nays 30.

The House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to attend the impeachment proceedings in the Senate, and after some time returned, and the House resumed its session, after the chairman of the Committee of the Whole had reported that the respondent (Andrew Johnson) had been declared acquitted on the second and third articles, and that the court of impeachment had adjourned sine die.

The question of the contumacious witness was then resumed, and the House, by a vote of 95 yeas and 28 nays, agreed to the following:

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House again propose to C. W. Woolley the questions contained in the resolution this day adopted, and that said Woolley be informed that the House requires definite and explicit answers to the questions propounded to be made forthwith.

Thereupon the Speaker again stated the questions, and the said Woolley, in answer thereto, handed in "a paper in writing." This paper was subscribed by the witness, but not sworn to. No question seems to have been made as to this point. The paper does not appear on the Journal.

[2] This paper does not appear in the Journal, nor is it described except as "a paper in writing" (Journal, p. 733).

In answer to the first question the witness explained that he had been prevented by illness from attending sessions of the committee at certain times, but that otherwise he held himself ready in every particular to respond to the order of the House, except that he had protested to the managers that their course of examination had transcended his rights and privileges as a citizen under the Constitution. He was not bound by the law of the land to submit to a scrutiny into his private affairs. To the second question the witness responded that he was ready to appear and answer proper questions, protesting that he was in no way connected with an association or combination having as its object the use of corrupt influence in respect to the impeachment, and that no money drawn by him from any bank in the city or owned or held by him, or subject to his authority or control, was in any way used in connection with the said trial.

At this point in the proceedings, after the reading of the paper submitted by the witness, Mr. Butler, in order to meet an objection that had been urged, viz, that the power of the managers and their functions had ceased with the adjournment of the court of impeachment, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the managers, as a committee, be empowered and directed to continue the investigation ordered by the resolution of the House of the 16th instant, with all the powers and rights conferred thereby, and to make such full investigation as will determine the truth of the matters and things set forth in the preamble to said resolution.

Mr. Charles A. Eldridge, of Wisconsin, made the point of order that the resolution was out of order at this time and could be submitted only by unanimous consent.

The Speaker overruled the point of order on the ground that it was competent for any Member, pending the consideration of a question of contempt of the authority of the House, to make motions relative to it. It was a privileged resolution growing directly out of the investigation. The Chair also expressed the opinion that the managers had ceased to be in office.

Mr. Eldridge having appealed, the appeal was laid on the table.

The resolution was then agreed to, yeas 91, nays 30.

In 1868 a contumacious witness, Charles W. Woolley, who declined to answer, for the alleged reason that the examination was inquisitorial, was imprisoned for contempt.

A witness arraigned at the bar for contempt, and having already submitted his written answers, was allowed by unanimous consent to make a verbal statement.

A witness imprisoned for contempt before a committee purges himself by stating to the House his readiness to go before the committee, and not by testifying directly to the House.

An instance wherein the Speaker announced that he had certified to the district attorney the case of a contumacious witness.

Reference to the circumstances attending the enactment of the law for punishing contumacious witnesses.

Mr. George S. Boutwell, of Massachusetts, then offered the following:

Resolved, That the said Charles W. Woolley be committed to and detained in close custody by the Sergeant-at-arms in the Capitol during the remainder of the session or until discharged by the further order of the House, to be taken when he shall have purged the contempt upon which he was arrested, by testifying before the committee authorized to continue the investigation which the managers were conducting when the contempt was committed by said Woolley.

During the debate on this resolution the witness, at the bar of the House, asked permission to make a statement.

The Speaker said that the permission would require unanimous consent.

There being no objection, the witness stated that he expected to answer such questions as the House should think proper. In other words, whenever the committee and himself differed as to the propriety of a question he should be brought to the bar of the House and the House should pass on it.

It was objected by Mr. Boutwell that such a course would virtually defeat the powers of the committee.

The question was then taken and the resolution was agreed to, yeas 81, nays 28.

On May 28, 1868,[1] Mr. John A. Bingham, of Ohio, from the committee, reported the following resolution, which was agreed to, after a motion to lay it on the table had been decided in the negative, yeas 28, nays 95:

Resolved, That Rooms A and B, opposite the room of the solicitor of the Court of Claims, in the Capitol, be, and are hereby, assigned as guardroom and office of the Capitol police and are for that purpose placed under charge of the Sergeant-at-arms of the House with power to fit the same up for the purpose specified.

Mr. Bingham then presented a preamble reciting the circumstances of the refusal of the witness to testify on the ground that the question invaded a privileged communication between attorney and client and giving extracts from testimony of witness and another, and with this preamble presented further:

And whereas your committee believe the reasons given by the witness in declining to answer are wholly untrue and evasive and the refusal to answer is a deliberate contempt of the authority of the House and done for the purpose of concealing the fact and embarrassing public justice; therefore,

Resolved, That said Woolley, for his repeated contempt of the authority of the House, be kept until otherwise ordered by the House in close confinement in the guardroom of the Capitol police by the Sergeant-at-Arms until said Woolley shall fully answer the questions above recited, and all questions put to him by said committee in relation to the subject of the investigations with which the committee is charged, and that meanwhile no persons shall communicate with said Woolley, in writing or verbally, except upon the order of the Speaker.

These preambles and resolution were agreed to.

On May 30[2] the Speaker stated to the House that he had, in accordance with the requirements of the law of January 24, 1857, certified the facts in the case to the district attorney of the District of Columbia. The Journal has in regard to this merely this entry:

The Speaker having made a statement as to his action thus far in regard to the recusant witness, C. W. Woolley, asked the instruction of the House in regard to letters and telegrams to and from said Woolley.

After debate as to the mode of procedure in such cases and the inexpediency of making the Speaker in any sense the custodian of the prisoner the House agreed to the following:

Resolved, That the resolution relating to Charles W. Woolley be so modified as to place the witness in the sole custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, subject to the order of the House, and that his counsel, family, and physician have free access to the witness.

On June 8[1] Mr. Butler, as a question of privilege from the committee, presented the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That any communication from C. W. Woolley or his counsel, placed in the hands of the Speaker, be sent to the committee of investigation of this House, before which Woolley has been called to testify, for examination and report.

On the same day Mr. Samuel Shellabarger, of Ohio, as a question of privilege submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to without objection, on the statement by Mr. Shellabarger that the witness had indicated that he would purge himself:

Resolved, That Charles W. Woolley, now under the arrest of this House for contempt of the authority of the House, be ordered to the bar of the House for the purpose of making such statement as will purge him of his contempt of such authority.

Accordingly the witness was brought before the House, and in response to the question of the Speaker announced that he was ready to make a statement, and proffered a paper.

At this point a question was raised as to the propriety of the prisoner purging himself by a statement before the House, and it was urged that the proper way was for him to go before the committee and answer the questions. The precedent of Thaddeus Hyatt in the Senate was referred to on this point. After debate, on motion of Mr. Shellabarger, the House, by a vote of 93 yeas to 32 nays, agreed to the following:

Resolved, That in purging himself of the contempt of which Charles W. Woolley is committed by this House said Woolley shall be required to state whether he is now willing to go before the Committee of Managers of the House before which he has been summoned to testify, and make answer to the questions for the refusal to answer which he has been ordered into custody, and if he answers that he is so ready to answer before the said committee then the witness shall have that privilege so to appear and answer as soon as said committee can be convened, and that in the meantime the witness remain in custody; and in the event that the said witness answer that he is not ready to so appear before said committee and make answer to the said questions so refused to be answered, then that the said witness be recommitted for continuance of such contempt, and that such custody shall continue until the said witness shall communicate to this House through said committee that he is ready to make such answer.

Thereupon the Speaker propounded the questions to the said Woolley, as required by the resolution, and the said Woolley answered as follows:

As my client has testified in regard to the dispatches named in the resolution, and as the resolution is an order of the House for me to answer the questions, I will do so.

So the said Woolley was remanded to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms with the privilege to appear before the committee and answer as provided for in the resolution.

On June 11[1] Mr. Butler, from the committee, stated that the witness had answered satisfactorily the questions, and the committee proposed the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That Charles W. Woolley, having appeared before the Committee of Investigation and answered all questions put to him by the committee or its order and thus purged himself of his contempt of the House in that regard, be discharged from arrest and held only to appear and make further answer if required, according to summons.

1687. A person whose arrest had been ordered for neglect to obey a subpœna, having appeared and testified, the House arraigned him and then discharged him.

Instance wherein the answer of a person arraigned for contempt was in writing, but not sworn to and not recorded in the Journal.

On April 2, 1862,[2] Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, from the Select Committee on Government Contracts, reported the following, which was considered and agreed to under the operation of the previous question:

Whereas on the 14th day of March last a subpœna was issued by the Speaker of this House, summoning, among others, one Aaron Higgins—sometimes called Aaron A. Higgins—by the name of A. Higgins, to appear before the Committee on Government Contracts forthwith at the United States Hotel in Boston, Mass., but that the said Higgins has hitherto and still does refuse or neglect to obey said summons: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Speaker of this House be directed to issue his writ of attachment against Aaron Higgins of Boston, Mass., sometimes called Aaron A. Higgins, and cause him to be brought to the bar of this House to answer as for his contempt in not obeying the said subpœna of said Speaker issued March 14, 1862.

On April 9 the Sergeant-at-Arms, by S. J. Johnson, his deputy, appeared at the bar with Aaron Higgins in custody, as commanded by the Speaker's warrant of the 2d instant. The said Higgins having been arraigned, the Speaker[3] inquired of him what excuse he had to offer for his contempt of the authority of the House in failing to obey its subpœna to appear before the Select Committee on Government Contracts; and the response of the said Higgins having been submitted and read to the House,[4] Mr. Dawes submitted the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas Aaron Higgins, now at the bar of this House in contempt for disobeying the subpœna of its Speaker, issued at the instance of the Committee on Government Contracts, has appeared before said committee, and answered under oath all such interrogatories as have been put to him by their order: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to discharge said Higgins from custody.

1688. Instances wherein witnesses arraigned for contempt and agreeing to testify have not been discharged until the testimony has been given.

Witnesses arraigned for contempt have frequently answered orally and not under oath.

The order of arrest sometimes specifies that it shall be made either by the Sergeant-at-Arms or his special messenger.

On January 28, 1869,[1] the House ordered the arrest of Henry Johnson, for contempt in refusing to appear before the Select Committee on Election Frauds in New York, the resolution commanding the Sergeant-at-Arms, or his special messenger, to arrest said Johnson and bring him before the House. On February 3 the Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House having the said Johnson in custody, and the House agreed to the usual resolution providing for the arraignment of the prisoner and his interrogation by the Speaker.

The Speaker having propounded the interrogatories, the witness replied that he had never refused to answer the subpœna, and that he was ready to answer any questions that might be put to him. The witness was not sworn before making these answers, which were oral.

A motion was made to discharge the witness from custody, but after debate the motion was tabled and the subject was postponed until the following day, after the witness should have had the opportunity of appearing before the committee and testifying.

On February 4 the chairman of the committee reported that the witness had appeared and testified, and that it appeared that the failure to appear in the first instance seemed due to some misunderstanding. The House ordered the discharge of the witness.

On February 1,[2] the House also ordered the arrest of Florence Scannel, for contempt in declining to testify before the same committee. On February 3 Mr. Scannel was arraigned and the usual resolution was passed. Upon being interrogated he answered, orally and not under oath, that he was ready to answer the question which he had refused formerly to answer. Thereupon it was ordered that he should be remanded to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms to appear before the committee. On February 4, the witness having appeared before the committee and testified, the House ordered that he be discharged on the payment of costs. A motion to waive the payment of the costs was decided in the negative.

On February 19 the House, by a single resolution, ordered the arrest of John H. Bell, and David W. Reeve, recusant witnesses before the same committee. On February 23 the two witnesses were brought to the bar separately, and the usual resolution for the arraignment and interrogating of them was adopted in each case. Each of the witnesses answered orally, and not under oath, explaining why he had been contumacious, and expressing readiness to attend and answer before the committee.

The House then laid on the table motions to discharge the witnesses, in the latter case by a vote of 124 yeas to 33 nays, and the witnesses were remanded to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms to appear before the committee. On February 24,[1] having answered, they were discharged by the House.

1689. In 1873 Joseph B. Stewart was imprisoned for contempt of the House in refusing as a witness to answer a question which, he claimed, related to the relations of attorney and client, and therefore was inquisitorial.

The House declined to commit to custody an alleged contumacious witness until he had been arraigned and answered at the bar of the House.

An instance wherein a person was arraigned at the bar without a previous order of the House fixing the form of procedure.

An instance wherein a witness arraigned for contempt was allowed to make an unsworn oral statement, which in fact was an argument as well as an answer.

An alleged contumacious witness having been arraigned, the House declared him in contempt and then proceeded to specify the manner in which he might purge himself.

In the Stewart case the questions and answers at the examination were recorded in the Journal, the answers being oral and not under oath.

On January 29, 1873,[2] Mr. Jeremiah M. Wilson, of Indiana, from the select committee who, by resolutions of the House of January 6 and January 9, 1873, were directed to inquire into certain matters connected with the Union Pacific Railroad Company and Credit Mobilier, with authority to send for persons and papers, reported that evidence had been produced before the committee tending to show that just before the passage of the act of 1864, entitled, "An act to amend an act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean," etc., sums of money and a quantity of bonds, property of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, were brought to Washington and placed in the hands of one Joseph B. Stewart, and by him in some way disposed of. Thereafter the said Joseph B. Stewart was called and duly sworn as a witness, and testified in substance as follows: That said bonds to the amount of $100,000 or $150,000 were received by him, and that $30,000 were for his own fees; that he did not pay over any of said bonds or their proceeds to any Member of Congress or person connected with the Executive Department of the Government, and that he acted in such transaction partly for the railroad, partly for clients of his own, and partly as arbitrator between the Union Pacific Railroad Company and such other persons, and gave over the bonds to such other persons. The report goes on to state that the committee asked the said Stewart for the names of the persons to whom he gave the bonds, and that he declined to respond, alleging that the transactions were between him as attorney and his clients, and that he would make no statement to the committee about the business of his clients. He persisted in this attitude, although he was informed by order of the committee that he was not in this protected by the legal privilege existing between counsel and and client. The committee give in their report a transcript of the questions and answers, and conclude: "The committee are of opinion and report that it is necessary for the efficient prosecution of the inquiry ordered by the House that said questions should be answered, and that there is no sufficient reason why the witness should not answer the same, and that his refusal is in contempt of this House."

Therefore the committee recommended the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Speaker do issue his warrant, directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms attending this House, or his deputy, commanding him to take into custody, wherever to be found, the body of Joseph B. Stewart, and the same in his custody to keep subject to the further order and direction of this House.[1]

Debate at first arose over the question of the alleged privilege of the transactions of the witness with his alleged clients, but Mr. John A. Bingham, of Ohio, chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary presently raised the point that the question presented was novel, and not like a case where the charge was that a person had violated the privileges of the House in the person of one of its Members. It was a question whether the House of Representatives could hold a private citizen to answer for any crime, unless he had acted to the hurt or prejudice of the Government in connection with its own officials. The witness denied that he had done that. This was not like the Burns case.

Mr. Bingham therefore offered the following substitute for the resolution:

Resolved, That the Speaker do issue his warrant, directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms attending this House, or his deputy, commanding him to take into custody, wherever to be found, the body of Joseph B. Stewart, and bring him forthwith to the bar of this House to show cause why he should not be punished for a contempt.

This amendment was agreed to, yeas 126, nays 69. The resolution as amended was then agreed to.

On January 30[2] the Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House, having in custody the body of Joseph Stewart.

Thereupon the said Stewart was arraigned, and the following interrogatory propounded to him by the Speaker[3] without previous order of the House:

What excuse have you for refusing to answer before the select committee of this House in pursuance of the summons served on you for that purpose?

The witness thereupon, without being sworn, proceeded to make an oral response, which not only gave his reasons, but proceeded to argument, at times reflecting on the conduct of the committee, and at such length that a point of order was made by Mr. John Coburn, of Indiana, that the person at the bar should be confined to a statement of facts.

[3] James G. Blaine, of Maine

The Speaker, however, ruled that the respondent might make an argument.

Mr. Henry W. Slocum, of New York, having raised a question as to how long the respondent might speak, the Speaker ruled that he would be governed by the hour rule.

The witness having concluded, and having denied any disrespect of the House, having declared the testimony presented to the House by the committee was inaccurate, and having by assertion and argument advanced the claim that the transactions of which the committee had interrogated him were privileged between attorney and client, concluded with a peroration in regard to the rights of the citizen under the Constitution.

The reply does not appear in the Journal, either in full or in substance.

Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, offered the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That Joseph B. Stewart, having been heard by the House pursuant to the order heretofore made requiring him to show cause why he should not answer the questions propounded to him by the committee, has failed to show sufficient cause why he should not answer the same, and that said Joseph B. Stewart be considered in contempt of the House for failure to make answer thereto.

Mr. Wilson then offered the following:

Resolved, That in purging himself of the contempt for which Joseph B. Stewart is now in custody, the said Stewart shall be required to state forthwith, or as soon as the House shall be ready to hear him, whether he is now ready to appear before the committee of this House to whom he has hitherto declined to make answers and make answers to the questions for the refusal to answer which he has been ordered into custody, and if he answers that he is ready to appear before the said committee and make answer, then the witness shall have the privilege to so appear and answer forthwith, or so soon as the said committee can be convened; and that in the meantime the witness remain in custody; and in the event that said witness shall answer that he is not ready to so appear before said committee, and make answer to the said questions so refused to be answered, then that said witness be remanded to the said custody, for the continuance of such contempt, and that such custody shall continue until the said witness shall communicate to this House, through the Speaker, that he is ready to appear before the said committee and make such answers, or until the further order of the House in the premises.

This resolution was agreed to after the House had negatived two alternative propositions looking, one to confinement in the District jail, and the other to a purging by going before the committee while in custody.

The Speaker having propounded to said Stewart the following question, viz:

Are you now willing to appear before the committee of this House to whom you have hitherto declined to make answer and make answer to the questions for the refusal to answer which you have been ordered into custody?

The said Stewart replied as follows, viz:

I disclaim any contempt for the authority of this House or its committee, and repeat, as in my testimony and before this House I have stated, that I have fully answered all questions except the matter which came, and solely came, to my knowledge in my relation as counsel, and I respectfully protest against being requested to do so, and do decline to disclose any matters confided to me as counsel.

And thereupon he was again taken into the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The Journal gives the question and answer, the answer apparently being oral and not under oath.

On February 5 and 11,[1] the Speaker laid before the House petitions and papers from said Stewart, which were referred to the committee. The first petition was introduced by the Speaker as a Member, the others were presented by unanimous consent.

On February 28,[2] near the close of the session and the Congress, on motion of Mr. Horace Maynard, of Tennessee, Ordered, That Joseph B. Stewart, now in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House, be discharged.

1690. In 1874 the House imprisoned in the common jail a contumacious witness, Richard B. Irwin, who contended that the inquiry proposed by the House committee was unauthorized and exceeded the power of the House.

In the Irwin case the House asserted its authority as grand inquest of the nation to investigate, with the attendant right of punishment for contempt, in case of offenses in preceding Congress.

A proposed order to the Sergeant-at-Arms to hold a person in custody in jail until the latter should have purged himself of contempt was criticised and an unconditional order was agreed to.

A question as to the authorization required to enable a committee to compel testimony.

In the Irwin case the respondent, on being arraigned, made an oral, unsworn answer, which does not appear in the Journal.

In the Irwin case the questions which the respondent had declined to answer in committee were proposed to him again at the bar of the House.

In the Irwin case the Journal does not record the responses of the witness to the questions put by the Speaker.

On December 11, 1874,[3] Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Ways and Means, submitted as a question of privilege, the following:

Whereas Richard B. Irwin was, on the 10th day of September, 1874, duly summoned to appear and testify before a standing committee of this House, on the Ways and Means, charged with the investigation of certain allegations against the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, and has neglected to appear before said committee pursuant to said summons: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Speaker issue his warrant, directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms, commanding him to take into custody the body of the said Richard B. Irwin, wherever to be found, and to have the same forthwith brought before the bar of the House, to answer for contempt of the authority of the House in thus failing and neglecting to appear before said committee.

On December 21[4] Mr. Dawes stated to the House that the witness had explained satisfactorily to the committee his delay, and therefore the committee recommended the following resolution, which was agreed to by the House:

Resolved, That Richard B. Irwin be discharged from the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms on the warrant of the Speaker of this House, he having given satisfactory reasons for having neglected to appear before the Committee on Ways and Means in answer to the summons of this House.

Mr. Dawes then submitted a report from the committee, giving extracts from the testimony of the said Irwin, wherein he had declined to answer certain questions submitted to him by the committee as to the disposition which he had made of $750,000 intrusted to him by the officials of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company for the purposes of procuring the subsidy during the period included between the months of January and May, 1872, i. e., during the term of the preceding Congress. The witness stated that this money was used by him in procuring the passage of the subsidy bill, and paid to divers persons, but that he paid none of it, nor had any understanding for the payment of any of it, to any Member of the present or the preceding Congress, or any officer of the present Congress, who was a Member or officer of the preceding Congress, or to any person under the jurisdiction of the House. When asked for the names of those employed by him he declined to answer, alleging that the jurisdiction of the committee did not give it authority to demand an answer to the question; that the jurisdiction of the committee and the House was exhausted when it appeared that none of the money was paid by him to any person under the jurisdiction of the House; that the matter arose in a prior Congress, over which the present committee and House were without jurisdiction; that as an honorable man he had no right to disclose relations existing between himself and others on a matter not within the jurisdiction of the House; and finally that the committee was not empowered by any order or resolution of the House to ask the question.

The committee concluded their report as follows: "The committee are of opinion, and report, that it is necessary for the efficient prosecution of the inquiry ordered by the House that said questions should be answered, and that there is no sufficient reason why the witness should not answer the same, and that his refusal is in contempt of this House."

Therefore the committee recommended the adoption of the following:

Resolved, That the Speaker issue his warrant, directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms, attending this House, or his deputy, commanding him to take into custody forthwith, wherever to be found, the body of Richard B. Irwin, and to bring him to the bar of the House, to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt, and in the meantime keep the said Irwin in custody to await the further order of the House.

As to the point made by the witness that the committee was not formally authorized by the House to make this investigation, Mr. Dawes showed that on January 12, 1874, the House referred to the committee the testimony taken in the preceding Congress on the subject of this subsidy; that on April 3, 1874, the House referred to the same committee a resolution introduced by a Member and relating to the same subject, and, finally, that on the 24th of March, 1874, the House agreed to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Ways and Means are hereby authorized and empowered to send for persons and papers and administer oaths in all matters from time to time pending and under examination before said committee.

A general debate rose as to the power of the House to punish in this case, and Mr. Alexander H. Stephens, of Georgia, contended that the House could not punish, except according to law, and that the proper course was to certify to the district attorney the case of the witness, according to the act of 1857. The House had no inherent, common-law right to punish. Mr. Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts, also held that the House might not punish this witness. In investigations in relation to the impeaching power, the House could punish; so also in a case of violation of the constitutional provision that Members should be privileged while going and returning. There was also the right of investigation in so far as it was intended to instruct as to the duties before them. But the House had no right to investigate as to past offenses in another Congress.

On the other hand Mr. Dawes contended that the House was, under the Constitution, a grand inquest, with power to govern itself in all matters pertaining to the just and fair exercise of its powers. The House had never stripped itself of the power, but had repeatedly punished for contempts of this power. It was further contended that the statute did not take away the common-law right of the House to punish.

The resolution was agreed to.

On January 6[1] the Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House having in custody the body of Richard B. Irwin. The said Irwin was thereupon arraigned, and the following interrogatory was propounded to him by the Speaker:

Are you now ready to answer the questions which have been addressed to you by the Committee on Ways and Means, and which you have heretofore refused to make answer to?

Thereupon the prisoner addressed the House orally, and not under oath. This, address does not appear in the Journal. The witness denied that he was in contempt of the House, since the House had never ordered the investigation and he had never refused to answer any question that the Committee on Ways and Means was authorized by the House to ask. He denied that the papers referred to the committee or the resolution of the House empowered the committee to make this investigation. He had already stated under oath that he did not employ any persons subject to the jurisdiction of this House, and that he did not pay or procure to be paid any money to such person. He disclaimed any intentional disrespect of the House, but denied the right of the House or the committee to inquire into matters existing in confidence between himself and other citizens beyond the jurisdiction of the committee. Finally he contended that the House had no right under the Constitution to deprive any citizen of liberty without due process of law.

Mr. Dawes thereupon submitted the following, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Speaker propose to the witness at the bar the following questions:

First. Give the names of the persons whom you employed to aid you in procuring the subsidy from Congress in 1872 for the Pacific Mail Steamship Company.

Second. What was the largest sum paid by you to any one person to aid you in procuring that subsidy?

The Speaker thereupon propounded the said questions to the said Irwin. The Journal does not give the replies, merely stating, "The said Irwin having replied." The record of debates shows that the prisoner declined to respond to the first question, but responded to the second with the statement, "Two hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars."

[1] Journal, pp. 131, 132; Record, pp. 291–296.

Thereupon Mr. Dawes submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That Richard B. Irwin, having been heard by the House, pursuant to the order heretofore made requiring him to show cause why he should not answer the questions propounded to him by the committee and by the Speaker of this House in pursuance of its order, has failed to show sufficient cause why he should not answer the same; and that said Richard B. Irwin be considered in contempt of the House for failure to make answer thereto.

Then Mr. Ellis H. Roberts, of New York, from the committee, offered a resolution like that adopted in the case of Stewart, providing for keeping the prisoner in custody until he should purge himself of contempt. But the resolution differed from the Stewart resolution in that it specified that the Sergeant-at-Arms should keep the prisoner in the common jail of the District. This resolution was criticised on the ground that it made the commitment contingent on a certain event—that is, on the answering of the witness. It was suggested that in habeas corpus proceedings such a provision might be a source of weakness. The resolution was also criticised because of the provision for confinement in jail. This point was debated at length. It was urged that the House had no control over the jail, that the jailer might refuse to receive the prisoner, etc. On the other hand it was shown that the House had in the case of Wolcott and others committed to the jail.

Finally Mr. Roberts withdrew the resolution proposed, and offered the following which was agreed to:

Resolved, That Richard B. Irwin be remanded to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, to abide the further order of this House, and that while in such custody he be permitted to be taken by the said Sergeant-at-Arms before the Committee on Ways and Means, if he shall declare himself ready to answer such questions as may be lawfully put to him, including those asked of him by order of this House, and while he shall so remain in custody the Sergeant-at-Arms shall keep the witness in his custody in the common jail of the District of Columbia.

The Speaker, without order of the House and under the law, certifies the case of a contumacious witness to the district attorney; but the Journal may contain no record of his act.

A writ of habeas corpus being served on the Sergeant-at-Arms, who held the witness Irwin in custody for contempt, the House, after consideration, prescribed the form and manner of return.

The House having ordered the arrest of a person who had failed to obey a subpœna from a committee, and who later made explanation, an order was passed discharging him without arraignment.

After the adoption of the resolution the Speaker (Mr. Blaine) said that the law was mandatory on the Speaker to certify a case of contumacy to the district attorney. In the case of Stewart some criticism arose because that was not done. In this case, therefore, in the absence of an order from the House, he should certify the case. The Journal does not appear to have any record of such an act.

On January 7 [1] the Speaker laid before the House a petition from Irwin representing that his confinement in jail would result in serious injury to his health, and asking that the order be changed. The petition also questions the authority of the House to imprison, and states that no witness has been similarly imprisoned since the passage of the act of 1857. After debate this petition was laid on the table.

On January 8 [1] Mr. Dawes presented a letter from two physicians, representing that the confinement of the witness in the jail would be attended by results pernicious to his health. After debate this letter was presented to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts, then offered the following, which was disagreed to, yeas 34, nays 160:

Resolved, That pending the examination and report of the Committee on Ways and Means upon the said subject, the Sergeant-at-Arms be, and is hereby, instructed to retain said Irwin in his own custody, and not in the common jail.

On January 14 [2] the Speaker laid before the House a letter from N. G. Ordway, Sergeant-at-Arms of the House, reporting as follows:

I respectfully report to you, and through you to the House of Representatives, that on the 9th day of January, 1875, a writ of habeas corpus was served upon me, directing me to produce the body of Richard B Irwin, detained in my custody, before Arthur MacArthur, one of the judges of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, on the 12th day of said January; that thereafter, on the 12th day of January aforesaid, the time for producing the body of said Irwin was further extended to January 14, at 11 o'clock a. m., at which time I appeared before the said Judge MacArthur and presented, through my attorney, Hon. Samuel Shellabarger, the writ and resolutions of the House of Representatives upon which said Irwin was held in my custody. Whereupon Judge MacArthur decided that no return would be received by him until the body of the said Irwin was produced in court.

Inasmuch, therefore, as the production of the said Richard B. Irwin by me would release him from my custody as an officer of the House of Representatives and place him in the custody of the court, I asked for delay until to-morrow, January 15, at 11 o'clock a. m., to obtain further instructions from the House of Representatives.

Debate at once arose over the importance of the question presented. Mr. Dawes contended that the doctrine of the Nugent case (8th Philadelphia American Law Journal) applied:

Every court, including the Senate and House of Representatives, is the sole judge of its own contempts; and in case of commitment for contempt in such case, no other court can have a right to inquire directly into the correctness or propriety of the commitment, or to discharge the prisoner on habeas corpus.

On the other hand, it was pointed out by Mr. John A. Kasson, of Iowa, that under sections 753, 755, 758 of the the Revised Statutes it was made the duty of the judge to issue the writ, and that the person making the return should at the same time bring the body of the prisoner. On the other hand it was urged that if the body was brought it would pass into the custody of the court, and so might escape. From these divergent considerations there resulted three propositions: The reference of the subject to the Committee on the Judiciary for examination; a direction to the Sergeant-at-Arms to make return that he held the prisoner in custody under the order of the House adjudging him guilty of contempt, and a further direction not to bring the body of the prisoner before the court; and a third proposition as follows:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be, and is hereby, directed to make careful return to the writ of habeas corpus in the case of Richard B. Irwin that the prisoner is duly held by authority of the House of Representatives to answer any proceedings against him for contempt, and that the Sergeant-at-Arms take with him the body of said Irwin before said court when making such return, and retain said Irwin, and continue to hold him subject to the further order of this House.

The first two propositions were rejected, but the third was agreed to after being amended, on motion of Mr. George F. Hoar, of Massachusetts, by striking out all after the word "contempt." Thus the third proposition, as amended, accomplished substantially the object of the second.

On January 15 [1] Mr. Dawes reported to the House that the Sergeant-at-Arms had obeyed the order of the House, making return as directed. Mr. Dawes submitted copies of both the writ of habeas corpus and of the return of the Sergeant-at-Arms. The latter contained copies of the warrants of the Speaker for the arrest and detention of Irwin.[2] Mr. Dawes further reported that the judge, after a hearing, had insisted on the production of the body of Irwin in court.

Thereupon a debate arose again on the respective authorities of the House and the court, and whether or not the House might disregard the writ of habeas corpus. Mr. John A. Kasson presented from the Ways and Means Committee a proposition, which, after modification, was as follows:

Ordered, That the Sergeant-at-Arms, with the aid of counsel, make known to the judge issuing the writ of habeas corpus requiring the body of Richard Irwin to be brought before said judge, that he, the said Sergeant-at-Arms, has said Irwin in his custody pursuant to an order of this House, upon its judgment that the said Irwin was in contempt of the House of Representatives in refusing to give testimony as a witness, and is detained pending such examination, and for no other reason; that the House of Representatives require of him to retain the body of said Irwin in his custody until the said Irwin shall offer to purge himself of said contempt, as provided by the order of this House, and that he respectfully inform the judge that, as an officer of this House, he can not disobey the orders thereof in this respect by releasing in any way or transferring said Irwin from his custody; and further,

Ordered, That he exhibit to the said judge a copy of the order of this House, duly certified by the Clerk, adjudging the said Irwin in contempt, and the warrant of the Speaker in execution thereof, together with a copy of this order.

To this Mr. James B. Beck, of Kentucky, proposed as an amendment in the nature of a substitute, the following:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be, and he is hereby, directed to make careful return to the writ of habeas corpus in the case of Richard B. Irwin that the prisoner is duly held by authority of the House of Representatives to answer in proceedings against him for contempt, and that the Sergeant-at-Arms take with him the body of said Irwin before said court when making such return as required by law.

An amendment to add to the amendment the following: "And that he be further directed to obey the order of said court in the premises," was disagreed to.

The question was then taken on the substitute proposed by Mr. Beck, and it was agreed to, yeas 107, nays 64.

The original proposition as amended by the substitute was then agreed to.

On January 19 [3] Mr. Dawes presented documents to show that the health of the prisoner was satisfactory, and stated that the committee were not prepared to recommend any change in his place of confinement, which was the jail.

On January 20 [4] Mr. Dawes laid before the House a letter addressed to the Speaker by Richard B. Irwin, in which the latter announced his readiness to answer the questions. The letter having been read, Mr. Dawes offered the following:

[2] Record, pp. 510, 511.
[4] Journal, p. 210; Record, p. 609.

Whereas, on the 6th instant, Richard B. Irwin was adjudged to be in contempt of this House for refusing to answer a certain question or questions propounded to him at the bar of the House and by the Committee on Ways and Means; and whereas the House did thereupon order the commitment of said Irwin to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms in the common jail of the District of Columbia, to abide the further order of this House; and whereas the said Irwin has this day stated in writing to the Speaker that he is ready to answer the question or questions which he has heretofore refused to answer, and others that may be lawfully put to him: Therefore,

Resolved, That so much of the resolution of January 6 as required the Sergeant-at-Arms to keep the said Irwin in the District Jail be, and the same is hereby, rescinded and that upon answering the said question or questions the said Irwin shall be discharged from the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

1692. A witness being arraigned for contempt in refusing to answer a pertinent question asked by a committee agreed, when arraigned, that he would answer if so ordered by the House.

A witness being ordered by the House to answer a pertinent question before a committee, was then removed from the bar, and later, on report of the committee that he had answered, was discharged.

On January 11, 1875,[1] Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Ways and Means, which had been charged with an investigation of disbursements of money by the Pacific Mail Steamship Company to procure the passage of the subsidy bill in the previous Congress, reported that Charles Abert had declined to answer a pertinent question, and was in the judgment of the committee in contempt. Thereupon it was

Resolved, That the Speaker issue his warrant, directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms attending this House, or his deputy, commanding him to take into custody forthwith, wherever to be found, the body of Charles Abert, and him to bring to the bar of the House, to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt, and in the meantime keep the said Abert in custody to await the further order of the House.

Subsequently the Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House having in custody Charles Abert, alleged to be in contempt of the House.

On motion of Mr. Dawes,

Ordered, That the Speaker propound to him the question: "Will you state to the Committee on Ways and Means the names of the persons to whom you distributed $106,500 belonging to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, according to the directions of Mr. Irwin?" and also: "Will you state the names of the person or persons who introduced to you those individuals to whom you distributed any portion of said money?"

The Speaker having propounded the said questions the witness replied that he would as far as he could on being ordered by the House.

The House then directed, by vote, that the witness should answer the questions.

Then, without further order, the witness was removed from the bar by the Sergeant-at-Arms, the Speaker[2] holding that further order was not necessary.

On January 12, on report of Mr. Dawes that the questions had been answered, the House voted to discharge the witness.

1693. A witness having, when arraigned for contempt, submitted an answer disrespectful to the House, he was ordered into custody for contempt.—On January 19, 1875,[1] Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Ways and Means, made a report that in the opinion of the committee Charles A. Wetmore was in contempt for refusing to answer a question arising in the investigation of the use of money to secure the passage of the subsidy bill in the preceding Congress. Thereupon the House adopted the usual resolution for the arrest of Wetmore, and on the same day he was arraigned at the bar of the House. The prisoner then asked until the succeeding day to prepare his answer.

On January 20 the prisoner was again arraigned, and read a prepared statement, after which the House

Resolved, That Charles A. Wetmore, having, under the guise and pretense of answering to a charge of contempt, been guilty of a series of gross and wanton insults to this House, in the presence of the House, be, and hereby is, adjudged in contempt thereof, and committed to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, to be detained in the common jail of the District until the further order of the House.

On the succeeding day a letter of apology being presented to the House from Wetmore, the House ordered his discharge.

1694. A witness arrested for contempt in refusing to answer, promised to respond, and was thereupon discharged and ordered before the committee.

In reporting the contumacy of a witness the committee appended to their report extracts from the examination showing the circumstances.

Instance wherein a committee, in its discretion, kept testimony secret.

On March 7, 1876,[2] Mr. Washington C. Whitthorne, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, made a partial report stating that they were charged under a resolution of the House of Representatives, adopted January 14, 1876, with the duty of making inquiry into any errors, abuses, or frauds that might exist in the naval service, and were authorized to make inquires for periods in the past, and to send for persons and papers. In pursuance of the power conferred upon them by the House the committee had caused Alcaeus B. Wolfe, of Washington City, to be summoned before them for the purpose of giving testimony, and he had appeared on March 7, and after being sworn had testified in a manner shown by extracts appended. These extracts show that witness refused to answer whether or not he had ever carried any money to anybody connected with the naval service; whether or not he knew of any commissions or payments being made by contractors or claim agents to any person connected with the naval service. The committee therefore recommended this resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Speaker issue his warrant, directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms attending this House, or his deputy, commanding him to take into custody forthwith, wherever to be found, the body of Alcaeus B. Wolfe, and bring him to the bar of the House, to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt, and in the meantime keep the said Wolfe in custody to await the further orders of the House.

On May 8[1] the Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House, having in custody, as directed by the Speaker's warrant, the body of Alcaeus B. Wolfe.

Mr. Whitthorne thereupon offered the following preamble and resolution, which was agreed to:

Whereas it appears to the House that Mr. A. B. Wolfe has appeared before the House Naval Committee and answered all questions that were propounded to him by the committee: Therefore,

Resolved, That the witness, A. B. Wolfe, be discharged from the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms and ordered before the committee for such other and further examination as they may chose to make touching the matters before them by order of this House.

It appears from the record of debate that the witness had been brought to the committee room by the Sergeant-at-Arms, and had promised to answer the questions propounded. While this statement was being made the witness, then at the bar of the House, fell in a fit. He was removed from the Hall, and Mr. Whitthorne explained further that the last clause of the resolution was inserted in order that the subpœna issued by order of the Speaker should continue binding on the witness, in case the committee should have further need of his testimony.

Mr. Whitthorne further stated that the committee deemed it proper that the testimony given by the witness should remain in possession of the committee alone and for the time be kept secret.

1695. The case of E. W. Barnes, in contempt of the House in 1877.

Form of subpœna duces tecum used for compelling production of telegrams in 1877, but criticised as too general and verbally defective.

A subpœna served by a deputy did not contain a certificate of the deputy's appointment.

The House held valid a report transmitted by telegraph from an investigating committee, and ordered the arrest of a person for contempt on the strength of it.

A person having been arrested for contempt, a communication from his counsel was laid before the House.

On December 21, 1876,[2] the Speaker laid before the House a telegram from Mr. William R. Morrison, of Illinois, chairman of the Select Committee to Investigate the Recent Election in Louisiana, communicating a record of the proceedings in the case of E. W. Barnes, manager of the Western Union Telegraph Company in New Orleans, a recusant witness. Under the authority given the committee to send for persons and papers the committee had caused a subpœna duces tecum to be issued in the following words and figures:

By Authority of the House of Representatives of the United States of America.

To JOHN G. THOMPSON, Esq.,

Sergeant-at-Arms, or His Special Messenger:

You are hereby commanded to summon E. W. Barnes, manager of the Western Union Telegraph Company at New Orleans, La., to be and appear before the Louisiana Affairs Special Committee of the House of Representatives of the United States, of which Hon. William R. Morrison is chairman, and with you bring all telegrams sent or received by William Pitt Kellogg [here follow names of seven others], at the office of the Western Union Telegraph Company, New Orleans, from and after the 15th day of August, 1876, in their chamber in the city of New Orleans, St. Charles Hotel, forthwith, then and there to testify touching matters of inquiry committed to said committee. Herein fail not, and make return of this summons.

Witness my hand and the seal of the House of Representatives of the United States, at the city of Washington, this 13th day of December, 1876.

[SEAL.] SAMUEL J. RANDALL, Speaker.

Attest:

GEORGE M. ADAMS, Clerk.

On this subpœna was indorsed:

Served personally with a copy of the within at one and one-half o'clock p. m., December 13, 1876.

JOHN G. THOMPSON, Sergeant-at-Arms.

By J. W. POLK, Special Messenger.

The witness, when he appeared before the committee, acting under instructions from officers of the company, refused to produce the telegrams, whereupon the committee voted to communicate the refusal to the House. This was done in the form of a transcript of the proceedings of the committee, signed by the chariman and attested by the clerk. Annexed to the communication was a letter from President Orton, of the telegraph company, in which he informed the committee that the company would not permit its employees to furnish the telegrams, or at least not until Congress should have approved the subpœnas of the committees and directed that their demands be enforced.

The communication from Chairman Morrison having been read to the House, Mr. J. Proctor Knott, of Kentucky, submitted this resolution:

Resolved, That the Speaker of this House issue a warrant, under his hand and the seal of the House of Representatives, directing the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House, either by himself or his special deputy, to arrest and bring to the bar of the House without delay E. W. Barnes, to answer for a contempt of the authority of this House and a breach of its privileges, in refusing to produce to the special committee, of which Hon. William R. Morrison is chairman, now sitting in the city of New Orleans, certain telegraphic dispatches, in obedience to a subpœna duces tecum, servied on him the 13th day of December, 1876, and to be dealt with as the law under the facts may require.

There was debate [1] as to the validity of a report transmitted by a committee in this way, but the Speaker sustained the proceeding. There was also debate at length on agreeing to the resolution of arrest. Mr. Garfield urged that a citizen should not be arrested on authority of a report transmitted by an agency so prone to inaccuracy as the telegraph; and Mr. George W. McCrary, of Iowa, urged that the subpœna had been drawn too general in its terms, authorizing too extensive inquiry into the private affairs of the citizen.

The resolution was agreed to by the House without debate.

On January 3, 1877,[2] the Speaker, having stated that the Sergeant-at-Arms, in pursuance of the order of the House, had taken into custody E. W. Barnes, a recusant witness before the Select Committee to Investigate the Recent Election in the State of Louisiana, the Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House with the said Barnes.

The Speaker then laid before the House a communication, addressed to the

[2] Journal, pp. 149, 150; Record, p. 408.

Speaker by the counsel for the said Barnes, requesting delay in the appearance of Mr. Barnes until they should have had time to confer with him.

Mr. Knott submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That E. W. Barnes be allowed until Friday, the 5th day of January, 1877, at 2 o'clock p. m., to make his answer at the bar of this House to the charge of contempt of its authority and breach of its privileges pending against him; and that said Barnes be remanded to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and by him safely held until the judgment of the House be had on said charge.

In 1877 the House, in the course of an investigation of the recent Presidential election, compelled the production of telegrams by an employee of the Company having actual custody of them.

A witness arraigned for contempt was accompanied by his counsel; but his request that he be heard by counsel was granted only to the extent of being permitted to respond in writing.

In an arraignment in 1877 the answer of the respondent, prepared by his counsel, was attested.

Discussion of the effect of a State law as a limitation on the right of the House to investigate.

A person arraigned at the bar for contempt was permitted to amend his answer.

On January 5, 1876,[1] the hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, in compliance with the previous order of the House, the Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House, having in custody E. W. Barnes, a recusant witness. Mr. Barnes was accompanied by his counsel.

Whereupon the following interrogatory was propounded to him by the Speaker:

Mr. Barnes, it is the duty of the Chair to ask you what excuse you have to offer for your failure to produce before the committee of this House, sitting at New Orleans, on the 18th day of December, 1876, or thereabouts, certain telegrams called for by subpœna duly served upon you?

The said Barnes desiring to be heard by counsel,

Ordered, That leave be granted the witness to make his statement in writing, to be read from the Clerk's desk.

The same having been read, Mr. Knott submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the report of the committee, the answer just read to the House, and all other papers relating to the breach of the privilege of this House and contempt of its authority, alleged to have been committed by E. W. Barnes, now in custody and at the bar of the House, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report as early as practicable what action, in their judgment, should be taken by the House in relation thereto.

The record of debates shows that the witness, in reply to the question put by the Speaker, stated that, as the precedent in the case of Kilbourn would prevent his being heard by counsel, he asked that his written statement, prepared by his counsel, be read.

The Speaker expressed the opinion that this statement should be under oath, but stated that he would be governed by the opinion of the House. Some diversity of opinion was expressed; but the question did not come to issue, as it appeared that the statement was duly attested.

On January 12, 1877,[1] Mr. Knott, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported[2] the following resolutions:

Resolved, That E. W. Barnes be required to produce to the select committee of which Hon. William R. Morrison is chairman, the telegrams mentioned in the subpœna which had not been sent to Mobile by order of the superintendent before the service of the subpœna upon him on the 13th of December, 1876.

Resolved, That said Barnes be again brought to the bar of the House and the Speaker then demand of him if he is now willing to produce to said committee the telegrams mentioned in the subpœna which had not been sent by him to Mobile before the 13th day of December, 1876, when the subpœna was served on him, and whether he will do so.

Resolved, That if said Barnes shall answer that he is now willing to produce said telegrams to said committee, and promises to do so, he will be allowed to do so without unnecessary delay, and upon so doing he shall be discharged from custody.

In reporting these resolutions the committee took the ground that the messages were not privileged, on account of their transmittal by telegraph. A telegraphic communication was not different from one transmitted orally or on a piece of paper through the hands of a third person. (Judge Cooley, and Henisler v. Freedman, 2 Parsons' Select Cases, 274, and State v. Litchfield, 58 Maine, 267, are referred to on foregoing branch of question.)

As to the contention of the witness that the legal possession and control of the messages did not reside in him as a subordinate employee, and that he could not produce them without a breach of duty, the committee find, after discussing incidentally the law of the case, and referring especially to Lord Ellenborough's opinion (Amy v. Long, 9 East., 473), that Barnes actually did have the authority, given him by a general order of the telegraph company, to produce the telegrams at the time the subpœna was served on him.

The plea of the witness that the subpœna was verbally defective in the use of the word "you" for "him," was dismissed as not made in good faith.

The contention that the subpœna was in effect a "general warrant," and within the prohibition of the Fourth amendment to the Constitution, the committee dismisses on the authority of the case of The United States v. Orville E. Babcock (3 Dillon's C. C. R., 567).

The contention that the law of Louisiana in relation to telegraph messages, making them confidential, prevented the witness from disclosing the messages, is thus treated by the report:

It has never been questioned that the House of Representatives has the inherent power under the Constitution, from the very nature and purposes of its organization, to institute any investigation which in its judgment may be necessary to the proper discharge of any of its functions, that in such investigations it has the power to examine witnesses, and to require the production of any paper that may be necessary to render the same effectual, and that its jurisdiction in that regard is coextensive with the limits of the United States, including Louisiana. It is, furthermore, certain that it may, in the exercise of those powers, act through a committee regularly appointed and authorized for that purpose. These principles are so universally understood and admitted that it requires neither argument nor authority for their illustration. It follows, therefore, that the law of any State which might, either directly or by implication, undertake to abridge the exercise of any of these powers by the House would be in derogation of its constitutional functions, and to that extent absolutely void.

When the resolutions were offered on behalf of the committee, Mr. Garfield noted the fact that they were so worded as to establish the foundation of the contempt, if there should be any, in the present and not past refusal to produce the messages.

The resolutions were then agreed to without debate.

The Sergeant-at-Arms thereupon appeared at the bar of the House having in custody the witness, to whom the Speaker propounded the following question:

Mr. Barnes, are you now willing to produce before the committee sitting in New Orleans, of which William R. Morrison is chairman, the telegrams mentioned in the subpœna which had not been sent by you to Mobile before the 13th day of December, 1876, when the subpœna was served upon you?

At the suggestion of Mr. George F. Hoar, of Massachusetts, approved by the Speaker, the resolutions were read to the witness before he was required to answer.

The question then being again put by the Speaker the witness answered:

Mr. Speaker, when I left New Orleans I was necessarily superseded, being under heavy bonds and being unwilling to be responsible for the money and business of the office when not personally present; I am therefore not at present in control of anything or any messages in the New Orleans office. Should I come in possession of the messages again, and should there prove to be any such messages there as are described in the subpœna, I will willingly produce them.

The Speaker expressed the opinion that this was not the categorical answer required by the practice of the House; but, on objection being raised, did not insist that he might determine what was properly a function of the House to determine.

Mr. Knott thereupon offered this resolution:

Resolved, That the answer made by the witness, E. W. Barnes, to the questions propounded to him by the Speaker under the resolution of the House is not deemed sufficient, and that he be remanded to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and by him closely kept until he shall produce to the committee all telegrams demanded from him and be discharged from the custody by order of the House.

This resolution having been read, the witness asked leave to modify his answer; and, by unanimous consent, on motion of Mr. Bernard G. Caulfield, of Illinois, this request was allowed by the House. A request of the witness that in returning his amended answer he might be heard in verbal explanation through counsel, the Speaker held that this request could only be granted by the House; and objection arising, the request was not put to the House.

The witness thereupon answered:

I intended my answer to be such as the resolution seemed to me to require. I thought it proper in candor to inform the House as to my present circumstances. I am entirely willing to produce the messages, and will do so if I can.

Mr. Knott withdrew the resolution previously offered by him and offered the following:

Resolved, That the answer of E. W. Barnes, the witness, to the questions propounded to him by the Speaker in obedience to the resolution of the House is not deemed sufficient, and that said Barnes is hereby adjudged to be in contempt of the authority of this House, and to have committed a breach of its privileges in refusing to produce telegrams to the special committee, of which William R. Morrison is chairman, in obedience to the subpœna served upon him on the 13th of December, 1876, and that he be remanded to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, to be held in such confinement by him until said witness shall purge himself of his contempt by producing the telegrams specified in the subpœna, which he had not sent to Mobile before the subpœna was served upon him, to said select committee, or until he be discharged from custody by the order of the House.

After brief debate, this resolution was agreed to, yeas 131, nays 72.

On January 16, 1877,[1] the Speaker laid before the House the following letter:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, January 16, 1877.

To the Honorable Speaker of the House of Representatives:

The undersigned would respectfully represent that he intended the answer he made to the demand made by the Speaker of him when he was last at the bar to be understood that he was entirely willing to produce all the messages demanded by the committee to the utmost extent of his power; and if allowed an opportunity he would honestly and in good faith use every effort in his power to regain possession of said messages for that purpose. He wishes to repeat that he is now willing so to do if he shall be afforded an opportunity, and that if he should fail he will still be amenable to the action of the House upon a view of all the facts which have occurred or may transpire. And he now respectfully asks the opportunity to make the effort to produce the messages to the committee, which he can not do while he remains in custody.

Yours, very respectfully, E. W. BARNES.

On motion of Mr. Eppa Hunton, of Virginia, this letter was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On January 16[2] the following resolution was reported from the Judiciary Committee (the Journal entry says "by unanimous consent"), and agreed to by the House:

Resolved, That E. W. Barnes be permitted to repair at once to New Orleans, in the custody of a deputy sergeant-at-arms, for the purpose of procuring the telegraphic dispatches heretofore mentioned in the report of the Judiciary Committee of this House, and within ten days bring them before the committee of investigation, at Washington, of which Hon. William R. Morrison is chairman, and abide the further action of this House.

On January 31, 1877,[3] Mr. Knott, by unanimous consent,[4] from the Committee on the Judiciary, offered the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Whereas E. W. Barnes has delivered to the select committee, of which Hon. W. R. Morrison is chairman, the telegrams in his possession, in pursuance of the order of this House:

Resolved, That said Barnes be, and he is hereby, discharged from custody:

1697. An official of a telegraph company not being in actual possession of dispatches demanded by the House, proceedings for contempt were discontinued.

Verbal return of the Sergeant-at-Arms on presenting a witness under arrest for contempt.

A report of an investigating committee, in the form of a letter to the Speaker, relating to contempt of a witness, was presented as a question of privilege.

On January 9, 1877,[1] the Speaker, as a question of privilege, laid before the House a letter from Hon. William R. Morrison, dated at New Orleans, La., December 29, 1876, in relation to the failure of William Orton to respond to a subpœna duces tecum, in the following terms:

By authority of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States of America.

To JOHN G. THOMPSON, Esq.,

Sergeant-at-Arms, or his special messenger:

You are hereby commanded to summon William Orton, president of the Western Union Telegraph Company, to be and appear before the select committee of the House of Representatives of the United States, of which Hon. William R. Morrison is chairman, to investigate the recent election in Louisiana, and to bring with you all telegrams in your possession or under your control received or sent by William E. Chandler, etc. [names of 12 others given], from and at New Orleans, La., Washington City, D. C., New York City, N. Y., since the 1st day of September last, at their chamber, in the city of New Orleans, La., on 26th day of December, 1876, at the hour of 12 o'clock m., then and there to testify touching matters of inquiry committed to said committee; and he is not to depart without leave of said committee. Herein fail not, and make return of this summons.

Witness my hand and the seal of the House of Representatives of the United States, at the city of Washington, this 18th day of December, 1876.

[SEAL.] SAM. J. RANDALL, Speaker.

Attest:

GEO. M. ADAMS, Clerk.

As a part of the communication of the chairman, were included letters from Mr. Orton to Mr. Morrison and to Mr. Speaker Randall. In these letters the writer called attention to the wording of the subpœna which, by using the word "you" instead of "him," seemed to assume the possession of the telegrams by the Sergeant-at-Arms, and then went on to say that he (Mr. Orton) "had neither personally nor officially any possession of them; that I have never had any control over them except as an agent of the Western Union Telegraph Company, through and by the cooperation of subordinate agents; that the Western Union Telegraph Company has, without any knowledge or anticipation on my part, taken from me all power and control over all messages now in the possession of the company." He therefore asked to be excused. In his letter to Mr. Morrison Mr. Orton alleged ill health also as an excuse for not going to New Orleans.

The communication also gave minutes of the proceedings of the committee, and is signed by the chairman and attested by the clerk of the committee.

The same having been read, Mr. Eppa Hunton, of Virginia, offered a resolution, which was agreed to, yeas 160, nays 31, providing for the arrest of Mr. Orton. This resolution was substantially the same as that agreed to in the case of Mr. Barnes.

On January 15, 1877,[2] the Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House having in custody William Orton, and said: "In obedience to the order of the House, I have arrested and now have at its bar the witness, William Orton."

The Speaker then said:

Mr. Orton, it is the duty of the Chair to ask you what excuse you have to offer for your failure to appear before a committee of this House, sitting at New Orleans, to testify and, further, to produce before said committee, in compliance with the subpœna duces tecum, duly served on you, and dated the 18th of December, 1876?

[2] Journal, pp. 219–226; Record, pp. 629–631.

Mr. Orton thereupon presented an attested statement in writing in which were included copies of letters, dispatches, and other communications which had passed between him and officers and Members of the House, as well as transcripts of the records of his company showing that he had no authority to produce telegrams. He disclaimed an intention of contempt, and asked to be discharged from custody.

Thereupon the communication of Chairman Morrison, the answer of Mr. Orton, and other papers relating to the case were referred to the Judiciary Committee.

On January 17,[1] by unanimous consent, Mr. Hunton submitted this resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be, and he hereby is, authorized and allowed to permit William Orton, a witness now in custody, to return home to New York for consultation with and treatment by his attending physicians, in the company of the Sergeant-at-Arms or his deputy, to return on Friday, the 19th instant, to Washington.

On January 19[2] Mr. Hunton, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report, which was agreed to:

That they find from the proof before them that at the time and since the service of the subpœna upon him the condition of Mr. Orton's health has been such that it would have probably imperiled his life, or at least postponed his recovery, to have made the journey to the city of New Orleans when he was requested to appear, and that for that reason he should not be held in contempt for failing to make his personal appearance at the time and place designated.

It further appears that at the time of the service of the subpœna upon him, and since, Mr. Orton has not had actual possession of the dispatches demanded with the present capacity to produce them so as to bring him within the rule laid down by Lord Ellenborough in Amey v. Long, 9 East, 473, indorsed by the House in the recent matter of E. W. Barnes. They therefore recommend that said Orton be discharged from custody.

1698. In 1877 the House imprisoned members of a State canvassing board for contempt in refusing to obey a subpœna duces tecum for the production of certain papers relating to the election of Presidental electors.

A subject being within the power of the House to investigate, it was held that State officers might not decline to produce records on the plea that they possessed them in their official capacities.

Several persons arraigned at the bar together for contempt made an answer in writing and signed, but not sworn to.

A resolution relating to the place of imprisonment of persons in custody for contempt was admitted as a matter of privilege.

At the end of a Congress the House, by a general order, directed the discharge of all persons in custody for contempt.

On January 16, 1877,[3] Mr. William P. Lynde, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the report of the select committee to investigate the recent election in Louisiana in relation to the contempt and breach of the privileges of the House by J. Madison Wells, Thomas C. Anderson,

G. Casanave, and Louis M. Kenner, in refusing to produce to said committee certain papers mentioned in a subpœna duces tecum duly served upon them, and each of them, submitted a report in writing, accompanied by the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Speaker of this House issue a warrant, under his hand and the seal of the House of Representatives, directing the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House, either by himself or his special deputy, to arrest and bring to the bar of the House without delay J. Madison Wells, etc. [giving names of the others], to answer for a contempt of the authority of this House and a breach of privilege, in refusing to produce to the special committee of which Hon. William R. Morrison is chairman, now sitting in New Orleans, certain papers in obedience to a subpœna duces tecum which was duly served upon them, and to be dealt with as the law under the facts may require.

After debate, and on the succeeding day, the resolution was agreed to, yeas 158, nays 81.

The report, giving reasons for the resolutions, was read from the Clerk's desk by Mr. Lynde.[1] The report began by stating that the gentlemen named in the resolution—claiming to be the returning board of canvassers for said State, have refused to obey a subpœna duces tecum, duly issued and served upon them, commanding them to appear before the committee now sitting in New Orleans and bring with them "all returns of elections, all consolidated statements of supervisors of elections, all statements of votes, and tally sheets for each polling place at the late election for electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, together with all affidavits, depositions, protests, and other written proofs in their possession or under their control, touching the said election in certain parishes," naming them

The witnesses refusing to obey the subpœna have sent a written communication to the investigating committee, claiming that these papers are "a part of the records of the returning officers of elections for the State of Louisiana and are in the possession of the returning officers in their official capacity;" and submit that "the board of returning officers of elections for Louisiana is a body created by the laws of Louisiana, with specific and well-defined duties, partly ministerial and partly quasi-judicial; that their action under the law of their creation is final to the extent provided by the law, and is not subject to review by any State or national tribunal."

Your committee do not feel called upon at this time to express an opinion upon the question as to whether "the action of the returning officers is subject to review by any State or national tribunal,"

The Constitution of the United States, Article II, section 1, provides that "each State shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress."

The committee claimed for Congress the right to inquire whether the persons claiming to be electors had been properly chosen, and that the power to legislate on this subject rested in Congress alone. Charges of fraud had been made against this returning board, and the witnesses were subpœnaed to appear and testify in regard to the charges.

Your committee [continues the report] are of the opinion that these charges are within the power and duty of the House to investigate, and that the returning officers, either in their individual or official capacity, can not conceal fraudulent acts or violations of law in the appointment of electors * * * under the claim that in perpetrating the fraud or violating the law they were acting in an official capacity as State officers. Courts sometimes excuse public officers from producing papers in their possession and custody upon the ground of public convenience, and substitute secondary evidence or copies of such papers for the original. But it is a rule adopted for public convenience and is never applied when the original is necessary, as in a case of forgery or perjury, or when the original alone can answer the purpose and object of the investigation. * * * It is true that courts do not require public officers to disclose secrets of state, but here are no state secrets; these papers * * * are public in their character, and every American citizen is interested in them. Your committee do not recognize the rights of any citizen or officer, whther Federal or State, to defeat an investigation of either House which may involve the existence of the Government by refusing to appear and testify. If a State officer can be compelled to appear before a committee of this House appointed to investigate a question involving the existence of the Government, then it is for the House to determine when the power shall be exercised.

Therefore the committee reported the resolution. This was debated at length, it being urged in opposition that the appointment of electors was a State function, and that to inquire into it was an invasion of State sovereignty. The records of a State might not be thus taken by authority of Congress. The positions of Presidents Jefferson and Jackson as to production of papers were cited[1] in this connection. At the close of the debate the resolution was adopted, as stated above.

On January 27, 1877,[2] the Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House having in custody the bodies of those specified in the resolution of arrest.

Thereupon the following interrogatory was propounded to the said Wells, Anderson, Casanave, and Kenner:

It is the duty of the Chair to ask you what excuse you have to offer for your failure to appear before a committee of this House, sitting in the city of New Orleans, La., on the 12th day of December, 1876, and to produce before the said committee certain books and papers called for in the subpœna duces tecum duly served upon you.

To which the said Wells, Anderson, Casanave, and Kenner being severally interrogated severally replied that they desired time for consultation, and requested that they be allowed until Monday or Tuesday next at 1 o'clock to make reply to said interrogatory.

Thereupon Mr. Lynde, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported the following resolutions:

Resolved, That J. Madison Wells, Thomas C. Anderson, G. Casanave, and Louis M. Kenner be, and are hereby, adjudged to be in contempt for a violation of the privileges of this House.

Resolved, That J. Madison Wells, etc., [names given] be, and are hereby, ordered to appear before the special committee appointed to investigate the recent election in Louisiana, of which Hon. William R. Morrison is chairman, and produce all consolidated returns of supervisors of election, all statements of votes and tally sheets for each polling place in the late election for electors of President and Vice-President, together with all affidavits, depositions, protests, and other written proofs in their possession or under their control on the 11th day of December, 1876, touching the said election in the parishes of East Baton Rouge, etc. [here follows enumeration of parishes], and that said witnesses be remanded to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and be by him closely kept until the further order of this House.

Pending action on these resolutions, by unanimous consent on motion of Mr. John Hancock, of Texas, the respondents were allowed thirty minutes for consultation, before replying to the said interrogatory.

The House thereupon proceeded to other business, and after a time the Sergeant-at-Arms again appeared at the bar of the House having in custody the bodies of the said Wells, Anderson, Casanave, and Kenner.

By unanimous consent leave was granted them to make reply to the said interrogatory in writing, to be read from the Clerk's desk. This reply[3] cited the laws of Louisiana relating to the functions of the returning board; claimed that public records and documents of the government were not to be wrested by subpœna from sworn custody; claimed also that they should be proven by examination and exemplified copies; asserted that the investigating committee were tendered full, ample, and complete inspection of the papers in question; asserted that to have surrendered the documents on December 12, 1876, would have involved a violation of the sworn duties of the respondents; and finally declared that on January 5, 1877, under the terms of law, the papers demanded by the subpœna had been deposited with the secretary of state of Louisiana.

This reply was signed by the respondents; but Mr. Lynde raised the point that it was not sworn to. The Speaker [1] said that the practice of the House had varied, but of late it had tended in the direction of requiring the oath.

Mr. Lynde, however, waived this point.

The reply having been read, the House then agreed to the two resolutions under the operation of the previous question, the first being agreed to yeas 145, nays 87, and the second, yeas 137, nays 77.

On February 8 [2] Mr. Eugene Hale, of Maine, proposed as a question of privilege a resolution directing the Sergeant-at-Arms to remove Messrs. Wells and Anderson, "now confined in this Capitol, to a place more suitable" and where the health of the witnesses might not be endangered. The Chair decided the matter to be privileged.[3] The resolution was, on motion of Mr. S. S. Cox, of New York, referred to the select committee on the late election in Lousiana with instructions to investigate and report.

On March 2,[4] three attempts were made to suspend the rules so as to consider and pass a resolution discharging Messrs. Wells, Anderson, Casanave, and Kenner from custody; but each time there was failure to get a two-thirds vote in favor of the resolutions.

On March 2,[5] (calendar day of March 3) Mr. J. Randolph Tucker, of Virginia, by unanimous consent submitted the following preamble and resolution, which were considered and agreed to:

Whereas all the investigations which have been directed by this House have been virtually closed, and no more testimony can be taken by reason of the near adjournment of the House, and the further imprisonment of witnesses in contempt of the authority of this House can not conduce to the truth sought by said investigations: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to discharge this day all persons held by him under order of this House for contempt of its authority.

1699. For declining to testify or to obey a subpœna duces tecum commanding him to produce certain papers to be used in impeachment proceedings against himself George F. Seward was arraigned for contempt.

After consideration a committee concluded that an official threatened with impeachment was not in contempt for declining to be sworn as a witness or to produce documentary evidence.

A person before a committee declining to give evidence, the committee tendered him oaths as a witness, which he refused.

Being arraigned for contempt, George F. Seward presented a written statement signed by himself and counsel, but not attested, and this answer appears in full in the Journal.

Form of a subpœna duces tecum issued by order of the House.

On February 22, 1879,[1] Mr. William M. Springer, of Illinois, from the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, submitted a report in regard to the alleged contumacy of George F. Seward. The report set forth that the committee had been empowered by resolution of the House to investigate the business of the State Department, past and present, with power to send for persons and papers; that there had been referred to the committee a memorial preferring charges of misconduct in office against George F. Seward, late consul-general at Shanghai, China, and at this time minister to China. The committee having failed to obtain certain books and papers, the following subpœna duces tecum was issued on February 19:

By authority of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States of America.

To JOHN G. THOMPSON, Esq.,
Sergeant-at-Arms, or his special messenger:

You are hereby commanded to summon George F. Seward to be and appear before the Expenditures of State Department Committee of the House of Representatives of the United States, of which Hon. William M. Springer is chairman, and the said George F. Seward is hereby commanded and required to diligently search for and bring with him and produce before said committee all blotters, rough books, cashbooks, journals, and ledgers kept and used in the office of the consul-general at Shanghai, China, during his (said Seward's) incumbency of the office of consul-general at Shanghai, including any that may have been taken by him (said Seward) to Peking, China, in their chamber, in the city of Washington, on the 20th day of February, 1879, at the hour of 10 o'clock in the forenoon, then and there to testify touching matters of inquiry committed to said committee; and he is not to depart without leave of said committee.

Herein fail not, and make return of this summons.

Witness my hand and the seal of the House of Representatives of the United States, at the city of Washington, this 19th day of February, 1879.

[L. S.] SAM J RANDALL, Speaker.

GEORGE M. ADAMS, Clerk.

The report goes on to state that Mr. Seward appeared before the committee on February 20 and answered the inquiry of the committee as to his readiness to produce the books, by an argument of his counsel as to the authority of the House to compel their production. The committee thereupon adopted a series of resolutions reciting that the books in question were public and not private; that they were necessary to the inquiry; that said Seward had possession of the books and illegally deprived the committee of their use, etc., and, finally, that, should he fail to produce them, the chairman of the committee should tender to him the following qualified oath:

You do swear that you will true answer make to such questions as may be put to you touching the possession, custody, and whereabouts of the books called for by the subpœna duces tecum served upon you?

And, further, it was resolved that the chairman should tender to him the general oath, as follows:

You do solemnly swear that the evidence you will give touching the matters of inquiry committed to this committee and the answers you will give to the questions propounded to you by or on behalf of this committee touching such matters shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, so help you God?

These oaths being successively tendered to the witness, he stood mute in each case. Then his counsel presented an argument that the said George F. Seward was protected by the constitutional guaranty that "no person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself." The answer, therefore, denied the efficacy of the subpœna, and also protested that the said Seward had not been heard by counsel or otherwise on the matters of fact set forth by the committee in regard to the books and papers in question, and denied that any books, public in the light of the law, had been wrongfully withheld.

The committee, after referring to the law in regard to witnesses summoned before committees, proceeded with an argument to show that an investigation before a Congressional committee is not a criminal case within the meaning of the Constitution. Mr. Seward was not a "party," instead of a witness, simply because counsel and testimony had been heard for and against him. The committee were investigating, but not trying him.

Therefore the committee recommended the following:

Ordered, That the Speaker issue his warrant, directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms attending this House, or his deputy, commanding him to take into custody forthwith, wherever to be found, the body of George F. Seward and him bring to the bar of the House, to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt; and in the meantime keep the said George F. Seward in his custody to abide the further order of the House.

This report was signed by Messrs. Springer; Benjamin Dean, of Massachusetts; Stephen L. Mayham, of New York, and Thomas Turner, of Kentucky.

The minority of the committee, Messrs. Solomon Bundy, of New York, Thomas M. Bayne, of Pennsylvania, and Mark H. Dunnell, of Minnesota, submitted views, arguing at length to show that the inquiry was a criminal case within the meaning of the Constitution, and also arguing that the books required were not, as the committee report held, public archives such as a consul was required by law or regulation to keep, but were private books such as he should not be required to produce. The minority therefore proposed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the reasons given by Hon. George F. Seward, through his counsel, to the committee are legally sufficient to excuse his failure to produce the books described in the subpœna duces tecum, and his standing mute when tendered the oaths required by the resolutions of the committee, adopted by a majority of this committee, and his conduct in the premises are not contumacious, but are excusable by the Constitution and laws of the United States and the acts of Congress pertaining thereto.

Resolved, That the Speaker should not issue his warrant directing the Sergeant-at-Arms to take into custody the body of George F. Seward, to the end that he be brought to the bar of the House to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt.

The question being taken first on the resolutions of the minority, they were disagreed to—yeas 119, nays 142.

The order proposed by the committee was then agreed to—ayes 105, noes 47.

In the course of the debate on the above report reference was made to the refusal of President Jackson, in 1837, to give to a committee information on which impeachment proceedings might be founded.

On February 28[1] the Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House having in custody the body of George F. Seward; whereupon the said Seward was arraigned and the following interrogatory propounded to him by the Speaker:

Mr. Seward, you are presented at the bar of the House, upon the order of the House, under arrest on an alleged breach of the privileges of the House, in refusing to answer certain questions propounded to you by a committee of the House, which questions that committee was authorized by the House to ask, and for standing mute when tendered an oath as a witness, and for failing to produce certain books as required by a subpœna duces tecum duly served on you. It is my duty now, by authority of the House, to ask whether you are ready to take the oath tendered to you by the chairman of the committee, to answer the questions propounded to you by the committee, and to produce the books as required by the subpœna duces tecum served on you.

The said George F. Seward, in response, presented a written statement, signed by himself and counsel, but not attested under oath. This statement appears in full in the Journal.

The statement contends that the committee were making the investigation with a view to his impeachment, and that the subpœna was void and inoperative because of the constitutional guaranty. This guaranty applied to legislative bodies, as was shown by the case Ex parte Emery (107 Mass.), wherein it was shown that an inquiry before a legislative body should not be inquisitorial, and that in this country the parliamentary usage was subordinated to constitutional provision, although in England Parliament may have been above the common law. The statement then presents the argument made by the minority of the committee as to the nature of the books demanded.

The answer having been read, Mr. Springer submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That George F. Seward, having been heard by the House, pursuant to the order heretofore made requiring him to show cause why he should not respond to the subpœna duces tecum by obeying the same so far as the same requires the production of the books described in the subpœna duces tecum, be, and is therefore, considered in contempt of the House because of his failure to produce said books.

Mr. Bundy, in behalf of the minority of the committee, submitted the following as an amendment in the nature of a substitute:

Resolved, That the answer of George F. Seward in response to the order voted by the House and issued by the Speaker, requiring him to show cause why he should not be declared in contempt, and all evidence and papers pertaining thereto, together with the reports of the committee, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report as early as practicable what action in their judgment should be taken by the House in relation thereto.

On agreeing to the substitute there were yeas 112, nays 108.

The resolution as amended was then agreed to.

It was then,

Ordered, That Mr. Seward be discharged on his own personal recognizance to appear again upon notice.

[1] Journal, pp. 567-577; Record, pp. 2138-2144.

Subsequently, on March 1,[1] the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department reported articles of impeachment against Seward. On March 3, the last day of the session and of the Congress, an attempt to bring this report to a vote brought on a discussion as to the propriety of proceeding by impeachment against a man under arrest for contempt. The articles were not voted on.

Discussion distinguishing a case of impeachment from the ordinary investigation for legislative purposes.

Discussion of the right of the House to demand papers of a public officer.

Discussion of the use of the subpœna duces tecum in procuring papers from public officers.

On March 3[2] Mr. Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts, reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, the report in the last hours of the session being ordered to be printed and laid on the table. This report [3] held:

The facts necessary to raise the question succinctly state themselves in this way: By resolution of the House the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department were in charge of the investigation of the official conduct of George F. Seward, late consul-general of the United States in China, and now minister resident there. Mr. Seward came before the committee—appeared by counsel; charges were filed against him for sundry malfeasances in office, looking to his impeachment if proven, and evidence was taken to sustain such charges. The committee deem it important that they should have before them certain books kept by him while such consul-general, and which, it was claimed, showed entries tending to substantiate the accusations. There was evidence before the committee tending to show that those books were the public records of the consulate and the property of the United States. Mr. Seward claimed that they were books in which he kept his governmental and his private transactions for his personal use, and that he had returned to the State Department or left in the consulate all the books of the United States. The committee procured a subpœna duces tecum directed to him, which was served on Mr. Seward, commanding him to produce these books for the purpose of being used in evidence against him. Mr. Seward appeared in obedience to the subpœna, but declined to be sworn as a witness in a case where crime was alleged against him and where articles of impeachment might be found against him, claiming through his counsel his constitutional privilege of not being obliged to produce evidence in a criminal case tending to criminate himself.

Upon this refusal the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department brought Mr. Seward before the House to show cause at its bar why he should not be sworn as a witness, and why he should not obey the order of the House, through its subpœna, to produce the documentary evidence called for.

Mr. Seward, when before the House, in answer to the question of the Speaker, set up practically the same claim that he did before the committee. Upon a resolution proposed by the minority of such committee, the question was referred by a vote of the House to its Judiciary Committee as to whether the cause shown by Mr. Seward for not obeying the subpœna of the House and declining to be sworn as a witness was a sufficient answer.

Investigations looking to the impeachment of public officers have always been finally examined before the Judiciary Committee of the House, so far as we are instructed, and it is believed that the case can not be found as a precedent where the party charged has ever been called upon and compelled to give evidence in such case. We distinguish this case from the case of an ordinary investigation for legislative purposes, where all parties are called upon to give such evidence (oral or written) as may tend to throw light upon the subject of investigation, but even in those cases it was early held that a person called as a witness, and not a party charged before the committee, was not bound to criminate himself, and a statute familiar to the House for the protection of witnesses under such circumstances, from having the evidence given used against them, was passed.

[3] House Report 141, third session Forty-fifth Congress.

In making an investigation of the facts charged against an officer of the United States looking to impeachment, the House acts as the grand inquest of the nation to present that officer for trial before the highest court known to our Constitution, the Senate of the United States, for such punishment as may be constitutionally imposed upon him, which is very severe in its penalties, and even then does not exonerate the party from further prosecution before the proper courts for offenses against the laws.

If these books of Mr. Seward's are his private books, kept for his personal use, or whether they contain records of his action as a public officer intermixed or otherwise with his private transactions, it is believed he can not be compelled to produce them. A public officer may well keep a duplicate set of records of his transactions as such for his own use and protection, and he may, at his will, mingle therewith his own private transactions, and as a party to a contestation between the United States and himself, looking to his trial and punishment for alleged criminal transactions, he can not be compelled to produce such books nor answer concerning them, but he is protected by the constitutional provision (which is, after all, only a translation of a clause of Magna Charta), and which is a distinguishing characteristic of criminal procedure at common law in England, as opposed to criminal procedure by the civil law in other European States. Even if he had possessed himself of public records which contained evidence to accuse him of crime in such a contestation (which makes a criminal case), it seems to your committee the question would be more than doubtful whether he could be called upon to produce such books.

A subpœna duces tecum is not the remedy of the Government. If he has embezzled or stolen the books, he may be proceeded against criminally therefor. If he refuses to produce them to his superior officer, who has a right to call for them if public books, then they may be got out of his hands by a writ of replevin or other proper process.

If the question in whom is the title to these books would be the test as to the question whether the accused himself were obliged to produce them as evidence against himself, then a question would at the outset arise, How is title to be tried? If the books are private, they are not to be produced. Can a man's title to his private property be tried and decided against him collaterally so as to deprive the accused of his rights? Your committee believe that it can not.

If, as the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department believe, these are public books, then it seems very queer to your committee that that committee have mistaken the proper procedure in a court of justice. Their subpœna duces tecum should be issued to the highest executive officer having charge, custody, and control of such public records. Since the case of Burr where a subpœna duces tecum was demanded of the court by the defendant against Thomas Jefferson, then President of the United States, and the right to have such writ issued was determined by the Chief Justice—to have a certain letter, known as "the Wilkinson letter," then on the files of the State Department produced, the usual course has been for a committee of Congress to direct a letter to the head of the proper Department, or the House, by resolution, to call upon the proper executive officer to produce the same, leaving that officer to get possession of the books from his subordinate by any lawful means. But it may be asked, Can not the House direct a subpœna to any executive officer of the Department to produce any books actually in his possession in the course of official duty, and bring them before the House for the purpose of information or to aid an inquiry? Certainly that can be done, and, in proper cases, ought to be done; but, in contemplation of law, under our theory of government, all records of the Executive Departments are under the control of the President of the United States; and although the House sometimes sends resolutions to a head of a Department to produce such books or papers, yet it is conceived that in any doubtful case no head of Department would bring before a committee of the House any of the records of the Department without permission of, or consultation with, his superior, the President of the United States; and all resolutions directed to the President of the United States to produce papers within the control of the Executive, if properly drawn, contain a clause, "if in his judgment not inconsistent with the public interest." And whenever the President has returned (as sometimes he has) that, in his judgment it was not consistent with the public interest to give the House such information, no further proceedings have ever been taken to compel the production of such information. Indeed, upon principle, it would seem that this must be so. The Executive is as independent of either House of Congress as either House of Congress is independent of him, and they can not call for the records of his action or the action of his officers against his consent, any more than he can call for any of the journals or records of the House or Senate.

The highest exercise of this power of calling for documents perhaps would be in the course of justice by the courts of the United States, and the House would not for a moment permit its journals to be taken from its possession by one of its assistant clerks and carried into a court in obedience to a subpœna duly issued by the court.

The mischief of the House calling for documents might easily be a very great one. Suppose the President is engaged in a negotiation with a foreign government, one of the most delicate character upon which peace or war may depend, and which it is vitally necessary to keep secret; must he, at the call of the House, or of any committee of the House, spread upon its records such state secrets to the detriment of the country? Somebody must judge upon this point. It clearly can not be the House or its committee, because they can not know the importance of having the doings of the Executive Department kept secret. The head of the Executive Department therefore must be the judge in such cases and decide upon his own responsibility to the people and to the House, upon a case of impeachment brought against him for so doing, if his acts are causeless, malicious, willfully wrong, or to the detriment of the public interest.

Your committee regret that it has been impossible for the House to furnish them sufficient time in which this grave question might be more satisfactorily and exhaustively examined; but viewing it with the best light in which we find it, we are constrained to the conclusion at which we have arrived.

Therefore, your committee report to the House that, in their opinion, George F. Seward has shown sufficient cause why he should not be sworn as a witness in the investigation of charges looking to his impeachment by the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, and why he should not produce the books, whether they are private books solely, or, for the reason above stated, are public books, in which criminatory matter may be contained; and therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That, under the facts and circumstances reported from the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, George F. Seward was not in contempt of the authority of this House in refusing to be sworn as a witness or produce before said committee the books mentioned in the subpœna duces tecum.

1701. In 1891 a witness in contempt for refusing to testify before a committee was arrested and arraigned, and after purging himself of the contempt was discharged.

In the latest practice a committee in reporting the contempt of a witness shows that the testimony required is material and presents copies of the subpœna and return.

A subpœna having been served by a deputy Sergeant-at-Arms, a certificate of his appointment should accompany a report requesting arrest of the witness for contempt.

It was not thought necessary that mileage and fees should be tendered a witness before arresting him for contempt in declining to answer.

In ordering the arrest of a witness for contempt, the House embodied in a preamble the report of the committee showing the alleged contempt.

A witness arraigned for contempt answered orally and without being sworn.

A witness having promised when arraigned to testify before a committee, the House gave him permission to do so, but did not discharge him from custody until the committee reported that he had purged himself.

On January 29, 1891,[1] Mr. Nelson Dingley, of Maine, from the select committee appointed to investigate the alleged "silver pool," submitted a report, setting forth that J. A. Owenby had been duly subpœnaed to appear before the committee, that service was duly made on him, but that he had refused or neglected to obey the sub-pœna.[1] The report goes on to show that the said Owenby was a material witness, inasmuch as the correspondent of the paper making the charges against Members of the House in connection with the alleged pool had in his testimony stated that Owenby was the authority for what he had stated, and claimed to have personal knowledge of the facts alleged. The report also was accompanied by copies of the subpœna, the return of the deputy sergeant-at arms, and certificate of his appointment.

Having submitted the report, Mr. Dingley offered the following:

Ordered, That the Speaker issue his warrant directing the Sergeant-at-Arms attending this House or his deputy, commanding him to take into custody forthwith, wherever to be found, the body of J. A. Owenby, and bring him to the bar of the House, to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt; and in the meantime keep the said J. A. Owenby in his custody to await the further order of the House.

Mr. Dingley stated that this proceeding was proposed in accordance with the uniform precedents of the House. In the debate that followed it was asked whether the mileage and fees had been tendered to the witness; but Mr. Dingley replied that after consideration the committee had thought this unnecessary. The headnotes of the decision in the case of Kilbourn v. Thompson were read during the debate. After the debate Mr. Dingley modified his resolution by prefixing thereto the following:

Whereas the special committee appointed by the House to investigate alleged silver pools presented the following report, to wit: (Here followed the report in full).

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

On February 2,[2] the Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House having in custody the body of J. A. Owenby, and addressing the Speaker announced that fact.

The said Owenby was thereupon arraigned and the following interrogatory propounded to him by the Speaker:

Mr. Owenby, you have been arrested for contempt of the House in disobeying its summons. What have you to say in excuse therefor?

The said Owenby having made a statement to the House, orally and not under oath, the Speaker thereupon propounded the following interrogatory to the said Owenby:

Are you now ready to appear before the committee?

[1] The resolution authorizing this investigation was agreed to on January 12, 1891 (second session Fifty-first Congress, Journal, p. 121), as follows:

Resolved, That the Speaker appoint a special committee of five Members of the House, and that such committee be instructed to inquire into all the facts and circumstances connected with silver pools in which Senators and Representatives were alleged to be interested; also with the said alleged purchase and sale of silver prior to and since the passage of the act of July 14, 1890, including the names of persons selling the same; and also who are the owners of the twelve millions of silver bullion which the United States is now asked to purchase. And for such purposes it shall have power to send for persons and papers and administer oaths, and shall also have the right to report at any time. The expenses of said inquiry shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House upon vouchers approved by the chairman of said committee, to be immediately available.

To which interrogatory the said Owenby replied that he was now ready to appear before said committee.

Thereupon Mr. Dingley submitted the following preamble and resolution, which was agreed to:

Whereas J. A. Owenby has been heard by the House pursuant to the order made on the 29th day of January, 1891, requiring him to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt for refusing or neglecting to respond to the subpœna named in said order by obeying the same, and has stated to the House that, in purging himself of the contempt for which he is in custody, he is now willing to obey said subpœna: Therefore,

Resolved, That the said J. A. Owenby shall have the privilege to appear forthwith before the special committee of the House to investigate alleged silver pools, etc., and testify touching matters of inquiry before said committee; and that in the meantime the said J. A. Owenby remain in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms under said order until the further order of the House.

On February 4, Mr. Dingley, as a privileged question, reported the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That J. A. Owenby, having been heard by the House pursuant to the order requiring him to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt for refusing or neglecting to respond to the subpœna commanding him to appear before the special committee to investigate alleged silver pools, and, in purging himself of the contempt for which he is in custody, has appeared and testified before said committee, is hereby discharged from the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

1702. In 1880 three recusant witnesses were arraigned at the bar of the Senate, and having purged themselves of contempt were discharged.

Should the Sergeant-at-Arms make the return on a subpœna served by his deputy?

On June 20, 1879,[1] in the Senate, Mr. Eli Saulsbury, of Delaware, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, reported the following resolution for consideration; which was ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to which has been referred memorials in relation to the election of Hon. J. J. Ingalls a Senator by the legislature of the State of Kansas, be, and said committee is hereby, authorized and instructed to investigate the statements and charges contained in said memorials; and for that purpose said committee is empowered to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, employ a stenographer, clerk, and sergeant-at-arms, and to do all such acts as are necessary and proper in the premises. And said committee may appoint a subcommittee of its members to take testimony in Kansas or elsewhere in the case, which shall report the testimony taken to the committee in December next; and such subcommittee shall have the same authority to administer oaths and to do other necessary acts as are herein conferred upon the full committee; and the said committee, and the subcommittee which it may appoint, may sit during the recess of the Senate for the purpose of making the investigation hereby authorized.

This resolution was agreed to on June 21.

On December 18, 1879, Mr. Saulsbury, from the Committee on Privileges and

Elections, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Whereas J. V. Admire, E. B. Purcell, George T. Anthony, Len. T. Smith, and Levi Wilson, citizens and residents of the State of Kansas, were duly served with subpœnas in the months of September and October, 1879, issued by the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections, then sitting in Topeka, in said State of Kansas, commanding each of them to appear before said subcommittee and then and there testify in reference to the subject-matters then under consideration by said subcommittee, to wit, charges relating to the election of John J. Ingalls a Senator from said State of Kansas; and

Whereas said Admire, Purcell, Anthony, Smith, and Wilson refused to appear and testify before said subcommittee as required by said subpœnas: Therefore,

Resolved, That an attachment issue forthwith directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate commanding him to bring said J. V. Admire, E. B. Purcell, George T. Anthony, Len. T. Smith, and Levi Wilson forthwith to the bar of the Senate to answer for contempt of a process of this body.

On January 8, 1880,[1] the Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the Senate having in custody Leonard T. Smith, Levi Wilson, and E. B. Purcell, arrested by order of the Senate and brought to its bar to answer for a contempt of a process of the Senate.

Whereupon the Vice-President laid before the Senate the return of the writ of attachment issued to the Sergeant-at-Arms commanding him to bring J. V. Admire, George T. Anthony, Leonard T. Smith, Levi Wilson, and E. B. Purcell to answer for a contempt of a process of the Senate.

The return having been made, Leonard T. Smith, one of the witnesses, advanced and made statement of his reasons for failure to answer to the summons of the Senate and stated that he was ready and willing to go before the committee and testify.

In treatment of the witness's case questions arose which caused the reading, both of the original subpœna and return, and the writ of attachment, with the return thereon.

The subpœna and return thereon were in form as follows:

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

Congress of the United States:

To George T. Anthony, Charles H. Miller, Levi Wilson, Len. T. Smith, greeting:

Pursuant to lawful authority you are hereby commanded to appear before the subcommittee of the Committee on Privileges and Elections forthwith at their committee room at the court room, Topeka, Kansas, then and there to testify what you may know relative to the subject-matters under consideration by said committee.

Hereof fail not, as you will answer your default under the pains and penalties in such cases made and provided.

Given under my hand, by order of the committee, this 4th day of October, in the year of our Lord 1879.

ELI SAULSBURY,
Chairman Committee.

To RICHARD J. BRIGHT,
Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate of the United States

[Indorsement]

SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
OFFICE OF THE SERGEANT-AT-ARMS.

I do appoint and hereby empower J. S. Collins to serve this subpœna, and to exercise all the authority in relation thereto with which I am vested by the within order.

R. J. BRIGHT,
Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate of the United States.

[1] Second session Forty-sixth Congress, Record, pp. 234–241.

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 6, 1879.

I made service of the within subpœna, through my deputy, J. S. Collins, by reading the same to the within-named Len. T. Smith, at his house at Leavenworth, Kans., at 6.05 o'clock, a. m., and on Charles H. Miller, at his residence in Leavenworth, Kans., at 6.20 o'clock on George T. Anthony, at his residence in Leavenworth, Kans., at 7 o'clock a. m., and on Levi Wilson, at 820 o'clock a. m. in Leavenworth, Kans., on this 6th day of October, 1879.

R. J. BRIGHT,
Sergeant-at-Arms, Senate of the United States.

The writ of attachment, with the return thereon, was read as follows:

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, ss:

The Senate of the United States of America to Richard J. Bright, esq., Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate of the United States, greeting.

By virtue of a resolution of the Senate of the United States, passed on the 18th day of December, 1879, in the following words, to wit.

Here follows the preamble and resolution in full.]

You are hereby commanded to arrest forthwith J. V. Admire, E. B. Purcell, George T. Anthony, Len. T. Smith, and Levi Wilson, wheresoever they may be found, and have their bodies at the bar of the Senate to answer for a contempt of the authority of the subcommittee of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, one of the standing committees of the Senate, and also for a contempt of the authority of the Senate of the United States in refusing to obey an order of the subcommittee of the Committee on Privileges and Elections to appear before the said subcommittee after being duly summoned thereto; and this shall be your warrant for so doing.

Hereof fail not, and make return of this warrant, with your proceedings thereon indorsed, on or before the 8th day of January, A. D. 1880.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of the Senate of the United States the 19th day of December, in the year of our Lord 1879, and of the Independence of the United States of America the one hundred and fourth.

[SEAL.]

W. A. WHEELER,
Vice-President of the United States and President of the Senate.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 8, 1880.

In obedience to the within warrant I have arrested and taken into custody Leonard T. Smith, Levi Wilson, and E. B. Purcell, and now produce them at the bar of the Senate.

Respectfully,

R. J. BRIGHT,
Sergeant-at-Arms United States Senate.

Hon. WILLIAM A. WHEELER,
President of the Senate.

The statement of the witness as to his failure to comply with the commands of the committee being satisfactory, Mr. Samuel J. R. McMillan, of Minnesota, moved that the witness be discharged.

A question thereupon arose as to the legality of the arrest of the witness. Mr. George F. Hoar, of Massachusetts, took the ground that the Sergeant-at-Arms might not lawfully delegate the duty of serving the subpœna, and in support of this view cited the Massachusetts decision (15 Gray, 399) wherein it was held that a warrant issued by order of the Senate of the United States for the arrest of a witness in contempt could not be served by a deputy.

Mr. Benjamin H. Hill, of Georgia, called attention to the fact that the decision just cited referred to a warrant for arrest and not to a supœna. The Committee on Privileges and Elections had drawn this distinction, and when the warrant was drawn they ordered it to be served by the Sergeant-at-Arms himself, giving him orders not to serve it by deputy. But he conceived that it would be an absurd thing to hold that a subpœna might not be served by a deputy.

Mr. Hoar further objected that the officer who made the service should be the one to make the return.

Mr. Hill conceived this to be a technicality. Mr. David Davis, of Illinois, also held generally that, as the witness had acknowledged that he had been subpœnaed, too strict technical rules should not be insisted on.

On motion of Mr. Augustus H. Garland, of Arkansas, the pending motion was amended by the words:

That the witness, having purged himself of contempt, be discharged.

Mr. Saulsbury offered the following as a substitute:

Whereas Leonard T. Smith, now in custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms on an attachment for contempt for refusing obedience to a summons to appear before a committee of the Senate, has purged himself of contempt, and expressed his willingness to appear before the Committee on Privileges and Elections and answer such proper questions as may be put to him: Therefore,

Resolved, That said Leonard T. Smith be discharged from arrest and that he appear before said Committee on Privileges and Elections and testify under the subpœna served upon him.

Mr. Garland objected that the preamble was unnecessary, and that as the witness had purged himself it only remained to discharge him. He must be discharged absolutely and not on conditions. The Senate could not anticipate a further contempt.

The amendment of Mr. Saulsbury was disagreed to. Then the motion of Mr. McMillan as amended by Mr. Garland was agreed to.

The Vice-President[1] then said:

The witness at the bar is discharged from the rule of attachment.

Levi Wilson, another of the witnesses, having made statement of his reasons for failure to answer the summons of the Senate, on motion by Mr. Saulsbury that the witness be discharged from the rule, it was determined in the affirmative.

E. B. Purcell, another of the witnesses, having made statement of his reasons for failure to answer to the summons of the Senate, on motion by Mr. Saulsbury that the witness be discharged from the rule, it was determined in the affirmative.

On motion by Mr. Saulsbury—

Ordered, That the Sergeant-at-Arms have further time to make return concerning the failure of J. V. Admire and George T. Anthony, the other witnesses named in the writ of attachment of December 18, 1879, to answer for a contempt of a process of the Senate.

On January 20, 1880,[2] the Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the Senate, having in custody J. V. Admire, to answer for contempt in refusing obedience to a summons of the Senate.

Whereupon the Vice-President laid before the Senate the return of the writ of attachment issued to the Sergeant-at-Arms December 18, 1879, commanding him to bring J. V. Admire, G. T. Anthony, L. T. Smith, Levi Wilson, and E. B. Purcell to answer for a contempt of a process of the Senate.

The return was read.

[2] Record, p. 415.

The witness having made statement of his reasons for failure to answer to the summons of the Senate, on motion by Mr. Saulsbury that the witness be discharged from the rule, it was determined in the affirmative.

On motion by Mr. Saulsbury—

Ordered, That George T. Anthony, the other witness named in the writ of attachment of December 18, 1879, be discharged as from contempt without appearing before the Senate.

It was stated that Mr. Anthony had been before the committee, and would return to Washington and come before the Senate if necessary.

1703. Various instances of arrest of witnesses for contempt of the Senate.—On January 8, 9, and 11, 1877,[1] the Senate took proceedings in relation to Enos Runyon, a witness who declined to answer certain questions deemed pertinent by the Senate in regard to the transmission of money to Oregon at the time of the election. The Senate ordered the arrest of Runyon, but afterwards ordered his discharge on report from the committee that he had appeared and answered the questions. He evidently was not arraigned before the Senate.

1704. On February 5, 1877,[2] the Senate ordered the arrest of J. F. Littlefield, a witness who had failed to appear, although seen in the Capitol about the time he should have appeared and was told by an officer of the Senate that he was expected to appear. The witness had appeared before the committee the day before and had not been discharged. Some objection was made to ordering an arrest under these circumstances, but it was done.

1705. On February 13, 1877,[3] the Senate ordered the arrest of Conrad N. Jordan for refusing to respond to a subpœna duces tecum commanding him to appear before a committee of the Senate and bring certain papers. On the 23d he was brought before the Senate and arraigned. Previously he had been allowed to appear before the committee and testify. When arraigned he made a statement in writing, explaining why he had failed to respond to the subpœna. A proposition was made to direct the matter to be certified to the district attorney, but the point was made and insisted on that the witness should first have the opportunity of appearing before the committee. It was urged that the arrest had been merely for failing to appear, and not for refusal to testify. Finally, the witness having announced that he was ready to go before the committee and answer proper questions, the Senate ordered his discharge.

1706. On January 20, 1880,[4] the Senate allowed the discharge of a recusant witness against whom had been issued a warrant for arrest for contempt, but who had voluntarily appeared and testified before the committee at a time when the Senate had not been in session. The witness had then departed, leaving the promise that he would appear in person before the Senate to answer the attachment if required. The Senate did not require this, but ordered his discharge.

1707. Instances wherein the House has ordered arrests which do not appear to have been made.—On June 8, 1860,[1] the following resolution was reported from the select committee appointed to investigate the alleged influence of the Executive in the House, and was agreed to by the House:

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House of Representatives be directed to issue process for the arrest of Charles A. Dunham, of New York; Alexander Hay, Gideon G. Wescott, and Albert Schofield, of the city of Philadelphia; William Kearns, of Reading, in the State of Pennsylvania.

1708. On June 27, 1862,[2] the House ordered the arrest of Michael C. Murphy, a recusant witness, but it does not appear that the witness was arrested.

1709. On April 15, 1864,[3] the House ordered the arrest of John Donahue, a witness who had been summoned and who had failed to appear before the Committee on Public Expenditures. It does not appear that the arrest was effected.

1710. On January 14, 1867,[4] the House ordered the arrest of Thomas H. Oakley, who had declined to testify before the Committee on Public Expenditures. It does not appear that Oakley was ever brought before the House.

1711. On June 30, 1876,[5] the House ordered the arrest of William F. Shaffer, a witness who had failed to appear before a committee.

1712. An instance wherein the House refused to punish contumacious witnesses.—On August 28, 1850,[6] Mr. Edward Stanly, of North Carolina, from the select committee appointed under the resolution of the House of the 6th of May relative to officeholders under the last administration interfering in elections, made a report that two witnesses, Thomas Ritchie and C. P. Sengstack, had refused to answer certain questions put to them by the committee. Mr. Stanly thereupon presented the following resolution:

Resolved, That whereas the select committee of this House, acting by the authority of the House under a resolution of the 6th of May last, have reported that Thomas Ritchie and C. P. Sengstack have peremptorily refused to give evidence in obedience to a summons duly issued by said committee; therefore,

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House issue his warrant, directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms, to take into custody the persons of said Ritchie and said Sengstack, that they may be brought to the bar of the House to answer for an alleged contempt of this House, and that they be allowed counsel on that occasion should they desire it.

On August 31, after debate which related chiefly to the political questions involved, the resolutions were disagreed to, yeas 49, nays 122.

1713. In a case where the House has the right to punish for contempt, its officers may not be held liable for the proper discharge of ministerial functions in connection therewith.—In the case of Stewart v. Blaine,[7]

the opinion of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia was delivered by Chief Justice Carter, and is as follows (1 MacArthur, p. 457):

The whole subject of controversy in this case as presented to the court is resolved in the question, Had the House of Representatives of the United States jurisdiction in the premises?

If jurisdiction over the subject and person of the plaintiff resided in the House, the ministerial functions discharged by the Speaker and Sergeant-at-Arms in the premises were justified in the jurisdiction. Under the principles of law regulating the relations of ministerial officers to those around them and affected by their acts, two questions are fundamentally important. Has the authority issuing process jurisdiction of the subject and of the person against whom process goes? These two questions answered affirmatively, nothing remains in the determination of the question as to their right to execute the process. Their liability thenceforward is regulated by the responsibility as to the manner in which they do it, a subject not made matter of complaint in this case.

The question of power to punish for contempt in the case now before the court was settled by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Anderson v. Dunn more than half a century ago after a stout contest and upon thorough deliberation. This authority has been uniformly acquiesced in for over fifty years, and until reversed must be regarded as conclusive with this court. If authority, the subject of this controversy is stare decisis.

In making this decision the court confines itself strictly to the adjudication of the case made. We are not engaged in the investigation of the rights of a citizen held in durance vile under an application by writ of habeas corpus.

The court also announces that the case of Stewart v. Ordway (the Sergeant-at-Arms) involved the same questions and would be decided in the same way.

1714. An early discussion as to form of resolution ordering the arrest of a contumacious witness.—On January, 12, 1849,[1] Mr. George Fries, of Ohio, from the select committee appointed to investigate the official conduct of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be required to take David Taylor into custody and confine him unless he agrees to answer all proper questions which the select committee before whom he has been testifying shall ask of him.

Mr. Fries explained that this witness, who had been duly subpœnaed, was under examination by a subcommittee, and after having given a portion of his testimony declined to answer further. The subcommittee reported to the full committee, and in the course of the debate it was stated that the witness had declined before the full committee to testify further.

The case of Whitney was discussed as a precedent, and finally Mr. Joseph R. Ingersoll, of Pennsylvania, offered an amendment to strike out all after the word "resolved" and insert the following:

That whereas the select committee, acting by authority of the House under a resolution of the 11th of August, 1848, has reported that David Taylor has peremptorily refused, in the course of his examination before said committee, to answer any further questions which may be put to him by said committee, therefore,

Resolved, That the Speaker of this House issue his warrant, directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms, to take into custody the person of the said David Taylor, that he may be brought to the bar of the House to answer for an alleged contempt of the House, and that he be allowed counsel on that occasion should he desire it.

This resolution going over to the succeeding day, on that day Mr. Fries, by direction of the committee, withdrew the subject from the consideration of the House, and no further action was taken thereon.

[1] Second session Thirtieth Congress, Journal, pp. 238, 242; Globe, pp. 242–244.

1715. The House having considered and determined the disposition of a person in custody, a further proposition relating thereto was held not to be privileged.—On January 30, 1873,[1] Mr. Aaron A. Sargent, of California, as a question of privilege, proposed the following:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms, in executing the order of the House in relation to the custody of Joseph B. Stewart, shall keep the said Stewart in custody in the jail of the District of Columbia.

Mr. John F. Farnsworth, of Illinois, having objected that the resolution was not in order as a question of privilege, the Speaker[2] sustained the point of order, and, when Mr. Sargent took an appeal, said, in submitting the appeal:

An appeal having been taken from the decision of the Chair, the Chair will state that this matter was brought before the House by the committee. It has been fully adjudicated by the House. The House has voted upon sundry and divers propositions and has come to a final resolution thereon, ordering a distinct thing to be done, imposing a duty on two officers of the House—first on the Speaker, to address a certain question to the witness, and next on the Sergeant-at-Arms to take him into custody. The Chair decides that on that statement from the committee, as a privileged question, by the action of the House the privilege is exhausted. The gentleman from California desires to offer a resolution proposing to make another disposition of the subject than that which the House has just made by its vote. The Chair has ruled this resolution out as not pertaining to a question of privilege.

The appeal being stated, it was, on motion of Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, laid on the table.

1716. The House has assumed the expenses incurred by Members and officers in defending suits brought by persons punished by the House for contempt.—On April 9, 1870,[3] Mr. John A. Bingham, of Ohio, presented, as a matter relating to the privileges of the House, the following resolution reported from the Committee on the Judiciary:

Resolved, That a sum not exceeding two thousand dollars, being the expenses and counsel fees incurred by Benjamin F. Butler, Member of the Fortieth Congress, in defending a suit brought against him by Charles W. Woolley, in the city of Baltimore, for his action as a Member of this House in sustaining its rights and privileges, be paid from the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. Bingham argued that the Member against whom the action was brought had done the acts for which it was brought as a Member of the House in the course of his duty as such; therefore he was defending the privileges of the House in resisting the suit.

The resolution was agreed to without division.

1717. On June 28, 1874[4], the House agreed to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the House assume the defense of the Speaker and the Sergeant-at-Arms in the suits against them by Joseph B. Stewart for alleged false imprisonment while in custody, under the order of the House, as a recusant witness, in February, 1873, recently decided against Stewart by the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, and the expenses of said defense be paid by the Clerk from the contingent fund of the House, upon the approval of the Committee on Accounts.

1718. In 1860 the Massachusetts court decided that a warrant directed only to the Sergeant-at-Arms of the United States Senate might not be served by deputy in that State.—On February 15, 1860,[1] Mr. John M. Mason, of Virginia, in the Senate, reported from the select committee appointed to investigate the circumstances of the raid of John Brown at Harpers Ferry,[2] a preamble and resolution reciting that F. B. Sanborn, of Concord, Mass., had failed to answer the summons of the committee to appear and testify, and providing that the President of the Senate issue a warrant "directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms, commanding him to take into custody," etc., the body of the said Sanborn. This resolution gave no authority to the Sergeant-at-Arms to delegate this power to a deputy.

The resolution was adopted by the Senate, and on April 16, 1860, Mr. Mason presented in the Senate the warrant of the Sergeant-at-Arms, with his return thereon, stating that on April 3 he had arrested the said Sanborn at Concord, and reciting the circumstances of the collecting of a mob immediately upon the arrest, and then the forcible taking of Sanborn by a deputy sheriff of the county of Middlesex, armed with a writ of habeas corpus. A copy of the record of the proceedings of habeas corpus was made a part of the return, and showed that Sanborn had been liberated on the ground that the warrant was insufficient in law. This return was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On June 7,[3] Mr. James A. Bayard, of Delaware, from the Committee on the Judiciary, made a report on the subject, holding that, although in general delegated power might not be delegated, every public officer might, for merely ministerial purposes, appoint a deputy. And the service of a warrant, whether by distress upon goods and chattels or by arrest of the person, was a purely ministerial act, seemed scarcely questionable.

The committee recommended no action on the part of the Senate, expressing confidence that the higher court of Massachusetts, to which an appeal had been taken, would reverse the finding on the habeas corpus proceedings.

The case having been carried to the supreme court of Massachusetts, at the April term of 1860, in an opinion[4] delivered by Chief Justice Shaw, the court decided that—a warrant issued by order of the Senate of the United States for the arrest of a witness for contempt in refusing to appear before a committee of the Senate, and addressed only to the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, can not be served by deputy in this Commonwealth.

In the course of this opinion the court says:

The Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate is an officer of that house, like their doorkeeper, appointed by them, and required by their rules and orders to exercise certain powers mainly with a view to order and due course of proceeding. He is not a general officer, known to the law, as a sheriff, having power to appoint general deputies, or to act by special deputation in particular cases, nor like a marshal, who holds analogous powers, and possesses similar functions, under the laws of the United States, to those of sheriffs and deputies under the State laws.

But even where it appears, by the terms of the reasonable construction of a statute, conferring an authority on a sheriff, that it was intended he should execute it personally, he can not exercise it by general deputy, and of course he can not do it by special deputation. (Wood v. Ross, 11 Mass., 271.)

But upon the third point, the court are all of opinion that the warrant affords no justification. Suppose that the Senate had authority, by the resolves passed by them, to cause the petitioner to be arrested and brought before them, it appears by the warrant issued for that purpose that the power was given alone to McNair, Sergeant-at-Arms, and there is nothing to indicate any intention on their part to have such arrest made by any other person. There is no authority in fact given by this warrant, to delegate the authority to any other person. It is a general rule of the common law, not founded on any judicial decision or statute provision, but so universally received as to have grown into a maxim, that a delegated authority to one does not authorize him to delegate it to another. Delegata potestas non potest delegari. Broom's Maxims (3d ed.) 755. This grows out of the nature of the subject. A special authority is in the nature of a trust. It implies confidence in the ability, skill, or discretion of the party intrusted. The author of such a power may extend it if he will, as is done in ordinary powers of attorney, giving power to one or his substitute or substitutes to do the acts authorized. But when it is not so extended, it is limited to the person named.

The counsel for the respondent asked what authority there is for limiting such warrant to the person named; it rather belongs to those who wish to justify under such delegated power, to show judicial authority for the extension.

On the special ground that this respondent had no legal authority to make the arrest, and has no legal authority to detain the petitioner in his custody, the order of the court is that the said Sanborn be discharged from the custody of said Carleton.

The warrant, a copy of which is appended to the decision, was directed to "Dunning R. McNair, Sergeant-at-Arms," etc., in the usual form, to arrest F. B. Sanborn, and bore this indorsement:

SENATE CHAMBER, February 16, A. D. 1860.

I do appoint and hereby empower Silas Carleton to serve this warrant, and to exercise all the authority in relation thereto, with which I am vested by the foregoing.

D. R. MCNAIR,
Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate of the United States.

1719. The right of a Sergeant-at-Arms charged with the arrest of a witness to intrust the duty to a deputy was discussed somewhat on January 29, 1872,[1] in the Senate, with reference to the Senate precedent of 1860.

1720. A joint committee has ordered a contumacious witness into custody.—On March 9, 1864, we find the joint committee on the conduct of the war under the authority given them by the concurrent resolution creating them, agree to the following:

Resolved, That Francis Waldron be ordered into the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate to be safely and securely kept until further order of the committee, said Francis Waldron having refused to testify before this committee.

And on March 11 the committee ordered the witness discharged, on the ground that his testimony could not be relied on, and no beneficial result could be obtained by forcing him to testify.[2]

1721. A witness having declined to testify before a joint committee, a question arose as to whether one House or both should take proceedings to punish for contempt.

Form of subpœna issued by a joint committee.

On December 6, 1871,[3] in the Senate, Mr. John Scott, of Pennsylvania, from the Joint Committee on the Condition of the Late Insurrectionary States, presented two reports, one relating to Clayton Camp and David Gist, of South Carolina, who, after being duly summoned, failed and refused to appear before a subcommittee, and the other relating to W. L. Saunders, of North Carolina, who, while testifying, had declined to answer certain questions pertinent to the subject of inquiry.

The report gave the following as the form of subpœna issued by the joint committee:

United States of America—Congress of the United States.

To David Gist, greeting:

Pursuant to lawful authority, you are hereby commanded to appear before the subcommittee of the Joint Select Committee to Inquire into the Condition of the Late Insurrectionary States, on Thursday, the 20th day of July, 1871, at 10 o'clock a. m., at their committee room at Columbia, S. C., then and there to testify what you may know relative to the subject-matters under consideration by said committee.

Hereof fail not, as you will answer your default under the pains and penalties in such cases made and provided.

To John R. French, Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate of the United States, to serve and return.

Given under my hand, by order of the committee, this 18th day of July, in the year of our Lord 1871.

JOHN SCOTT,
Chairman of the Select Committee.

In the case of Saunders, which was first considered, the committee reported a preamble reciting the testimony of the witness, the authority of the committee, etc., concluding with the following:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring), That W. L. Saunders, of Chapel Hill, and State of North Carolina, a witness heretofore duly summoned before a joint select committee of the two Houses of Congress, having been lawfully required to testify before a subcommittee, duly authorized by said joint select committee to take his testimony, and having, in the course of the investigation, refused to answer proper inquiries put to him by the chairman of said joint committee, be forthwith arrested by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, and brought before the Senate at its bar, by the order of the Senate duly issued by the Vice-President, under his hand and the seal of the Senate; and that said Saunders be detained, by virtue thereof, by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate until he answer for his contempt of the order of the Senate in the matter aforesaid, and abide such further order as may be made in the premises.

A question arose as to the propriety of this proceeding. Mr. Scott stated that the committee knew of no precedent to guide them, but had conceived the contempt to be against the whole body of Congress, and that it would be proper and within the power of the two Houses to authorize one House to deal with the witness. Mr. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, recalled that in a previous Congress the joint committee on retrenchment had reported a contumacious witness to the Senate, and a warrant was issued by the Senate alone and the witness compelled to answer. But no question had been made as to this procedure.

Mr. Edmunds having raised a question as to the mode of procedure proposed by the resolution reported by Mr. Scott, moved to amend it by making it a simple resolution of the Senate instead of a concurrent resolution.

In support of the amendment it was urged that each body of the members composing the joint committee was the representaive of its own House, and therefore that any contempt of the committee transmitted itself to the rights and powers of the two Houses separately. And the two Houses possessed individually the the power to punish. This power was independent with each, and each having it, no action of the other was necessary to enforce it. If the power to punish was only a concurrent authority, then neither House could delegate it, but it must be exercised by both Houses concurrently. The original form of the resolution merely amounted to the Senate asking the consent of the House of Representatives to punish a contempt against itself. A punishment in the Senate would not be a bar to subsequent punishment in the House. If the Senate required the aid of the House to lay hold on the witness, the Senate's powers would be too slender to deal with him after his arrest. Both the law and the Constitution gave to the two Houses separately the power to punish for refusal to testify, but neither gave such power to the two Houses acting together. A joint committee had not that power with regard to witnesses possessed by the select committee of the single House.

On the other hand, it was urged that the offense was against the two Houses jointly, that the act of 1857 did not apply to such a case, that as the committee was constituted by the joint action of the two Houses, it was proper for the arrest to be made under the same authority, and there could be then no harm in a trial by the Senate, as it was admitted that the Senate had a right to try on its own account. But that trial should be by consent of the other House, because the two Houses might differ in the matter.

Mr. Scott stated that precedents were rare on the subject, because joint committees were in so little favor in the English Parliament that none had been appointed since the year 1695.

On December 19 the amendment was rejected without division, and the resolution was agreed to. But on the same day a motion to reconsider the vote agreeing to the resolution was entered.

It does not appear that the matter was further acted on. The resolution relating to Camp and Gist was likewise not acted on.

1722. In 1860 the Senate imprisoned Thaddeus Hyatt in the common jail for contempt in refusing to appear as a witness.

The right to coerce the attendance of witnesses in an inquiry for legislative purposes was discussed in the Hyatt case.

Discussion of the extent of the Senate's power of investigation.

On December 14, 1859,[1] the Senate, after debate, agreed unanimously to a resolution providing that a committee be appointed to inquire into the facts attending the late invasion and seizure of the armory and arsenal at Harpers Ferry by a band of armed men, and report whether the same was attended by armed resistance to the authorities and public force of the United States, and the murder of any citizens of Virginia, or any troops sent there to protect public property; whether such invasion was made under color of any organization intended to subvert the government of any of the States of the Union; the character and extent of such organization; whether any citizens of the United States not present were implicated therein or accessory thereto by contributions of money, arms, ammunition, or otherwise; the character and extent of the military equipments in the hands or under the control of said armed band; where, how, and when the same were obtained and transported to the place invaded; also, to report what legislation, if any, is necessary by the Government for the future preservation of the peace of the country and the safety of public property—the committee to have power to send for persons and papers.

The committee was appointed, consisting of Senators James M. Mason, of Virginia; Jefferson Davis, of Mississippi; Jacob Collamer, of Vermont; Graham N. Fitch, of Indiana, and James R. Doolittle, of Wisconsin.

On February 21, 1860,[1] Mr. Mason, from the committee, reported the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas Thaddeus Hyatt, of the city of New York, was, on the 24th day of January, A. D. 1860, duly summoned to appear before the select committee of the Senate, appointed "to inquire into the facts attending the late invasion and seizure of the armory and arsenal of the United States at Harpers Ferry, in Virginia, by a band of armed men," and has failed and refused to appear before said committee, pursuant to said summons: Therefore,

Resolved, That the President of the Senate issue his warrant, directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms, commanding him to take into his custody the body of the said Thaddeus Hyatt, wherever to be found, and to have the same forthwith before the bar of the Senate to answer as for a contempt of the authority of the Senate.

After debate the resolution was agreed to, yeas 43, nays 12.

On March 6[2] the Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the Senate having Mr. Hyatt in custody, and submitted the following preamble and resolution, which were agreed to, yeas 49, nays 6.

Resolved, That Thaddeus Hyatt, of the city of New York, now in custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, on an attachment for contempt in refusing obedience to the summons requiring him to appear and testify before a committee of the Senate, be now arraigned at the bar of the Senate, and that the President of the Senate propound to him the following interrogatories:

First. What excuse have you for not appearing before the select committee of the Senate, in pursuance of the summons served on you on the 24th day of January, 1860?

Second. Are you now ready to appear before the said committee and answer such proper questions as shall be put to you by said committee?

And that the said Thaddeus Hyatt be required to answer said questions in writing and under oath.

On March 9[3] the witness presented a sworn statement questioning the authority of the committee and declining to answer the questions. As part of this statement he presented the argument of his counsel, Messrs. S. E. Sewall and John A. Andrew, who thus summarized the objections to the Senate's jurisdiction:

The inquisition delegated to the committee, being an inquiry as to who committed crimes, was a judicial one, and a usurpation of the functions of the judiciary.

The object of the inquisition being unconstitutional, the Senate could have no power to compel the attendance of witnesses before the committee.

The investigations being made with a view to legislation can not give the Senate authority to make a judicial inquisition as to the authors of specific crimes, if it would not otherwise have possessed such authority.

Even had the inquisition been constitutional, still, being for legislative purposes, the Senate could not coerce the attendance of witnesses.

All the powers of the Senate are derived from the Constitution, and not gained by long prescription, like those of the Houses of Parliament in Great Britain.

[1] First session Thirty-sixth Congress, Globe, pp. 849, 859. [2] Globe, p. 999. [3] Globe, p. 1076.

The power of committing witnesses for contempt in cases of this kind is not given directly by the Constitution, or by necessary implication, because legislation can be effected by it without any such power.

This is not a case in which the Senate has judicial or quasi-judicial power; in which case authority to compel the attendance of witnesses as a necessary incident of the power need not be disputed.

Since the statute of 1857 has made the refusal of a witness to appear before a committee an indictable offense, the Senate can not try any such witness for a contempt, because that would be to try him for a crime without a jury, in violation of the Constitution. We deny, then, the power of the Senate committee to act as inquisitors in regard to crimes. We deny their right to drag our client from his home in New York to testify before them.

If the Senate can thus usurp some of the functions of the judiciary, what other functions of the judiciary or the executive may they not assume? The liberties of the people are gone, if the Senate by its own power can create a secret inquisitorial tribunal, and compel any witnesses they please to appear before it.

The power of punishment for contempt is always arbitrary and dangerous, whether exercised by courts or legislative bodies. The constitutions and the legislation of the United States and of the several States have been constantly aiming to limit and define it. It is dangerous, because the party injured becomes the judge in his own case both of law and fact. It involves, therefore, a violation of one of the first principles of justice, and is only to be sustained by the extremest necessity. We believe that the House and Senate have seldom been called to act in a case of alleged contempt in which the power has not been seriously questioned, and in which, from a just sense of its arbitrary character, they have not aimed to make the punishment light rather than severe. In the cases, for instance, of John Anderson and General Houston, the reprimands of the Speaker of the House appear small punishments compared with the gravity of the charges against them.

On March 12 [1] Hyatt was brought to the bar and Mr. Mason proposed the following preamble and resolution, which, after long debate, were agreed to, yeas 44, nays 10:

Whereas Thaddeus Hyatt, appearing at the bar of the Senate, in custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, pursuant to the resolution of the Senate of the 6th of March instant, was required by order of the Senate then made, to answer the following questions, under oath and in writing: "1. What excuse have you for not appearing before the select committee of the Senate, in pursuance of the summons served on you on the 24th day of January, 1860? 2. Are you ready to appear before said committee and answer such proper questions as shall be put to you by said committee?" time to answer the same being given until the 9th of March following; and whereas on the said last named day the said Thaddeus Hyatt, again appearing in like custody at the bar of the Senate, presented a paper, accompanied by an affidavit, which he stated was his answer to said questions, and it appearing, upon examination thereof, that the said Thaddeus Hyatt has assigned no sufficient excuse in answer to the question first aforesaid, and in answer to the said second question, has not declared himself ready to appear and answer before said committee of the Senate, as set forth in said question, and has not purged himself of the contempt with which he stands charged: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the said Thaddeus Hyatt be committed by the Sergeant-at-Arms to the common jail of the District of Columbia, to be kept in close custody until he shall signify his willingness to answer the questions propounded to him by the Senate; and for the commitment and detention of said Thaddeus Hyatt, this resolution shall be a sufficient warrant.

Resolved, That whenever the officer having the said Thaddeus Hyatt in custody shall be informed by said Hyatt that he is ready and willing to answer the questions aforesaid, it shall be the duty of such officer to deliver the said Thaddeus Hyatt over to the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, whose duty it shall be again to bring him before the bar of the Senate, when so directed by the Senate.

In the course of the debate preceding the adoption of this preamble and resolution, Mr. Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts, argued that the Senate had no right to compel testimony required for legislative purposes only. On June 15,[1] when the Senate ordered the discharge of Hyatt from confinement, Mr. Sumner spoke again on this subject, thus summarizing his argument:

We must not forget a fundamental difference between the powers of the House of Representatives and the powers of the Senate. It is from the former that the Senator from Virginia has drawn his precedents, and here is his mistake.

To the House of Representatives are given inquisitorial powers expressly by the Constitution, while no such powers are given to the Senate. This is expressed in the words, "the House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment." Here, then, obviously, is something delegated to the House, and not delegated to the Senate—namely, those inquiries which are in their nature preliminary to an impeachment—which may or may not end in impeachment; and since, by the Constitution, every "civil officer" of the General Government may be impeached, the inquisitorial powers of the House may be directed against every "civil officer," from the President down to the lowest on the list.

This is an extensive power, but it is confined solely to the House. Strictly speaking, the Senate has no general inquisitorial powers. It has judicial powers in three cases under the Constitution:

1. To try impeachments.

2. To judge the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members.

3. To punish its members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member.

In the execution of these powers, the Senate has the attributes of a court; and, according to established precedents, it may summon witnesses and compel their testimony, although it may well be doubted if a law be not necessary, even to the execution of this power.

Besides these three cases, expressly named in the Constitution, there are two others, where it has already undertaken to exercise judicial powers, not by virtue of express words, but in self-defense:

1 With regard to the conduct of its servants, as of its printer.

2. When its privileges have been violated, as in the case of William Duane, by a libel, or in the case of Nugent, by stealing and divulging a treaty while still under the seal of secrecy.

It will be observed that these two classes of cases are not sustained by the text of the Constitution; but if sustained at all, it must be by that principle of universal jurisprudence, and also of natural law, which gives to everybody, whether natural or artificial, the right to protect its own existence; in other words, the great right of self-defense. And I submit that no principle less solid could sustain this exercise of power. It is not enough to say that such a power would be convenient, highly convenient, or important It must be absolutely essential to the self-preservation of the body; and even then, in the absence of any law, it may be open to the gravest doubts.

1723. In 1877 the Senate, after discussion, decided that certain telegrams relating to the Presidential election should be produced by a witness.—On January 2, 1877,[2] the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate, who were instructed to inquire into the recent election in Oregon, reported to the Senate that William M. Turner, manager of the Western Union Telegraph office at Jacksonville, Oreg., being called and sworn as a witness by the committee, had declined to answer certain questions, on the ground that both by the laws of Oregon and the instructions of the company he was forbidden to divulge anything that passed over the wires. The questions which the witness refused to answer were presented in the report, and concerned dispatches relating to alleged transfers of money from New York to Oregon after the election in November, and to an alleged dispatch making a request that the canvass be withheld for a time. The committee reported that it was important to have the witness answer the questions, as the answers might be material to the investigation, and therefore recommended the adoption of the following:

Resolved, That William M. Turner is in duty bound under his oath to answer the questions that have been propounded to him as above stated, and that he can not excuse himself for answering the same by reason of his official connection with the Western Union Telegraph Company as the manager of their office at Jacksonville, Oreg.

This resolution was debated at length on January 5 and 8, especially as to the principle involved in an invasion of the secrecy of the telegraph. The law of Oregon was shown to refer only to willful disclosures, and it was argued, from cases decided, that it did not preclude answers before a proper tribunal. The debate developed a general sentiment against the practice of demanding the disclosure of private dispatches, except where there was reason to believe that particular telegrams contained material information, in which case, such might be properly demanded.

The resolution was agreed to, yeas 35, nays 3.

1724. In 1860 the Senate looked to House precedents in dealing with a witness in contempt.—On February 15, 1860,[1] in the Senate, Mr. John M. Mason (of Virginia) made a report concerning certain witnesses who had failed to appear before the committee investigating the invasion of Harpers Ferry. He said that the resolution to compel the attendance of the witnesses was drawn according to the precedents of the House of Representatives, he not having found a case where a witness had declined to appear before a committee of the Senate.[2] The resolution compelling the attendance of the witnesses was agreed to.

[2] There had been such a case, however, in 1852. On August 13, 1852, a select committee of the Senate reported the contumacy of John McGinnis, a witness, with a resolution declaring that he had committed a contempt, and directing his imprisonment in the jail of the District. The resolution went over to the next day, when it was withdrawn, the witness having taken the oath and testified. (First session Thirty-second Congress, Globe, pp. 2201, 2212.)

1725. In 1792 the House declined to request the President to inquire into the causes of the defeat of General St. Clair's army and asserted its own right to make the investigation.

An example of difficulty caused by permitting division of a question which does not present two substantive propositions.

On March 27, 1792,[5] the following resolution was proposed:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to institute an inquiry into the causes of the late defeat of the army under the command of Major-General St. Clair; and also into the causes of the detentions or delays which are suggested to have attended the money, clothing, provisions, and military stores for the use of the said army, and into such other causes as may in any manner have been productive of the said defeat.

Objection was made to this resolution on the ground that it was an invasion of the Executive department by the Legislative department; while an inquiry into the expenditure of money was the duty, not of a court-martial but of the House, and should be made by a select committee. On the other hand, it was urged that the resolution amounted to a simple request; but against this it was argued that the theory that the House was the grand inquest of the nation would lead to confusion in the Departments of the Government, and that the Constitution had limited the objects of inquiry by the House.

A division of the question being demanded, the question was put first on the following:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to institute an inquiry into the causes of the late defeat of the army under the command of Major-General St. Clair.

This was decided in the negative, yeas 21, nays 35.[1]

The House then agreed to this resolution, yeas 44, nays 10:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the cause of the failure of the late expedition under Major-General St. Clair, and that the said committee be empowered to call for such persons, papers, and records as may be necessary to assist their inquiries.

On April 4[2] it was

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause the proper officers to lay before this House such papers of a public nature in the Executive department as may be necessary to the investigation of the causes of the failure of the late expedition under Major-General St. Clair.

1726. In 1807 the House, after mature consideration, declined to investigate charges against the chief of the Army, but requested the President to make such an inquiry.

The right and duty of the House to inquire into the manner of expenditure of public money by the Executive branch was early asserted.

The House, by resolution, called on two of its Members to state what they knew concerning charges against the chief of the Army, then under discussion.

In the early practice of the House a resolution making a request of the President was taken to him by a committee of Members.

On December 31, 1807,[3] Mr. John Randolph, of Virginia, having presented to the House certain papers in his possession, proposed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause an inquiry to be made into the conduct of Brigadier-General Wilkinson, commander of the Army of the United States, in relation to his having at any time whilst in the service of the United States corruptly received money from the Government or agents of Spain.

This resolution gave rise to a long debate as to the power of the House to make such a request in relation to a military officer, as to whom the Constitution did not give the House the power that it had in the case of the impeachment of a civil officer. It was objected that it would be improper and unconstitutional for one Department of the Government to call upon another to perform its duty, as in this case the House was calling upon the Executive to do what was evidently his duty to do. On the other hand, it was contended that the House was the grand inquest of the nation, and as such had a right to make the request of the Executive.

Mr. Barent Gardenier, of New York, moved that the resolution be referred to a select committee and that the committee have power to send for persons and papers.

[1] It will be observed that it was not necessary to vote on the second portion, since no substantive proposition remained, and it would have meant nothing had it been agreed to.

[3] First session Tenth Congress, Journal, p. 101 (Gales & Seaton ed.); Annals, pp. 1257–1268.

Mr. Robert Marion, of South Carolina, moved to strike out the words giving the committee power to send for persons and papers.

In support of this motion it was urged that the House had no power to send for persons and papers, because it had no authority to make an investigation into the conduct of an officer under the authority of the President and not subject to impeachment. It was urged that the powers of the House were limited by the Constitution and that it had no powers except from the Constitution. It was argued that as the House had the war-making power it certainly could inquire into the loyalty of the commander in chief. A question was also raised as to what the House would do with the testimony that it already had and that it was proposed to obtain, and the suggestion was made that the only proper course would be to transmit it to the Executive.

The question being taken on January 5,[1] the House, by 72 yeas to 38 nays, struck out the provision giving the committee power to send for persons and papers, and then, without division, decided in the negative the motion to refer to a select committee.

A resolution was agreed to calling on two Members of the House for such information as they might possess concerning General Wilkinson, and then the discussion of Mr. Randolph's original motion continued.

On January 13[2] the House, by 72 yeas to 49 nays, agreed to Mr. Randolph's resolution.

Resolutions providing for an investigation by the House were proposed during this discussion, but were withdrawn or refused consideration.

The House then ordered that copies of the papers and information relative to the conduct of General Wilkinson, that had been laid on the Clerk's table, be transmitted to the President of the United States, and Messrs. Randolph and Eppes were appointed a committee to take the papers and the resolution to the President.

Mr. John Rowan, of Kentucky, then offered the following resolution,[3] drawn evidently for the purpose of meeting the constitutional objections to making the inquiry:

Resolved, That a special committee be appointed to inquire into the conduct of Brigadier-General Wilkinson, in relation to his having at any time, while in the service of the United States, either as a civil or a military officer, been a pensioner of the Government of Spain, or corruptly received money from that Government or its agents, and that the said committee have power to send for such persons and papers as may be necessary to assist their inquiries, and that they report the result to this House, to enable this House the better to legislate on subjects of the common weal, and our foreign relations, and particularly our relation with Spain, as well as on the subject of the increase of the Army of the United States, and its regulation.

Without division the House declined to consider this resolution.

On a vote by yeas and nays the House agreed unanimously to this resolution:[4]

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before the House of Representatives all the information which may at any time, from the establishment of the present Federal Government to the present time, have been forwarded to any Department of the Government touching a combination between the agents of any foreign government and citizens of the United States for dismembering the Union, or going to show that any officer of the United States has at any time corruptly received money from any foreign government or its agents, distinguishing as far as possible, the period at which such information has been forwarded, and by whom.

On January 20[1] President Jefferson sent to the House a message stating that some days previous to the adoption of the resolution of the House a court of inquiry had been constituted in the case of General Wilkinson, and that the papers and information transmitted from the House had been forwarded to the judge-advocate of that court. The message also transmitted to the House such information as the Executive Department of the Government had on the subject involved in the resolution of inquiry, and explained that certain other documents had been destroyed, and that one document, a confidential letter, had been withheld, but that the writer of the letter was to be summoned before the court of inquiry to give in legal form the information contained in the letter.

The President also assured the House that the duties which the information sent by the House devolved upon him would be exercised with rigorous impartiality.

On February 4[2] the President transmitted additional documents on the subject of the inquiry, and on April 25 the House transmitted to the President additional papers relating to General Wilkinson.

On February 3, 1809[3] Mr. Randolph rose in his place and said that among the duties and rights of the House was none so important as its control over the public purse which it possessed under the Constitution. The mere form of appropriation was not all. The House should rigorously examine into the application of the money thus appropriated. Therefore, he moved this resolution, which was agreed to without debate or division:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any advances of money have been made to the Commander in Chief of the Army by the Department of War contrary to law.

Mr. Randolph was made chairman of the committee, and in due time reported.

1727. In 1810 the House, after mature consideration, determined that it had the right to investigate the conduct of General Wilkinson, although he was not an officer within the impeaching power of the House.

At the first investigation of charges against General Wilkinson the proceedings were ex parte, but at the second inquiry the House voted that he should be heard in his defense.

The House having investigated charges against General Wilkinson, of the Army, the results were transmitted to the President by the hands of a committee.

An instance wherein the precedents of Parliament were invoked and discussed.

On March 21, 1810,[1] Mr. Joseph Pearson, of North Carolina, proposed this resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the conduct of Brig. Gen. James Wilkinson in relation to his having, at any time, whilst in the service of the United States, corruptly received money from the Government of Spain, or its agents, or in relation to his having, during the time aforesaid, been an accomplice, or in any way concerned with the agents of any foreign power, or with Aaron Burr, in a project against the dominions of the King of Spain, or to dismember these United States; that the said committee inquire generally into the conduct of the said James Wilkinson as brigadier-general of the Army of the United States; that the said committee have power to send for persons and papers and compel their attendance and production, and that they report the result to this House.

On April 3 the resolution was considered at length. It was urged in its favor[2] that the House, as the grand inquest of the nation, had a right to make this inquiry. The English House of Commons had inquired into the charge that the Duke of York, commander in chief of the army and second son of the Monarch, had speculated in commissions. If the House of Commons could do that, could not this House inquire into the conduct of a commander in chief charged with betraying the nation to the foreigner? If the House had not the absolute power of removing the commander in chief, they at least had the power of requesting the President of the United States to remove him, and if the President should not do it, the House could say that there should no longer be an Army with a commander at its head. If the powers of the House were to be circumscribed by the strict letter of the Constitution,[3] where would be found the power for the investigation in 1801 of the expenses of a previous Administration which had gone out of office? It was not a necessary appendage of the power of impeachment. The true construction of the powers of the House with respect to investigation, other than for the purpose of impeachment, was that (1) the House had the power to inquire to inform themselves and the nation, and (2) the power to inquire with a view to future legislation. The legislature and the people had the right to know how the money drawn by taxation had been applied. Also the House had the right to inquire as incidental to the impeaching power, for how was a President to be impeached for protecting a corrupt officer until the officer should be proven to be corrupt? It was admitted to be true that under the Constitution no military officer could be impeached, but it did not follow that the House had no right to inquire into the state of the Army. Having undoubtedly the right to inquire into the state of the Army, they also had the right to inquire into the conduct of the individuals composing it. If this was not so it followed that the Army belonged to the President and not to the nation.[4]

In opposition to the resolution it was argued that the example of the House of Commons could not be followed safely, because the Commons had power over the Constitution, while the House of Representatives had only such powers as the Constitution conferred upon them. Among the powers granted to the House by the Constitution no gentleman could find the authority for what they now proposed to do.[1] The Executive, the House, the Senate, each had its orbit and its responsibilities. It was now proposed that the House step in between the Executive and his duties.[2] Congress had no power to impeach a military officer, and to say that these proceedings were a step toward impeachment of the Executive was to assign a motive not revealed by the resolution or really intended. Only for purposes of impeachment was the House the grand inquest of the nation, and even then they could not compel the attendance of the civil officer whom they intended to impeach. They could compel the attendance only of their own Members. Congress could prescribe rules for the government of the Army, and if those rules were not sufficient to bring the offender to justice it was the fault of the Congress which had made them. By assuming the jurisdiction of the courts, either civil or military, the House would degrade its legislative character.

The resolution was voted on in two portions, the first clause being agreed to, yeas 87, nays 24; and the second clause, beginning with the words "That the said committee inquire generally," etc., was agreed to, yeas 78, nays 31. The whole resolution was then agreed to, yeas 80, nays 29.

On April 20,[3] a letter from General Wilkinson asking that an impartial tribunal be constituted to try him was presented to the House by the Speaker, but after being read was not acted on, the House even refusing to refer it to the Secretary of War.[4]

On May 1[5] the committee made their report. It consisted of a mass of evidence, but no recommendations for action. The committee stated in the course of debate that General Wilkinson had not expressed a wish to appear before them. Their report states that they issued a subpœna duces tecum to General Wilkinson, requiring him to submit to the committee certain papers, and that he sent papers in response to this, but upon examination they did not include certain of the papers demanded, and the committee had been unable to obtain them. The papers which the committee wished to obtain they had applied for at first from the Secretary of War, but were informed that they had been taken from that Department by General Wilkinson.

When the report was presented there was objection to it on the ground that the proceedings had been ex parte, General Wilkinson not having been invited to appear before the committee; but it was urged in response that examinations for impeachment were in the first instance ex parte.

At the next session of the Congress, on December 18, 1810,[6] the continuation of the inquiry[7] was authorized by the presentation anew of the original resolution with the addition of these words: "And that the said James Wilkinson be notified by the committee of the time and place of their sitting, and be heard in his defense." This addition was approved, 89 to 20, after considerable debate, in which it was objected that this addition would make the resolution still more unconstitutional, because it would make the proceeding a trial of General Wilkinson. The resolution in the amended form was agreed to, yeas 79, nays 36.

On February 26[1] the report of the committee was submitted to the House. A motion was first made to refer the report to the Committee of the Whole, and it was determined in the negative, yeas 43, nays 81. Then it was moved that the report with the documents accompanying be transmitted to the President of the United States. A proposition was made to amend by adding the words:

Together with the report of a select committee, made to the House at the last session of Congress, on the same subject, with the documents accompanying the same.

Objection was made on the ground that the report of the preceding session had been based on ex parte examination. The amendment was disagreed to, yeas 88, nays 32. The motion to transmit the report of the present session to the President was then agreed to, yeas 76, nays 42.

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Bibb were appointed a committee to transmit the report and accompanying documents to the President.

On March 1[2] Mr. Bibb reported that the committee had performed the service.

1728. In 1861 the two Houses, by concurrent action, assumed without question the right to investigate the conduct of the war.—On December 9, 1861,[3] the Senate agreed to the following:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That a joint committee of three Members of the Senate and four Members of the House of Representatives be appointed to inquire into the conduct of the present war; that they have power to send for persons and papers, and to sit during the sessions of either House of Congress.

In the debate in the Senate Mr. James W. Grimes, of Iowa, declared it the right and duty of Congress to make the investigation, and cited as a precedent the action of the House of Representatives in investigating in 1792 the St. Clair disaster and to action of the House in 1813.[4] The debate touched only briefly on the question of constitutional authority to make such an investigation.

On December 10, in the House of Representatives, the resolution was agreed to without debate.

1729. The House very early overruled the objection that its inquiry into the conduct of clerks in the Executive Departments would be an infringement on the Executive power.—On January 16, 1818,[5] Mr. John Holmes, of Massachusetts, offered this resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any or what clerks or other officers in either of the Departments, or in any office at the seat of the General Government, have conducted themselves improperly in their official duties, and that the committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Objection being made that the House would, by adopting this resolution, assume power over the Departments that belonged to the Executive and would thus impair Executive responsibility, it was answered that the House was in the relation of a grand jury to the nation, and that it was the duty of the House to examine into the conduct of public officers.

The resolution was agreed to, and the committee was appointed.

1730. Having the constitutional right to concur in appropriating the public money, the House has exercised also the right to examine the application of those appropriations.—On December 10, 1819,[1] Mr. Henry R. Storrs, of New York, introduced a resolution, explaining its object by saying that if there was any one point on which the House should be tenacious of its prerogatives, it was upon its constitutional right of originating revenue bills, and its concurrent right, with the Senate, of denoting, according to their own discretion, the manner in which the public moneys should be appropriated and applied.

The resolution, which was agreed to, was as follows:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire and report to this House whether any of the public moneys appropriated by Congress for the pay and subsistence of the Regular Army of the United States since the 4th day of March, 1815, have been applied to the support of any army or detachment of troops raised without the consent of this House or the authority of Congress.

Mr. Storrs was appointed chairman of the committee, and on February 28, 1820,[2] he made a report of the facts, which disclosed irregularities of the nature referred to in the resolution, and assumptions of power by the commanding officer, General Jackson. The report concludes:

The House having authorized the committee to report by bill, they have devoted their attention to the devising of some legislative remedies against the recurrence of these disorders. To prescribe the principles of the Constitution by legislative enactments might tend to impair its high and uncontrollable sanctions, and the faithful discharge of the duties of the several committees of the House furnish an adequate remedy against all abuses in the public expenditure. The committee, therefore, submit the facts contained in this report and the documents which establish them, referring them to the discretion of the House.

1731. In authorizing an investigation of the Bank of the United States in 1832 a distinction was drawn between the public relations of the bank to the Government and its dealings with private individuals.

The House sometimes fixes a date before which a committee shall report.

On March 14, 1832,[3] the House was considering this resolution, offered on a previous day by Mr. Augustin S. Clayton, of Georgia:

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed to examine into the affairs of the Bank of the United States, with power to send for persons and papers, and to report the result of their inquiries to this House.

Mr. John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts, criticised this resolution as proposing an investigation not within the power of the House; and therefore, to prevent improper inquiry, he proposed an amendment following the words of the charter and the precedent of the investigation of 1819:

Strike out all after the word "Resolved" and insert:

That a select committee be appointed to inspect the books and examine into the proceedings of the Bank of the United States, to report thereon, and to report whether the provisions of its charter have been violated or not; that the said committee have leave to meet in the city of Philadelphia, and shall make their final report on or before the 21st of April next; that they shall have power to send for persons and papers, and to employ the requisite clerks; the expense of which shall be audited and allowed by the Committee of Accounts, and paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

In the course of the debate Mr. James K. Polk, of Tennessee, criticised the amendment as placing upon the committee a limitation as to the time within which they should make their report. He thought that there was no precedent for this.

Mr. Adams's amendment was agreed to, yeas 106, nays 92. The resolution as amended was then agreed to.

In filing his views on May 14, as a member of the minority of this investigating committee, Mr. Adams developed his views more fully. He said:[1]

The amended resolution adopted by the House was predicated on the principle that * * * the original resolution presented objects of inquiry not authorized by the charter of the bank, nor within the legitimate powers of the House, particularly that it looked to investigations which must necessarily implicate not only the president and directors of the bank, and their proceedings, but the rights, the interests, the fortunes, and the reputation of individuals not responsible for those proceedings, and whom neither the committee nor the House had the power to try, or even to accuse before any other tribunal. In the examination of the books and proceedings of the bank the pecuniary transactions of multitudes of individuals with it must necessarily be disclosed to the committee, and the proceedings of the president and directors of the bank, in relation thereto, formed just and proper subject of inquiry—not, however, in the opinion of the subscriber, to any extent which would authorize them to criminate any individual other than the president, directors, and officers of the bank or its branches—nor them, otherwise than as forming part of their official proceedings. The subscriber believed that the authority of the committee and of the House itself did not extend, under color of examining into the books and proceedings of the bank, to scrutinize, for animadversion or censure, the religious or political opinions even of the president and directors of the bank, nor their domestic or family concerns, nor their private lives or characters, nor their moral, or political, or pecuniary standing in society; still less could he believe the committee invested with a power to embrace in their sphere of investigation researches so invidious and inquisitorial over multitudes of individuals having no connection with the bank other than that of dealing with them in their appropriate business of discounts, deposits, and exchanges.

Mr. Adams shows that the majority of the committee did not, however, follow these principles, but investigated the personal accounts of private individuals, such as several proprietors of well-known newspapers, although no compulsory process was issued against one citizen who declined to give his attendance.

1732. In 1834 the directors of the Bank of the United States resisted the authority of the House to compel the production of books of the bank before an investigating committee.

The investigation of the Bank of the United States in 1834 was objected to on the ground that it involved a general search of the affairs of private individuals.

The committee appointed to investigate the Bank of the United States in 1834 held that its proceedings should be confidential, not to be attended by any person not invited or required.

[1] Debates, p. 54 of Appendix.

Minority views were filed in 1834 by members of the committee appointed to investigate the affairs of the Bank of the United States.

A form of subpœna issued in 1834 and criticised as defective.

On March 18, 1834,[1] the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom had been committed the report of the Secretary of the Treasury of his reasons for ordering the public deposits to be removed from the Bank of the United States, made a report recommending the adoption of four resolutions. The first three of these expressed the opinion that the bank ought not to be rechartered; that the public deposits ought not to be restored to it, and that the State banks, under suitable regulations, should be continued as places of deposit of public money. The fourth resolution was as follows:

Resolved, That, for the purpose of ascertaining, as far as practicable, the cause of the commercial embarrassment and distress complained of by numerous citizens of the United States, in sundry memorials which have been presented to Congress at the present session, and of inquiring whether the charter of the Bank of the United States has been violated, and also what corruptions and abuses have existed in its management; whether it has used its corporate power, or money, to control the press, to interfere in politics or influence elections, and whether it has had any agency, through its management or money, in producing the existing pressure; a select committee be appointed to inspect the books and examine into the proceedings of the said bank, who shall report whether the provisions of the charter have been violated or not, and also what abuses, corruptions, or malpractices have existed in the management of said bank, and that the said committee be authorized to send for persons and papers, and to summon and examine witnesses on oath, and to examine into the affairs of the said bank and branches; and they are further authorized to visit the principal bank, or any of its branches, for the purpose of inspecting the books, correspondence, accounts, and other papers connected with its management or business; and that the said committee be required to report the result of such investigation, together with the evidence they may take, at as early a day as practicable.

This resolution was agreed to on April 4,[2] and the following committee were appointed: Messrs. Francis Thomas, of Maryland, Edward Everett, of Massachusetts, Henry A. Muhlenberg, of Pennsylvania, John Y. Mason, of Virginia, William W. Ellsworth, of Connecticut, Abijah Mann. jr., of New York, and Robert T. Lytle, of Ohio.

The committee reported on May 22,[3] the minority also filing views:[4]

The proceedings of the committee, in the form of extracts from its journal, are appended to the report, and show that the committee met at the North American Hotel at Philadelphia, on April 23, and informed the president of the bank that they would be ready to proceed to business on the morrow.

April 24 the committee were informed by officials of the bank that arrangements would be made to accommodate them at the bank, and that a committee of seven members of the board of directors had been appointed to receive the committee of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to offer for their inspection such books and papers of the bank as may be necessary to exhibit the proceedings of the corporation according to the requirements of the charter.

[4] The report, with extracts from the Journal of the committee and views of the minority appear as No. 481 in House Reports first session Twenty-third Congress. Minority views were also filed in the preceding investigation in 1832.

On April 26 the investigating committee agreed to and forwarded to the committee of the directors resolutions stating "that the proceedings, investigations, and examinations of this committee of the books, papers, and affairs of the bank, shall be confidential, unless otherwise ordered by the committee;" and "that the investigations of this committee into the affairs, management, and concerns of the Bank of the United States shall be conducted without the presence of any person who is not required or invited to attend the examinations of this committee."[1]

To this the board of directors responded by resolving that they could not "consent to give up the custody and possession of the books and papers of the bank, nor to permit them to be examined but in the presence of the committee appointed by the board." Considering the investigation "accusatory" in nature, the directors also thought it proper that the institution and individuals concerned should have the opportunity to be present, by their appointed representatives, at all examinations touching their character and conduct. But they protested against a secret or partial investigation.

The investigating committee, replying under date of April 29, accept the offer made by the directors of the use of a room at the bank, but with a statement of belief that > the room thus offered would be exclusively for its occupation and that of those whose attendance might be, by the committee, required or assented to.

The committee also > claims the right, to be exercised at its discretion, to compel the production of the books and papers of the bank for inspection, and to inspect the same in such mode as to the committee may seem best calculated to promote the object of its inquiry.

The committee denies "accusatory" intentions, does not purpose making a secret or partial examination, states that it will afford every person whose character or conduct may seem to be affected by the investigation a full opportunity of explanation and defense, but > claims the right of determining the time and mode of giving such privilege, and therefore can not recognize the right of the directors to prescribe the course to be pursued by this committee in making its examinations.

[1] In their minority views Messrs. Everett and Ellsworth say: "The first resolution was regarded merely as an understanding, on the part of the committee of investigation, that no publicity would be given by them, until otherwise ordered, to the matters that might appear in the course of the examination. The undersigned assented to this resolution, with the understanding of the parliamentary law that the sittings of every committee are open unless ordered to be secret by the House; and that it was not in the power of the present committee, by a vote of their own, either to shut their doors or impose secrecy on any persons who might attend. But they assented to the injunction of confidence in conformity with a usage which has prevailed in other committees of inquiry of the House, for their own convenience, as a rule binding on themselves, and with the express reservation that the adoption of this resolution should in no degree involve an assent to the principle asserted in the second. To that principle, viz, that no person should be permitted to attend during the inspection of the books of the bank and the examination of its proceedings, etc., * * * the undersigned were strenuously opposed. * * * This claim was regarded by the undersigned as being without foundation and objectionable. In the first place, as has been observed, they believed it to be contrary to the lex parliamentaria for a committee of inquiry, on its own authority, to claim the right of holding its sittings, except when deliberating and voting, in secret. It can only be constituted a secret committee by express order of the House. (See pp. 44, 45, of Report No. 481, House of Representatives, first session Twenty-third Congress.)

Again, on April 30, the committee reiterates that they have the power to compel the production of the books and papers of the bank for inspection; that they have the power to make such inspection in the presence of those only who may be, by the committee, required or invited to attend; and to exclude from their room all persons who, by their presence, may in any degree tend to impede the progress of the inspection of the books and papers or incommode the members of the committee in the discharge of the high duties devolved on them by the House of Representatives.

The committee also in this communication ask if they are to have the exclusive use of the room at the bank.

The chairman of the committee of directors, replying under date of May 1, reiterates the previous decision that the custody and possession of the books of the bank can not be given up, and that they can not be examined except in the presence of the committee appointed by the board.

On May 2 the committee of investigation resolved that, as they could not have exclusive use of the room at the bank, they would hold their sittings at their room in the North American Hotel, and that the president and directors of the Bank of the United States be required to submit for the inspection of the committee at the hotel at 11 a. m. May 3 certain specified books of the bank.

The directors replied that they could not let the books and papers go out of their care and custody, or out of the banking house, as such action would be a violation of their duty, and might be deemed an abandonment of their right to be present by themselves, or by their committee or agents, at the examination.

On May 5 the investigating committee decided to go to the bank and require of the president or other officers the production of the books of the bank for the inspection of the committee. Accordingly they proceeded to the bank and requested the president and first cashier to produce the books already demanded. The president and cashier replied that they could not comply with the request, as the books were in the custody of the board of directors, who had appointed a committee to exhibit them.

On May 7 the committee of investigation received a notification from the committee of directors that the latter would be ready May 7 at 11 a. m. to exhibit books of the bank; and accordingly the committee of investigation proceeded to the bank, and called for the minute books, containing the proceedings of the directors of the bank, and the expense book and vouchers for expenses incurred.

The committee of the directors retired to deliberate, and after a time presented to the investigating committee their resolutions. They declare that the investigation proposed involves two branches, one to ascertain whether the charter had been violated, and the other very general and indefinite; that the calls for books embrace a very wide range, including an extensive examination of the transactions, acts, and accounts of individuals, thus instituting a general search which would be an injurious invasion of private rights; that in the opinion of the directors the inquiry can only be rightfully extended to alleged violations of the charter and ought to be conducted according to certain principles and rules. Therefore the investigating committee are "respectfully required" to state specifically in writing the purposes for which the books and papers called for are to be inspected; and, if it be to establish a violation of the charter, to state specifically and in writing what are the alleged violations to which the evidence is alleged to be applicable. The suggestion is also made that the investigating committee should furnish a specification of all the charges intended to be inquired into, and proceed with them in order.

In response to this communication the investigating committee stated that they were engaged not in a prosecution, but an inquiry, and therefore could not be "required" to specify supposed violations of the charter or state specifically the purposes for which the books were to be inspected. But the committee proceeded to request of the directors the credit books and pay lists of the bank to ascertain "whether it has used its corporate powers or money to control the press, to interfere in politics, or influence elections;" also the minute books, etc., to ascertain whether the bank "has had any agency, through its management or money, in producing the present pressure," and whether the directors have violated the charter of the bank.

The committee of the board of directors replied by declining to comply with the calls in any other manner than already laid down.

On May 9 the investigating committee authorized the issuing of the following subpœna duces tecum:

By Authority of the House of Representatives of the United States.

To BENJAMIN S. BONSALL,

Marshal of the Eastern District of Pennsylvania:

You are hereby commanded to summon Nicholas Biddle, president; Emanuel Eyre, Matthew Newkirk, John Sergeant, Charles Chauncey, John S. Henry, John R. Neff, Ambrose White, Daniel W. Coxe, John Goddard, James C. Fisher, Lawrence Lewis, John Holmes, and William Platt, directors of the Bank of the United States, to be and appear before the committee of the House of Representatives of the United States appointed on the 4th day of April, 1834, "for the purpose of ascertaining," etc [here follows the portion of the resolution specifying the duties of the committee], in their chamber in the North American Hotel, in the city of Philadelphia, and to bring with them the credit books of said bank, showing the indebtedness of individuals to said bank on the 10th day of May instant, at the hour of 12 o'clock m., then and there to testify touching the matters of said inquiry, and to submit said books to said committee for inspection.

Herein fail not, and make return of this summons.

Witness the seal of the House of Representatives of the United States, and the signature of Hon. Francis Thomas, chairman of the said committee, at the city of Philadelphia, this ninth day of May, in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-four.

[SEAL.] FRANCIS THOMAS.

Attest:

W. S. FRANKLIN,

Clerk House of Representatives U. S.[1]

[1] The directors in their reply reserved objection to the legality of this process and the service, but did not state their grounds The minority of the committee in their views (p. 61 of report) say: "The form of the process and its mode of service are believed by the undersigned to be not less objectionable than its object, and equally fatal to its legal character; but on this topic they omit to dwell." Rule 11 of the House was as follows at that time: "All acts, addresses, and joint resolutions shall be signed by the Speaker; and all writs, warrants, and subpœnas issued by order of the House shall be under his hand and seal, attested by the Clerk." This rule has been somewhat changed since. (See sections 251 of Volume I and 1313 of Volume II of this work.)

At the appointed time President Biddle and the associates named in the subpœna appeared, and Mr. Sergeant stated—that they came in pursuance of the precept served on them individually by the marshal, and that he would read their individual answer to it.

This answer was in writing and signed by the respondents. It declared first that they did not produce the books, because they are not in the custody of either of us, but, as has been heretofore stated, of the board, whose views upon this subject, we would take occasion to say, have already been respectfully communicated to the committee of investigation.

As to testifying, the paper continues:

Each of us now says for himself that, considering the nature of the proceeding and the character of the inquiry, even as explained in the resolution of the committee of investigation of the 7th instant, and considering that as corporators and as directors we are parties to the proceeding, we do not consider ourselves bound to testify, and therefore respectfully decline to do so.

The committee of investigation, on May 22, reported to the House, recommending the following resolutions:

Resolved, That, by the charter of the bank of the United States, the right was expressly reserved to either House of Congress, by the appointment of a committee, to inspect the books and to examine into the proceedings of the said bank, as well as to ascertain if at any time it had violated its charter.

Resolved, That the resolution of the House of Representatives passed on the 4th of April, 1834, for the appointment of a committee, with full powers to make the investigations embraced in said resolution, was in accordance with the provisions of the charter of said bank and the power of this House.

Resolved, That the president of the board of directors of the bank of the United States, by refusing to submit for inspection the books and papers of the bank, as called for by the committee of the House of Representatives, have contemned the legitimate authority of the House, asserting for themselves powers and privileges not contemplated by the framers of their charter, nor in fairness deducible from any of the terms or provisions of that instrument.

Resolved, That either House of Congress has the right to compel the production of any such books or papers as have been called for by their committee, and also to compel said president and directors to testify to such interrogatories as were necessary to a full and perfect understanding of the proceedings of the bank at any period within the term of its existence.

Resolved, That the Speaker of this House do issue his warrant to the Sergeant-at-Arms, to arrest Nicholas Biddle, president; Manuel Eyre, Lawrence Lewis, Ambrose White, Daniel W. Coxe, John Holmes, Charles Chauncey, John Goddard, John R. Neff, William Platt, Matthew Newkirk, James C. Fisher, John S. Henry, and John Sergeant, directors of the Bank of the United States, and bring them to the bar of this House, to answer for their contempt of its lawful authority.

The report of the committee, made by Mr. Thomas, in support of the resolutions, calls attention to the fact that the bank was chartered for a great public purpose, to act as an agent of the Government in the collection and disbursement of money, and that the United States holds seven millions of the stock of the bank. The House of Representatives is the grand inquest of the nation, and as such has power to inspect all departments of the Federal Government. That there might be no doubt of the existence of this power it had been expressly reserved in the 23d section of the charter of the bank, which provides—that it shall be at all times lawful for a committee of either House of Congress, appointed for that purpose to inspect the books and examine into the proceedings of the corporation hereby created, and to report whether the provisions of its charter have been violated or not.

Thus the only restriction in the charter of the bank was one relating to the committee, and not to the House, and had reference, not to the extent of the examination, but to the character of the report to be made. The object of this specification was seen in the clause of the charter providing for certain legal action in the courts if the committee should find that the charter had been violated.

The committee argue that any doubt as to the reserve power of the House had long been settled by the precedents of the examinations by committees of the House in 1818 and 1832. Those committees examined into the general management of the bank, the transactions of private individuals were freely and fully examined, and were published. The managers of the bank on those occasions did not question the authority of the committees to make the examinations.

The committee say that in providing by resolution that the proceedings of the committee should be confidential they followed the precedent of the committee of 1832.

The minority of the committee, Messrs. Everett and Ellsworth, contended that the charter was a contract proposed by the Government to the stockholders, that the power of visitation and examination was one onerous to the stockholders, and to attempt to enlarge it by construction was to interpolate new and oppressive conditions into the contract. A resolution of the House passed in virtue of its general power of inquisition could not enlarge the specific provisions of law. The fact that the Government was a stockholder might give the Government rights in the matter which should not be claimed by the House, which was only one department of the Government. The law gave the House certain power in this case, and it was not within its power to give the committee a general power of search. The minority did not deny the power of the House to inquire into any alleged abuse or corruption whatsoever, and they believed that the committee was authorized to make such inquiry, but those inquiries should be conducted according to the charter and according to the principles of equity and constitutional right. The power of the committee did not authorize it to prosecute a secret inquiry of indefinite character. It did not extend the right of inspecting the books, granted for one purpose alone, so as to authorize their inspection for purposes totally different. It did not empower the committee to issue warrants of general search, and compel the appearance of citizens and the production of papers, not in proof or disproof of charges against third persons, but to enable the committee to find out from the papers whether those who should bring them were themselves guilty of misdemeanors. A general search was repugnant to the Constitution. The minority reviewed the proceedings at length, criticising, among other things, the legality of the process issued to compel the attendance of the directors.

On May 29,[1] Mr. John Quincy Adams presented to the House resolutions declaring that any attempt to bring to the bar of the House the directors would be unconstitutional. These resolutions were not acted on.

On June 25[2] Mr. Thomas presented a resolution to make the consideration of the report of this committee a continuing order of the House. The question of consideration being raised, the House voted to consider it—years 97, nays 65. But after consideration for a time, the resolution was superseded by privileged business. Thereafter, until the final adjournment of the session on June 30, the House was engaged in other business, so the report of the committee was not acted on.

1733. The general authority of the House to compel testimony and the production of papers in an investigation, and the relation of this right to the rights of individuals to privacy in business affairs, were discussed in 1837.—On January 3, 1837,[1] on motion of Mr. James Garland, of Virginia, the House agreed to the following:

Resolved, That a committee of nine Members be appointed, whose duty it shall be to inquire whether the several banks employed for the deposit of the public money have all, or any of them, by joint or several contract, employed an agent to reside at the seat of government to transact their business with the Treasury Department; what is the character of the business which he is so employed to transact, and what compensation he receives; whether said agent, if there be one, has been employed at the request or through the procurement of the Treasury Department; whether the business of the Treasury Department with said banks is conducted through said agent; and whether, in the transaction of any business confided to said agent, he receives any compensation from the Treasury Department; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

The following were appointed the committee: Messrs. Garland, Franklin Pierce, of New Hampshire; John Fairfield, of Maine; Henry A. Wise, of Virginia; Ransom H. Gillett, of New York; Henry Johnson, of Louisiana; Thomas L. Hamer, of Ohio; Joshua L. Martin, of Alabama, and Balie Peyton, of Tennessee.

In the course of the investigation in the committee Mr. Peyton offered this resolution:[2]

Resolved, That R. M. Whitney be summoned to appear before the committee, at the room of the Committee on Commerce, on Thursday morning next, at 10 o'clock, and that he be required to bring with him the books, papers, and memoranda relating to his agency with the deposit banks; that he produce all the correspondence between himself and any person or bank going to show the existence of that agency; that he produce the originals, where in his power, and copies where the originals are not in his possession; that he produce all the contracts which he has made or proposed with and to any bank, or correspondence held in relation to the public deposits; all books, papers, etc., going to show the amount of his compensation, and the character of the business which he is employed to transact.

To the adoption of this resolution Mr. Martin objected, on the ground that he doubted the power of the committee, on the showing then before them, to require the production of all the papers therein required, and moved for a division of the resolution, so as to take the question upon ordering the subpœna for R. M. Whitney, and the subpœna duces tecum to him, separately; which motion was withdrawn, upon the understanding with the committee generally that the question of power to enforce the demand, if objected to by Mr. Whitney, to whom the subpœna duces tecum was directed, should be reserved. Whereupon the resolution was adopted without further objection.

On January 25[3] Mr. Whitney, who had previously declined to answer certain questions and to produce certain papers, filed with the committee a written protest, which was, by vote of the committee, ordered to be read.

In this protest the witness declared that the committee, in calling for an indefinite mass of papers, many of them private, had exceeded their inquisitorial power. The resolution under which they acted provided for three branches of investigation—first, the Treasury Department and its officers; secondly, "the several banks employed for the deposit of the public moneys;" and, lastly, himself. To the first branch of the inquiry he professed no relation, and in no manner would draw in question the power of the committee. He had answered freely every question strictly within the province of that branch of inquiry. As to the deposit banks, he denied that the mere fact of their having, in the course of their business, entered into a contract with a Department of the Government, gave one branch of the Congress any authority to examine into their business transactions or their relations with their agents. They were chartered under State laws, and were not at all under national control. There was no visitorial or supervising power over them in either branch of Congress. Even in the late Bank of the United States, chartered by Congress, it was thought necessary to confer that power by a special clause of the charter. And even then, when under examination by a committee authorized under this special provision, the bank had resisted the efforts of the committee to inquire into certain matters. The act of Congress regulating the deposits of the public moneys gave to the Secretary of the Treasury a modified right of inspection of the general accounts of the banks that should accept the public deposits, but this modified right of inspection did not imply any inherent power of Congress over the banks. It was merely a condition precedent to their being employed as depositories. As to himself personally the inquiry had two branches—first, as to whether he had been employed as agent of the banks through the procurement of the Treasury Department and had received compensation from that department; and, second, as to his business arrangements with such of the deposit banks as constituted him their agent. As to the first branch, relating as it did to the management of the Treasury Department and the disbursements of the public moneys, he had answered all questions and still held himself ready to answer all such; but the questions falling under the second branch he had not answered, on the ground that they were inquisitorial in their nature, going into the personal and private transactions and relations between himself and his employers.

I have already

referred to the summons as in the nature of a subpœna duces tecum, by which myself and my papers were cited before your committee; how sweeping and indefinite are the number and the description of the papers comprehended in the citation; how deeply it searches into my correspondence—into the documents of my business and transactions—sweeping up even all the loose memoranda I may have kept relating to my agency (no matter to what other things the same memoranda may relate). All this appears on the face of the summons, and may be sufficiently inferred from the notice already taken of that document.

If the power to send for "papers," which may be rightfully delegated to and exercised by a committee of Congress, be susceptible of any more reasonable limits than that of the power to send for "persons," I am advised that it may be clearly reduced to two simple heads:

1. All that can be denominated public papers, as belonging to the public archives of any Department of the Government, and which may be required for the information of Congress upon any matter touching the public administration.

2. Such private papers in the hands of individuals as are necessary to the advancement of justice in the exercise of the judicative power of Congress, understanding that power as limited to impeachments. Then such private papers, and such only, are included as would, if produced, be competent evidence in a criminal prosecution and in a prosecution not against the party cited to produce the papers.

The rules of procedure, long established by the courts of ordinary judicature and sanctioned by veteran experience and wisdom as indispensable to the liberty and safety of the citizen, can not be dispensed with by Congress when it assumes the tribunal and exercises its constitutional functions of criminal judicature. Now, these rules have strictly limited and guarded the process for papers in criminal proceedings—as, indeed, in civil. The paper required must be described with reasonable certainty, so as to be distinguished and identified; above all, it must be made clearly to appear, before its production is required, to be competent and pertinent evidence to the issue, or, if the issue be not yet formed (as in the case of a presentment pending before a grand jury or an impeachment in course of preparation), still competent and pertinent evidence to the issue to be formed, in case the presentment be found true or the impeachment be preferred.

Therefore the witness concluded that the committee might not demand the production of a large and miscellaneous mass of private papers, the contents of which and the conclusions from which are utterly unknown beforehand. In his view the power to send for persons and papers did not go to this extent.

The committee did not attempt to compel Mr. Whitney to answer questions which he considered inquisitorial; but in their report they say:[1]

It is not the purpose of the committee to enter into a long or detailed answer to said protest, they have not time, if they were disposed, nor is it necessary to do so. As relates to the resolution of the committee, the whole argument of the protest is based upon the idea that the committee has asserted a claim of power, in compelling the production of private papers and in examining into private transactions, which it has not done. The resolution is general, and calls for no specific paper; it calls generally for such papers, etc., as may refer to and shed light upon the inquiries directed by the House. The committee, in adopting this resolution, made it general, because they had no knowledge of the peculiar character of the papers held by the witness, whether they were of a purely private or public character, and could not, therefore, designate any particular paper for which to make a call, and because they thought it due to the witness himself that he might have the opportunity of producing such papers of a private character as he might deem necessary for the purpose of explanation if such explanation should be deemed necessary by him. Immediately following the adoption of the resolution referred to the committee made an express reservation of the question--what papers they would or would not compel the production of until the witness had determined for himself which he would or would not produce, having reference to the necessity of explanation as affecting himself. * * * The committee has not in a single instance attempted to enforce the production of any paper objected to by the witness. As to the question whether the House of Representatives has the power to direct the inquiries contained in the resolution organizing the committee, it is not deemed necessary to make any remark. In adopting the resolution it is presumed that the House well understood its power and its duty, and did not hastily institute inquiries beyond the reach of the one or the other. The committee does not claim for the House or itself the power to compel the deposit banks to expose their private concerns or private transactions to the scrutiny of the committee, nor has the committee in any instance demanded such exposure. Yet, while the committee does not assert any such claim of power, it holds it decidedly within the power of Congress to ascertain, by other competent and legal testimony, any of the transactions of the deposit banks which are calculated to affect the safety of the public funds, and to render some action on the part of Congress necessary for their security.

[1] House Report No. 193, p. 1.

1734. Members of the President's Cabinet, whose reputations and conduct have been assailed on the floor of the House, have sometimes asked for an investigation.—On February 1, 1805,[1] the Postmaster-General, Gideon Granger, having > received information from various sources, that both my public and private character and conduct have been arraigned on the floor of the House of Congress by a Member of that House, addressed a letter to the Speaker, asking an investigation. This letter was read to the House and referred to a committee.

1735. On April 3, 1850,[2] the Speaker, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from Hon. George W. Crawford, Secretary of War, asking the House to investigate the charges made against him in connection with the Galphin claim. The letter, having been read, was referred to a select committee of nine members.

1736. Vice-President Calhoun asked the House, as the grand inquest of the nation, to investigate certain charges made against his conduct as Secretary of War, and the House granted the request.

The Vice-President was represented by a Member of the House before a committee of the House which was investigating charges against him.

The proceedings of an investigating committee having brought out statements reflecting on the character of a person not directly involved in the inquiry and not a Member of either House, the House refused to incorporate his explanation in the report.

In investigating charges of an impeachable offense, the committee permitted the accused to be represented by counsel and have process to compel testimony.

Investigating committees do not always confine themselves within the strict rules of evidence.

On December 29, 1826,[3] the Speaker laid before the House the following communication from the Vice-President of the United States:

> To the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States.
> SIR: You will please to lay before the House, over which you preside, the inclosed communication, addressed to that body.
> Very respectfully, yours, etc., J. C. CALHOUN.

The inclosed communication was addressed "to the honorable Members of the House of Representatives," and began:

> An imperious sense of duty and a sacred regard to the honor of the station which I occupy compel me to approach your body, in its high character of grand inquest of the nation. * * * In claiming the investigation of the House I am sensible that under our free and happy institutions the conduct of public servants is a fair subject of the closest scrutiny; * * * but when such attacks assume the character of impeachable offenses and become in some degree official by being placed among the public records, an officer thus assailed, however base the instrument used, if conscious of innocence, can look for refuge only to the Hall of the immediate representatives of the people.

The letter goes on to state that charges had been filed in an Executive Department that he had, while Secretary of War, corruptly participated in the profits of a public contract. Therefore he challenged the freest investigation by the House. The letter was signed "J. C. Calhoun, Vice-President of the United States."

The House, without division, referred the communication to a select committee with power to send for persons and papers. Mr. John Floyd, of Virginia, was chairman of this committee, and Mr. John C. Wright, of Ohio, was second member.

On February 13, 1827,[1] Mr. Wright submitted a report, which was read and laid on the table.

Mr. Floyd "submitted to the House a paper, also purporting to be a report upon the same subject, and which contains the views of the minority thereof, in relation to the subject-matter of inquiry, which paper was read and also laid on the table."

The report states that immediately after the committee assembled they informed the Vice-President of their readiness to receive any communication that he might see fit to make. The Vice-President, in his response, expressed his wish that, to avoid the inconvenience of communication by letter, he might be represented by Mr. George McDuffie, a Member of the House. Mr. McDuffie had accordingly been admitted. The report then reviews the charges and testimony, gives the conclusions of the committee, and transmits the testimony and a written protest by Mr. McDuffie against the methods by which the committee had proceeded. This protest of Mr. McDuffie[2] was against what he termed the committee's departure—from the fundamental principles of judicial investigation and the established rules of judicial evidence.

In particular he objected that large quantities of testimony had been admitted relative to the general administration of the War Department, and disassociated from the specific charge committed to the committee; also that on that charge private letters of Major Vandeventer to Elijah Mix had been admitted as evidence against Mr. Calhoun, although they were, as lawyers well knew, "incompetent and improper testimony." Mr. McDuffie also protested against hearsay evidence.

Admitting that it is proper for the committee to assume inquisitorial powers in this investigation [he says], and in that character to ask of the witnesses not only what they know, but what they have heard from others, it must be exceedingly apparent that the only excusable purpose, even of an inquisitorial kind, for which such questions could be propounded, is the discovery of other witnesses, by whose evidence the charges might be established.

The report also shows that at the instance of Mr. McDuffie subpnœas were issued for witnesses to testify in behalf of the Vice-President.

The report proposed no action by the House, therefore the House disposed of it by ordering it to lie on the table and be printed, with the accompanying documents and the views of the minority.

After this had been done Mr. John Forsyth, of Georgia, by leave of the House, presented a letter signed C. Vandeventer, expressive of his regret that the committee had not accompanied their report by a communication of his explanatory of transactions as far as he was concerned with the subject of investigation, and praying that it might be received, and with accompanying documents be placed among the papers presented by the committee.

[2] House Report No. 79, page 221.

Mr. Vandeventer, who was chief clerk of the War Department, considered that the testimony presented by the committee contained reflections on his conduct, and therefore he wished his explanation to accompany those reflections.

Mr. Wright stated that the committee had received several such communications; but as they did not consider them pertinent to the inquiry committed to them, they had returned them to the senders. The committee did not see why they should enter upon an investigation to exculpate these individuals any more than all the other witnesses. They could not be diverted from the main object of inquiry by unnecessary investigations. To append documents and arguments to the report of the committee for the purpose of exculpating a witness would be a novel procedure, leading to many perplexities.

It was pointed out, on the other hand, that this man was a public officer, who was about to be injured by the publication in a report of matter reflecting on his character. But the reply was made that the proper course in such a case was to do as the Vice-President had done—ask for an investigation.

The House, without division, decided not to print the communication with the report, but laid it on the table.[1]

1737. President Jackson resisted with vigor the attempt of a committee of the House to secure his assistance in an investigation of his Administration.

The motion to lay on the table is used in committees.

On January 23, 1837,[2] the select committee appointed to investigate the Executive Departments of the Government agreed to a series of resolutions calling on the President and heads of Departments for information of various kinds. One of these resolutions was as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, and the heads of the several Executive Departments be directed, to furnish this committee with a list, or lists, of all officers or agents, or deputies, who have been appointed or employed and paid since the 4th of March, 1829, to the 1st of December last (if any, without authority of law, or whose names are not contained in the last printed register of public officers, commonly called the "Blue Book") by the President or either of the said heads of departments, respectively; and without nomination to, or the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States; showing the names of such officers or agents, or deputies; the sums paid to each; the services rendered; and by what authority appointed and paid; and what reasons for such appointments.

Resolved, That the various executive officers, in replying to the foregoing resolution, be requested, at the same time, to furnish a statement of the period at which any innovations, not authorized by law, (if such exist), had their origin, their causes, and the necessity which has required their continuance.

By order of the committee the chairman transmitted to the President of the United States a copy of the above resolutions. The copy transmitted in the letter of the chairman was attested by the clerk of the committee.

On January 27 Mr. Andrew Jackson, jr., secretary of the President, entered the committee room and delivered to the chairman, Mr. Henry A. Wise, of Virginia, a letter addressed to Mr. Wise and giving the President's reasons for not complying with the request of the committee. The President begins his letter by saying that the resolution adopted by the House authorizing the investigation raised an issue with his annual message, which had stated that the Executive Departments were in excellent condition. After referring to speeches made in the House by Mr. Wise and other Members on this subject, and the appointment of the special committee, he says:

The first proceeding of the investigating committee is to pass a series of resolutions, which, though amended in their passage, were, as understood, introduced by you, calling on the President and the heads of the Departments—not to answer to any specific charge; not to explain any alleged abuse; not to give information as to any particular transaction; but, assuming that they have been guilty of the charges alleged, calls upon them to furnish evidence against themselves. After the reiterated charges you have made, it was to have been expected that you would have been prepared to reduce them to specifications, and that the committee would then proceed to investigate the matters alleged. But, instead of this, you resort to generalities even more vague than your original accusations; and, in open violation of the Constitution, and of that well-established and wise maxim "that all men are presumed to be innocent until proven guilty, according to the established rules of law" you request myself and the heads of the Departments to become our own accusers, and to furnish the evidence to convict ourselves; and this call purports to be founded on the authority of that body in which alone, by the Constitution, the power of impeaching is vested. The heads of Departments may answer such a request as they please, provided they do not withdraw their own time and that of the officers under their direction from the public business to the injury thereof. To that business I shall direct them to devote themselves in preference to any illegal and unconstitutional call for information, no matter from what source it may come or however anxious they may be to meet it. For myself, I shall repel all such attempts as an invasion of the principles of justice, as well as of the Constitution; and I shall esteem it my sacred duty to the people of the United States to resist them as I would the establishment of a Spanish inquisition.

The President then lectures still further the chairman of the committee, and concludes with an expression of astonishment that the House should make such a call on the Executive when there were six standing committees of the House specifically charged with examining the details of expenditures in the Departments.

On January 30 Mr. Wise offered these resolutions in the committee:

Resolved, That the letter of the President of the United States, dated the 26th instant, addressed to the chairman of this committee and handed to him by the private secretary of the President in presence of the committee, is an official attack of the Executive upon the proceedings of the House of Representatives and of this committee, and upon the privileges of Members of both Houses of Congress, and opposes unlawful and unconstitutional resistance to the just powers of the House of Representatives and of the committee: Therefore,

Resolved, That the chairman of the committee be directed to report to the House his letter and the resolutions of this committee inclosed, addressed to the President, and the letter of the President in reply thereto, dated the 26th instant, and to submit to the consideration of the House the propriety and necessity of adopting measures to defend its proceedings; to protect the privileges of its Members; and to enforce its just powers and those of its committees; to enable this committee to discharge the duties devolved upon it by the resolution of the 17th instant, adopted by the House of Representatives.

These resolutions were laid on the table by a vote of 6 yeas, 3 nays.

On February 1 an attempt was made to consider and amend them, but it failed.

The committee in their report say:

Neither did the committee discover in the letter of the President any attack upon the proceedings of the House or the privileges of its Members, for the plain reason that neither the House nor its Members have any privilege to call upon parties accused to criminate themselves. Consequently they could not sanction the resolution offered by the chairman to censure the President for his emphatic repulsion of what he construed to mean charges of personal accusation, and calls for self-crimination; nor could they consent to put a stop to the public business by getting up a debate in the House to enforce any pretended "privilege" of the House or its committees to compel public officers to furnish evidence against themselves.

Mr. Wise, in his minority views, argues at length the proposition that the President, by his letter, invade the privileges and prerogatives of the House.[1]

The various heads of Departments replied to the call of the committee in a manner similar to the reply of the President, stating that they could not furnish evidence to criminate themselves, as the committee had demanded.

1738. In 1837 a committee discussed the authority of the House in calling for papers from the Executive Departments and the kind of papers properly subject to its demand.—On March 3, 1837,[2] the select committee appointed on January 17 to inquire into the condition of the Executive Departments of the Government, made a report, which takes the following view of the power to send for persons and papers:

One of the powers conferred on the committee by the resolution of the House was the power to send for persons and papers. * * * At best, this is a vague and not well-defined power; incidental, and not derived from any express provision in the Constitution. In its exercise, therefore, there should be some limitation; and it should be carefully used only in cases where the direct legislation of Congress, the protection and enforcement of the privileges and rules of either House, or manifest public interest imperatively demand it. It is a judicial power, which Congress can exercise merely as a power incidental to the power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper."

To construe it into an unlimited power for a committee of this House to bring before them the persons of citizens from any part of the Union at their own arbitrary will, without just cause, or to compel the surrender of all papers which a committee might see fit to send for, would be to set up an incidental power of the House nowhere expressly recognized in the Constitution, which would totally annul one of the express provisions of the Constitution, to secure the citizen against these very outrages, viz, "the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures."

In applying this principle to the calls which were proposed, in this investigation, upon the President and heads of Departments, for statements and papers, the committee have considered that a public officer is not put without the pale of the protection afforded to other citizens against being required to furnish statements or evidence to accuse himself; and against unreasonable demands for papers not constituting a part of the public documents; and, in their opinion, the call for papers ought to be limited to such as are already made and on file in the Departments.

To every call for statements going to show any act of a public officer without authority of law, and for papers coming within the above description, the committee have uniformly responded in the affirmative, while, as a general rule, they have felt bound to reject all calls for statements touching motives and acts not shown to be unlawful, if proved, and for all real or supposed papers, private in their character, and not coming within the denomination of public papers on file.

If it be contended that this distinction enables a public officer to exclude from the files of his department whatever he chooses to consider private and which ought to be placed there, the answer is that this can not alter the powers of a committee of the House to send for papers nor change the nature of the call; and that, if any paper, shown to be of a public character, and such as ought to be placed on file or record, is excluded there is just ground of accusation against the officer for violation of duty. But the bare suspicion that papers which ought to be on file are not there can not warrant a call for all the personal and private papers of such officer in order that the committee may decide by inspection whether there are any which ought to go into the public files.

[1] The majority of the committee who made the report consisted of Messrs. Dutee J. Pearce, of Rhode Island; Henry A. Muhlenberg, of Pennsylvania; Edward A. Hannegan, of Indiana; Gorham Parks, of Maine; Abijah Mann, of New York, and John Chaney, of Ohio.

[2] House Report No. 194, pp. 6 and 7, second session Twenty-fourth Congress. The members of the committee joining in this report were Messrs. Dutee J. Pearce, of Rhode Island; Henry A. Muhlenberg, of Pennsylvania; Edward A. Hannegan, of Indiana; Gorham Parks, of Maine; Abijah Mann, of New York, and John Chaney, of Ohio.

Besides, in calls made by Congress on the President or heads of Departments, the reservation is impliedly established, by usage, of such papers as, in their opinion, can not be communicated without injury to the public service. Consequently, all calls for papers must be subject to this discretion of the public officer of whom they are required; and if he abuses that discretion he must be held responsible for it in some other form of investigation into his official conduct.

1739. A committee of the House declined to prefer any charge against a public officer before requiring him to furnish certain records of his office.—In 1839,[1] in the course of the investigation into the affairs of the New York custom-house by a select committee, a call was made upon the collector to furnish the committee with certain correspondence. In response the collector questioned the authority of the committee to make the demand on him, under the language of the resolution creating the committee:

That the said committee be required to inquire into and make report of any defalcations among the collectors, receivers, and disbursers of the public money, which may now exist; the length of time they have existed, and the causes which led to them.

This being the language, the collector requested, before he sent the correspondence asked, that he be informed whether the committee or any of its members charged him with being a defaulter.

The committee responded by repeating the call for the correspondence and by agreeing to the following resolution:

Resolved, That this committee can not recognize any authority or right whatever in any collector, receiver, or disburser of the public money to call upon "the committee," or "any of its members," to prefer or to disavow a charge of his "being a defaulter," before such officer sends "the correspondence" of his "office," when required under the authority of the House of Representatives "to send for persons and papers," to enable its committee "to inquire into, and make reports of, any defalcations among collectors, receivers, and disbursers of the public money which may now exist;" nor can this committee or "any of its members" report whether Mr. Hoyt is or is not now a defaulter until by examination of the "persons and papers" for which it has sent and will send it shall discover "who are the defaulters, the amount of defalcations, the length of time they have existed, and the causes which led to them." And when the committee shall have found the facts embraced by these inquiries or closed its investigation it will make a report thereof to the House of Representatives.

Collector Hoyt responded by asking a full investigation of his accounts and transmitting the letters called for.

1740. In 1837 a committee took the view that the House might inquire into alleged corrupt violations of duty by the Executive only with impeachment in view.—On March 3, 1837,[2] the select committee appointed on January 17 to inquire into the condition of the Executive Departments of the Government,[3] made a report which takes the following view of the investigation:

[1] Third session Twenty-fifth Congress, House Report No. 313, pp 326, 349.

[2] Second session Twenty-fourth Congress, House Report No. 194

[3] The committee consisted of Messrs. Henry A. Wise, of Virginia; Dutee J. Pearce, of Rhode Island; Henry A. Muhlenberg, of Pennsylvania; Robert B. Campbell, of South Carolina; Edward A. Hannegan, of Indiana; Gorham Parks, of Maine; Levi Lincoln, of Massachusetts; Abijah Mann, of New York, and John Chaney, of Ohio. Messrs. Wise, Lincoln, and Campbell did not concur in this report.

The power of the House to institute an inquiry of this kind into the conduct of the Executive, directly personal in its application, can nowhere exist, unless it be an incident of the "sole power of impeachment" which is given to the House of Representatives by the Constitution. This power extends to the President and all civil officers of the United States on charges of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors. Such, in effect, were the representations upon which the resolution creating this committee was founded and the necessity of its adoption urged before the House. Such is the nature of the allegations formally put upon the journal of the committee by the mover of the resolution in the House, the chairman. * * *

It follows, therefore, that the only constitutional power under which the House of Representatives, as a coordinate branch of the Government, could constitute a committee to inquire into alleged "corrupt violations of duty" by another coordinate branch of the Government (the Executive) is the "power of impeachment."

By the terms of the resolution referred to the committee, and by the express declaration of the mover of that resolution, as well as by the legal construction of the constitutional powers of the House, this inquiry can not be brought within the only other clause of the Constitution which, by any possible implication, can be made applicable to it, viz: "that the Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."

The allegation is nowhere made that the laws are defective in relation to the "powers vested in any Department or officer" of the Government, and that this inquiry is made to enable Congress to "make laws;" but the charges are against the individual officers for "corrupt violation" of existing laws; and the ground is expressly taken by the chairman, in his declaration under oath, "that the whole Government needs reform, and more patriotic and honest men to administer it."

The committee, therefore, conceive that they were fully warranted and imperatively required to regard this investigation in the light of a preliminary inquiry into facts and evidence to show whether a process of impeachment ought not to be instituted by the House of Representatives against the Executive and the heads of Departments.

1741. The House, in 1824, investigated, on application of the United States minister to Mexico, a controversy on a public matter between him and the Secretary of the Treasury.

The committee investigating charges against Secretary of the Treasury W. H. Crawford permitted him to be represented by counsel and to produce testimony.

Instance wherein a committee, empowered to sit during recess, was directed to file its report with the Clerk of the House.

On April 19, 1824,[1] the Speaker communicated to the House an address of Ninian Edwards, late a Senator of the United States from the State of Illinois, complaining that injustice had been done him in a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, William H. Crawford, accompanying the correspondence between the Treasury Department and the banks in the different States upon the subject of the deposits of public money in said banks, exculpating himself, and also preferring certain charges against the said Secretary.

The address contained two general charges against the Secretary: One of mismanaging the public funds, under which various illegal transactions were alleged in reference to the deposit of the public money in certain banks and the mode in which such moneys were allowed, afterwards, to be repaid; the other, imputing to the Secretary the suppression of papers and documents or failing to communicate them when they ought to have been communicated in answer to resolutions of the Houses of Congress.

In this address Mr. Edwards claims the right to be heard, not only because such a right would be accorded to the humblest individual, but because it was due also to the nation, in view of his late position as Senator and his present position as minister to Mexico; and also because of the exceptional circumstances of the case. He was called upon by the House of Representatives at the last session and was subjected to an examination which has not its parallel in the records of any free country.

An attempt having been made to impeach his credibility, he should be allowed to repel the attack.

Debate arose as to the disposition of the address. It was proposed to print it, but Mr. Daniel Webster, of Massachusetts, objected that it was incompatible with the dignity of the House to convert it into an arena where prominent men might carry on their personal contests. If an investigation was to be made the letter might be printed for information of the House, otherwise he should object.

The House finally adopted an order that the address be referred to a select committee with power to send for persons and papers. Messrs. John Floyd, of Virginia, Edward Livingston, of New York, Daniel Webster, of Massachusetts, John Randolph, of Virginia, John W. Taylor, of New York, Duncan McArthur, of Ohio, and George W. Owen, of Alabama, were appointed on this committee.

On April 22[1] Mr. Floyd, by the instructions of the committee, reported the following minutes of the proceedings of the committee:

Voted, That the committee ought to proceed to make inquiry into the matters contained in the said communication and connected therewith.

Voted, That for the purpose of such inquiry the attendance of said Ninian Edwards upon the committee, to be by them examined, is requisite, and that his attendance be accordingly ordered.

Voted, That the chairman do inform the House of the foregoing resolutions of the committee; and, inasmuch as it is suggested that the said Ninian Edwards is about to leave the United States on foreign diplomatic service,

Voted, That the chairman do move the House that information of the said communication, of the votes of the House thereon, and of the foregoing resolutions of the committee be communicated to the President.

After debate this motion was agreed to.

On April 23[2] President Monroe, by message, acknowledged the receipt of the resolution of the House, and informed the House that he had already instructed Mr. Edwards not to proceed to his mission, but to await the call of the committee of the House.

On May 25[3] Mr. Livingston made a report from the committee. The report states that immediately upon their appointment the committee communicated a copy of Mr. Edwards's address to the Secretary of the Treasury and also ordered the attendance of Mr. Edwards. The report then goes at length into the charges against the Secretary of the Treasury and appends, with other documents, the answer, in writing, to the charges of Mr. Edwards. The Secretary did not appear personally before the committee, but in his response he states that he is willing to do so. The committee state that the investigation should not be terminated until

Mr. Edwards shall have been examined, and recommend that they be allowed to sit in the recess after the adjournment of the session in order to complete the work.

Mr. Livingston then moved the adoption of the following:

Ordered, That the committee to which was referred the address of Ninian Edwards be required to sit after the adjournment of the House for such time as shall be necessary in their judgment for further examination; that any additional report which may be made by them be filed in the office of the Clerk of the House; and that any three members of the committee be a quorum for the transaction of business.

After debate, on May 26, the House struck out that portion of the order making three members of the committee a quorum and added a clause providing that the report, after being filed with the Clerk, should be by him printed and forwarded to Members of Congress.

A further order, adopted May 27,[1] empowering the Clerk to pay witnesses and the expenses of subpœnaing them, on certificate of the chairman, closed the proceedings of the House.

In making their final report,[2] the committee state that Mr. Edwards attended the committee in obedience to summons, was examined as a witness (under oath), was cross-examined by a gentleman attending on behalf of the Secretary of the Treasury, and this testimony, together with various documents and reports were communicated as part of the report. A paper in reply to the communication heretofore received by the committee from the Secretary, and another in the nature of an argument on the whole case, had also been presented by Mr. Edwards and considered by the committee. The committee express the opinion that nothing had been proved to impeach the integrity of the Secretary, but beyond that statement content themselves with presenting the facts and testimony.

An examination of the report shows that among those summoned and examined as witnesses were United States Senators Thomas H. Benton, of Missouri, and James Noble, of Indiana.[3] Also several Members of the House were examined.

It appears from the report that during the examination before the committee the Secretary of the Treasury was permitted to be represented by counsel and to summon witnesses in his own behalf.

1742. A letter from an individual, charging an officer of the Army with corruption, was considered and an investigation was ordered.—On April 13, 1816,[4] the Speaker laid before the House a letter from William Simmons, late accountant of the War Department, charging Col. James Thomas, deputy quartermaster-general in the armies of the United States, with fraud and misapplication of public moneys, which was read and laid on the table.[5]

The following resolution was then presented by a Member:

Resolved, That a committee of five members be appointed to inquire into the state of the accounts rendered and settled of James Thomas, late a deputy quartermaster-general of the United States, and also to examine all accounts connected therewith; that the said committee have power to send for persons and effects.

[3] As this examination occurred in the recess of Congress it was impossible to obtain permission of the Senate for their attendance as witnesses.

[5] Under the present usages of the House, such letters, which are in the nature of memorials, are not presented in open House, but are referred through the Clerk. (See sec. 3364 of Vol. IV of this work.)

There was objection to this resolution on the ground that information on the subject had already been called for from the proper Department; that it was improper to countenance individuals in bringing private quarrels to Congress; that the letter was not couched in proper terms; and that the power to send for persons and papers should not be lightly given.

On the other hand, it was agreed that every person who came before the House on a matter of public concern was entitled to a hearing, and that the circumstances of the case suggested the propriety of an investigation.

The resolution was agreed to, and the committee, on April 24, reported the results of the inquiry.

1743. While a committee of the House reported it inexpedient for the House to investigate the charges of a subordinate against a captain in the Navy, they expressly asserted the power of the House so to do.—On February 22, 1839,[1] Mr. Charles Naylor, of Pennsylvania, from the select committee appointed on the 14th instant, "to inquire into the official conduct of Capt. Jesse D. Elliott, of the United States Navy, while in command of the squadron in the Mediterranean, in the years 1837 and 1838, and particularly into the allegations of tyranny and oppression toward the officers under his command," and to which was also referred, on the same day, the letter from the Secretary of the Navy transmitting copies of the charges preferred by Charles C. Barton, a passed midshipman, against the said Captain Elliott, made a report[2] under the direction of a majority of said committee, recommending the adoption of the following resolutions, viz:

Resolved, That an interference by the House of Representatives in the disputes that occur between subordinate officers of the Navy and their superiors, commanding squadrons, is a power which ought at all times to be exercised with great caution, and is calculated to produce insubordination in that important arm of the national defense; but, in the opinion of this committee, it is competent for the representatives of the people to investigate any abuses alleged to be committed by officers in command of squadrons, and to provide, by law, against a recurrence of such abuses; and, moreover, to investigate and ascertain whether the head of the Navy Department may have used such means as are placed in his hands by law to punish and prevent any such alleged abuses.

Resolved, That the most appropriate remedy for such subordinate officers is an appeal to the Secretary of the Navy for a court of inquiry to investigate the charges exhibited against their superiors; and from this decision the party aggrieved may appeal to the President, who, by the Constitution, is Commander in Chief of the Navy, he as well as the Secretary being liable to impeachment for a willful or corrupt violation or neglect of duty.

Then follow other resolutions reciting that for lack of time it is inexpedient for the House to undertake the investigation.

Mr. Seargent S. Prentiss, of Mississippi, moved to recommit the report, with instructions to strike out from the resolutions such parts as related to the propriety of the investigation.

Pending consideration of this motion the whole subject was laid on the table.

1744. The House determined to investigate an allegation that the decision of the Senate in an impeachment case had been determined by improper influences.

The question of order being raised that a pending resolution reflected on the Senate, the Speaker held that it was a matter for the House and not the Chair to pass on.

On May 16, 1868,[1] Mr. John A. Bingham, of Ohio, from the Managers of the impeachment of the President, offered the following resolution:

Whereas information has come to the Managers which seems to them to furnish probable cause to believe that corrupt means have been used to influence the determination of the Senate upon the articles of impeachment exhibited to the Senate by the House of Representatives against the President of the United States; Therefore,

Be it resolved, That for the further and more efficient prosecution of the impeachment of the President, the Managers be directed and instructed to summon and examine witnesses under oath, to send for persons and papers, to employ a stenographer, and to appoint a subcommittee to take testimony, the expenses thereof to be paid from the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. John W. Chanler, of New York, made the point of order that as this resolution reflected on the Senate it was not proper for the House to consider it.

The Speaker [2] held that the Chair could not decide that question, it being a question for the consideration of the House.

The House agreed to the preamble and resolution, yeas 88, nays 14.

1745. An instance wherein the House investigated political troubles within a State.—In 1845 [3] the House investigated the troubles within the State of Rhode Island, caused by the efforts to substitute a constitution for the old colonial charter.

1746. Various instances of investigations by the House.—On February 28, 1876,[4] the House, on recommendation of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, directed that committee to investigate into the connection of the United States minister at the court of St. James with the Emma mine, so called.

1747. In 1879 [5] a committee of the House investigated the conduct of Supervisor of Elections John I. Davenport, of New York, appointed by a judge of the United States circuit court and not removable by impeachment.

1748. On May 12, 1892,[6] the House authorized the investigation of the employment of Pinkerton detectives by companies engaged in interstate commerce and the transportation of the mails.

1749. The Speaker has considered it his duty to lay before the House a communication from a suspended consul-general who asked an investigation.—On January 23, 1878,[7] Mr. Speaker Randall laid before the House a letter from John C. Myers, "consul-general (under suspension) at Shanghai, China," addressed to the Speaker, requesting that an inclosed statement of the condition of his office be presented to the House and that an investigation be made.

Mr. Omar D. Conger, of Michigan, raised the question that the communication should be sent to the Department.

The Speaker said:

This was sent to the Speaker, and it is the duty of the Speaker to transfer it to the House. The House can then do with it what it pleases.

The communication was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Houston, of Alabama, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be authorized to send for persons and papers and examine witnesses on oath in relation to the charges made against John C. Watrous, judge of the United States court for the western district of the State of Texas.

1751. Resolution of the House authorizing a committee to make an investigation.—On April 21, 1906,[1] Mr. Charles H. Grosvenor, of Ohio, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to by the House:

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, directed to appoint from the membership of the House a committee of five, with full power and whose duty it shall be to make a full and complete investigation of the management of the Government Hospital for the Insane and report their findings and conclusions to the House; said committee is empowered to send for persons and papers, to summon and compel the attendance of witnesses, to administer oaths, to take testimony and reduce the same to writing, and to employ such clerical and stenographic help as may be necessary, all expenses to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

1752. The resolutions of the House creating, empowering, and instructing the select committee which in 1856 investigated affairs in the Territory of Kansas.

The Kansas committee of 1856 was empowered by the House to employ or dismiss clerks and assistant sergeants-at-arms and to administer oaths to them.

The Kansas committee of 1856 was empowered to send for persons and papers and to arrest and bring before the House any witness in contempt.

The House requested the President, if necessary, to afford military protection to the Kansas committee of 1856.

On March 19, 1856,[2] after debate and the consideration of several propositions, the House adopted the following resolutions:

Resolved, That a committee of three of the members of this House, to be appointed by the Speaker, shall proceed to inquire into and collect evidence in regard to the troubles in Kansas generally and particularly in regard to any fraud or force attempted or practiced in reference to any of the elections which have taken place in said Territory, either under the law organizing said Territory or under any pretended law which may be alleged to have taken effect therein since, that they shall fully investigate and take proof of all violent and tumultuous proceedings in said Territory, at any time since the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska act, whether engaged in by residents of said Territory or by any person or persons from elsewhere going into said Territory and doing, or encouraging others to do, any act of violence or public disturbance against the laws of the United States, or the rights, peace, and safety of the residents of said Territory; and for that purpose said committee shall have full power to send for and examine, and take copies of, all such papers, public records, and proceedings as in their judgment will be useful in the premises; and also to send for persons, and examine them on oath or affirmation as to matters within their knowledge touching the matters of the said investigation, and said committee, by their chairman, shall have power to administer all necessary oaths or affirmations connected with their aforesaid duties.

Resolved further, That said committee may hold their investigations at such places and times as to them may seem advisable, and that they have leave of absence from the duties of this House until they shall have completed such investigation; that they be authorized to employ one or more clerks and one or more assistant sergeants-at-arms to aid them in their investigations, and may administer to them an oath or affirmation faithfully to perform the duties assigned to them respectively, and to keep secret all matters which may come to their knowledge touching such investigation as said committee shall direct, until the report of the same shall be submitted to this House; and said committee may discharge any such clerk or assistant sergeant-at-arms for neglect of duty or disregard of instructions in the premises, and employ others under like regulations.

Resolved further, That if any person shall in any manner obstruct or hinder said committee, or attempt so to do, in their said investigation, or shall refuse to attend on said committee, and to give evidence when summoned for that purpose, or shall refuse to produce any paper, book, public record, or proceeding in their possession or control, to said committee when so required, or shall make any disturbance where said committee are holding their sittings, said committee may, if they see fit, cause any and every such person to be arrested by said assistant sergeant-at-arms, and brought before this House to be dealt with as for a contempt.

Resolved further, That for the purpose of defraying the expenses of said commission there be, and hereby is, appropriated the sum of ten thousand dollars, to be paid out of the contingent fund of this House.

Resolved further, That the President of the United States be, and is hereby, requested to furnish to said committee, should they be met with any serious opposition, by bodies of lawless men, in the discharge of their duties aforesaid, such aid from any military force as may at the time be convenient to them, as may be necessary to remove such opposition, and enable said committee, without molestation, to proceed with their labors.

Resolved further, That when said committee shall have completed said investigation they report all the evidence so collected to this House.

This committee as finally appointed consisted of Messrs. William A. Howard, of Michigan; John Sherman, of Ohio, and Mordecai Oliver, of Missouri.

They reported on July 1.[1]

1753. The House sometimes enlarges the powers of a select committee after it has been created.

The House sometimes directs the Sergeant-at-Arms to attend the sittings of a committee and serve the subpœnas.

An investigating committee being empowered to sit during recess, the Speaker was authorized and directed to sign subpœnas as during a session.

On July 17, 1861,[2] Mr. William S. Holman, of Indiana, from the select committee appointed to investigate departmental contracts, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the provisions of the resolution appointing the select committee to inquire into and report in relation to certain contracts made by the departments for provisions, supplies, etc., be so extended as to embrace an inquiry into all the facts and circumstances of all the contracts and agreements already made, and all such contracts and agreements hereafter to be made, prior to the final report of the committee, by or with any department of the Government, in any wise connected with or growing out of the operations of the Government in suppressing the rebellion against its constituted authorities.

Resolved, That the said committee be authorized to sit during the recess of Congress, at such times and places as may be deemed proper.

Resolved, That said committee be authorized to employ a stenographer as clerk at the usual rate of compensation.

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House be directed to attend in person, or by assistant, the sittings of the committee, and serve all the subpœnas put into his hands by the committee, pay the fees of all witnesses, and the necessary expenses of the committee.

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House, during the recess of Congress, is hereby authorized and directed to issue subpœnas to witnesses, upon the request of the committee, in the same manner as during the session of Congress.

[1] On March 25, 1856 (First session Thirty-fourth Congress, Journal, p. 719; Globe, p. 728), on motion of Mr. Percy Walker, of Alabama, the House agreed to this resolution:

"Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire and report to this House whether the Kansas Investigating Committee have the power to coerce the attendance of witnesses and punish for contempts."

It does not appear that the committee reported.

[2] First session Thirty-seventh Congress, Journal, p. 98; Globe, pp. 168–171.

After debate as to the propriety of authorizing an investigation of such wide scope, the House, by a vote of 49 yeas to 77 nays, refused to lay the resolutions on the table.

The resolutions were then agreed to, yeas 81; nays 42.

1754. Committees of investigation, by authority of the House expressly given, often carry on their work by subcommittees.—In 1869,[1] the House authorized a subcommittee of the Committee of Elections to be appointed by the committee, with power to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, and investigate the elections in Louisiana, the investigation to take place during the approaching recess of Congress.

1755. On January 16, 1874,[2] the House agreed to the following:

Resolved, That the chairman of any subcommittee of the Committee on Patents be authorized to administer oaths in the investigation of any matter pending before such subcommittee.

1756. On April 7, 1876,[3] Mr. Washington C. Whitthorne, of Tennessee, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That for the purpose of enabling the Committee of this House on Naval Affairs to discharge the duties imposed upon them by the House resolution instructing them to inquire into certain alleged abuses and frauds at the different navy-yards of the United States, and the misapplication of appropriation made for the construction of eight vessels of war, * * * it is hereby directed that said committee, through the subcommittee appointed for that purpose, consisting of Messrs. Whitthorne, Jones, Harris, and Burleigh, shall make said investigation, as far as it relates to the Philadelphia and League Island navy-yards, at said yard and at the city of Philadelphia.

On April 27 a similar resolution was agreed to, authorizing another subcommittee of the Naval Affairs Committee to make investigation at the Brooklyn Navy-Yard and in the cities of New York and Brooklyn.

1757. On May 23, 1876,[4] Mr. Joseph C. S. Blackburn, of Kentucky, by unanimous consent, submitted this resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Louisiana investigating committee, while in New Orleans, have authority to take testimony by subcommittees in their discretion, and that the chairmen of such subcommittees be authorized to administer oaths to witnesses.

1758. On June 20, 1876,[5] Mr. Earley F. Poppleton, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Expenditures on Public Buildings, submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures on Public Buildings be, and is hereby, authorized to send a subcommittee of said committee to New York City and such other places as the committee may deem proper and necessary for the purpose of taking testimony in matters of expenditures on public buildings in said city and elsewhere, and that said subcommittee have power to send for persons and papers and employ a stenographer, and the chairman of such subcommittee shall have power to administer oaths.

1759. On April 21, 1890,[1] on motion of Mr. John F. Lacey, of Iowa, the Committee on Elections reported the following resolution, which was agreed to by the House:

Resolved, That the subcommittee of the Committee on Elections, charged with the investigation of the contest of Clayton v. Breckinridge, are authorized to employ such deputy sergeants-at-arms, not exceeding three, and additional stenographers, as may be deemed necessary by them for their assistance in said investigation.

1760. A committee charged with an investigation may ask the House to broaden the scope of its authority.—On January 12, 1857,[2] the select committee appointed to investigate certain alleged combinations among Members for preventing or furthering legislation corruptly, directed its chairman to report to the House for consideration a resolution to broaden the scope of the committee's authority, so that it might not only investigate as to corrupt transactions in relation to bills "now pending" before the House, but also in regard to bills before the House at any time during the session. On January 13 the committee were notified by the Clerk of the House that the resolution had been agreed to by the House.

1761. A committee making an investigation sometimes makes a report asking the House for instructions.—On April 12, 1850,[3] Mr. Armistead Burt, of South Carolina, reported from the select committee appointed to investigate the connection of Hon. George W. Crawford, Secretary of War, with the Galphin claim, that the committee were in some doubt as to the extent of the investigation which they were empowered to make, and asking the House for instructions. The House thereupon agreed to a resolution instructing the committee. Mr. Burt made his report asking for the instructions by unanimous consent.

1762. The House, by general order, has revoked the powers of all its existing committees of investigation.—On November 25, 1867,[4] the House passed a general order revoking leaves to committees to send for persons and papers, examine witnesses, or travel at the public expense.

1763. The two Houses, by concurrent resolution, constituted a joint select committee of investigation, with power to send for persons and papers and sit during the recess of Congress.

By concurrent resolution the two Houses empowered the Vice-President and Speaker to sign subpœnas during the recess of Congress.

On January 13, 1864,[5] the Senate sent to the House a concurrent resolution, which, as amended by the House and concurred in by the Senate, had this final form:

Resolved, That a joint committee of three members of the Senate and four Members of the House of Representatives be appointed to inquire into the conduct and expenditures of the present war; and may further inquire into all the facts and circumstances of contracts and agreements already made, and such contracts and agreements hereafter to be made, prior to the final report of the committee, by or with any Department of the Government, in anywise connected with or growing out of the operations of the Government in suppressing the rebellion against its constituted authority; and that the said committee shall have authority to sit during the sessions of either House of Congress, and during the recess of Congress, and at such times and places as said committee shall deem proper, and also employ a stenographer as clerk, at the usual rate of compensation.

And be it further resolved, That the said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, and that the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House or of the Senate, as the said committee may direct, shall attend in person, or by assistant, the sittings of the said committee, and serve all subpœnas put into his hands by the committee, pay the fees of all witnesses, and the necessary and proper expenses of the committee.

And be it further resolved, That the Speaker of the House, or the Vice-President and President of the Senate, shall be authorized to issue subpœnas to witnesses during the recess of Congress upon the request of the committee in the same manner as during the sessions of Congress, and said committee shall have authority to report in either branch of Congress at any time.

1764. In 1871,[1] the House and Senate agreed to the following concurrent resolution, which originated in the Senate and was amended in the House:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring), That a joint committee consisting of seven Senators and fourteen Representatives be appointed, whose duty it shall be to inquire into the condition of the late insurrectionary States so far as regards the execution of the laws and the safety of the lives and property of the citizens of the United States, with leave to report at any time during the next or any subsequent session of Congress the result of their investigations to either or both Houses of Congress, with such recommendations as they may deem expedient; that said committee be authorized to employ clerks and stenographers, to sit during the recess, and to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths and take testimony, and to visit at their discretion, through subcommittees, any portions of said States during the recess of Congress; and all expenses of said committee shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, upon vouchers approved by the chairman of said committee.

1765. Instance of legislation directing and empowering executive officers of the Government to investigate and report.—On February 12, 1906,[2] the Senate passed the following joint resolution (S. R. 32) instructing the Interstate Commerce Commission to make examinations into the subject of railroad discriminations and monopolies, and report on the same from time to time:

Whereas persons engaged or wishing to engage in mining and shipping bituminous coal and other products from one State of the United States to other States of the United States complain, * * * etc.: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be authorized and instructed to immediately inquire, * * * etc.

On February 13[3] this resolution was received in the House and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

On February 23[4] the House agreed to the joint resolution with the following amendments:

Strike out the preample and all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That the Interstate Commerce Commission be, and is hereby, authorized and instructed immediately to inquire, investigate, and report to Congress, or to the President when Congress is not in session, from time to time, as the investigation proceeds:

"First. Whether any common carriers by railroad, subject to the interstate-commerce act, or either of them, own or have any interest in, by means of stock ownership in other corporations or otherwise, any of the coal or oil which they or either of them, directly or through other companies which they control or in which they have an interest, carry over their or any of their lines as common carriers, or in any manner own, control, or have any interest in coal lands or properties or oil lands or properties.

"Second. Whether the officers of any of the carrier companies aforesaid, or any of them, or any person or persons charged with the duty of distributing cars or furnishing facilities to shippers, are interested, either directly or indirectly, by means of stock ownership or otherwise, in corporations or companies owning, operating, leasing, or otherwise interested in any coal mines, coal properties, or coal traffic, oil, oil properties, or oil traffic over the railroads with which they or any of them are connected or by which they or any of them are employed.

"Third. Whether there is any contract, combination in the form of trust, or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, in which any common carrier engaged in the transportation of coal or oil is interested, or to which it is a party; and whether any such common carrier monopolizes or attempts to monopolize or combines or conspires with any other carrier, company or companies, person or persons, to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce in coal or oil or traffic therein among the several States, or with foreign nations, and whether or not, and if so to what extent, such carriers, or any of them, limit or control, directly or indirectly, the output of coal mines or the price of coal and oil fields or the price of oil.

"Fourth. If the Interstate Commerce Commission shall find that the facts, or any of them, set forth in the three paragraphs above do exist, then that it be further required to report as to the effect of such relationship, ownership, or interest in coal or coal properties and coal traffic, or oil, oil properties, or oil traffic aforesaid, or such contracts or combinations in form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, or such monopoly or attempt to monopolize or combine or conspire as aforesaid, upon such person or persons as may be engaged independently of any other persons in mining coal or producing oil and shipping the same, or other products, who may desire to so engage, or upon the general public as consumers of such coal or oil.

"Fifth. That said Commission be also required to investigate and report the system of car supply and distribution in effect upon the several railway lines engaged in the transportation of coal or oil as aforesaid, and whether said systems are fair and equitable, and whether the same are carried out fairly and properly; and whether said carriers, or any of them, discriminate against shippers or parties wishing to become shippers over their several lines, either in the matter of distribution of cars or in furnishing facilities or instrumentalities connected with receiving, forwarding, or carrying coal or oil as aforesaid.

"Sixth. That said Commission be also required to report as to what remedy it can suggest to cure the evils above set forth, if they exist.

"Seventh. That said Commission be also required to report any facts or conclusions which it may think pertinent to the general inquiry above set forth.

"Eighth. That said Commission be required to make this investigation at its earliest possible convenience and to furnish the information above required from time to time and as soon as it can be done consistent with the performance of its public duty."

Amend the title so as to read:

"Joint resolution instructing the Interstate Commerce Commission to make examinations into the subject of railroad discriminations and monopolies in coal and oil and report on the same from time to time."

This amendment was agreed to by the Senate and the joint resolution became a law.[1]

1766. Decision of the Supreme Court that a law of Congress empowering the Federal courts to compel testimony before the Interstate Commerce Commission was constitutional.

Discussion of the power of investigation possessed by Congress in relation to the individual's right of privacy.

On May 26, 1894,[2] the Supreme Court of the United States decided the case of Interstate Commerce Commission v. Brimson, Mr. Justice Harlan delivering the opinion of the court, and Mr. Justice Brewer, with the concurrence of the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Jackson, filing a dissenting opinion. The case involved was an appeal which brought up for review a judgment of the circuit court, delivered on a petition of the Interstate Commerce Commission, based on the twelfth section of the act authorizing the Commission to invoke the aid of any court of the United States in requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of documents, books, and papers, the said law being as follows:

The Commission shall have power to require, by subpœna, the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of all books, papers, tariffs, contracts, agreements, and documents relating to any matter under investigation.

Such attendance of witnesses and the production of such documentary evidence may be required from any place in the United States at any designated place of hearing. And in case of disobedience to a subpœna the Commission, or any party to a proceeding before the Commission, may invoke the aid of any court of the United States in requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of books, papers, and documents under the provisions of this section.

And any of the circuit courts of the United States within the jurisdiction of which such inquiry is carried on may, in case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpœna issued to any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act, or other person, issue an order requiring such common carrier or other person to appear before said Commission (and produce books and papers if so ordered) and give evidence touching the matter in question; and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof.

The opinion of the court thus propounds the question at issue:

Is the twelfth section of the act unconstitutional and void, so far as it authorizes or requires the circuit courts of the United States to use their process in aid of inquiries before the Commission ?

After discussing the powers of Congress over interstate commerce and its right to obtain full information, the court says:

It was clearly competent for Congress, to that end, to invest the Commission with authority to require the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of books, papers, tariffs, contracts, agreements, and documents relating to any matter legally committed to that body for investigation. We do not understand that any of these propositions are disputed in this case.

After arguing that when Congress has the right to do a certain thing it may select such means as it may deem proper, the court says:

An adjudication that Congress could not establish an administrative body with authority to investigate the subject of interstate commerce and with power to call witnesses before it, and to require the production of books, documents, and papers relating to that subject, would go far toward defeating the object for which the people of the United States placed commerce among the States under national control.

The opinion of the court goes on to discuss what is a case or controversy to which, under the Constitution, the judicial power of the United States extends, and concludes that the petition of the Interstate Commerce Commission in accordance with the terms of the law in question was such as could properly be brought under judicial cognizance. The opinion continues:

We do not overlook these constitutional limitations which, for the protection of personal rights, must necessarily attend all investigations conducted under the authority of Congress. Neither branch of the legislative department, still less any merely administrative body established by Congress, possesses, or can be invested with, a general power of making inquiry into the private affairs of the citizen. (Kilbourn v. Thompson, 103 U. S., 168, 190.) We said in Boyd v. United States (116 U. S., 616, 630)—and it can not be too often repeated—that the principles that embody the essence of constitutional liberty and security forbid all invasions on the part of the Government and its employees of the sanctity of a man's home and the privacies of his life. As said by Mr. Justice Field in In re Pacific Railway Commission (32 Fed. Rep., 241, 250), "of all the rights of the citizen, few are of greater importance or more essential to his peace and happiness than the right of personal security, and that involves not merely protection of his person from assault, but exemption of his private affairs, books, and papers from the inspection and scrutiny of others."

After referring to the case of Counselman v. Hitchcock (142 U. S., p. 547) as one wherein the guaranties of personal rights are fully discussed, the opinion cites various other cases and reaffirms that these duties assigned the circuit court are judicial in their nature:

The inquiry whether a witness before the Commission is bound to answer a particular question propounded to him or to produce books, papers, etc., in his possession and called for by that body is one that can not be committed to a subordinate administrative or executive tribunal for final determination. Such a body could not, under our system of government, and consistently with due process of law, be invested with authority to compel obedience to its orders by a judgment of fine or imprisonment. Except in the particular instances enumerated in the Constitution, and considered in Anderson v. Dunn (6 Wheat, 204) and in Kilbourn v. Thompson (103 U. S., 168, 190), of the exercise by either House of Congress of its right to punish disorderly behavior upon the part of its Members, and to compel the attendance of witnesses, and the production of papers in election and impeachment cases, and in cases that may involve the existence of those bodies, the power to impose fine or imprisonment in order to compel the performance of a legal duty imposed by the United States can only be exerted, under the law of the land, by a competent judicial tribunal having jurisdiction in the premises. See Whitcomb's case (120 Mass., 118) and authorities there cited.

After discussion of further phases of the case, the court proceeds to remand the case to the circuit court that the latter may proceed with the case on its merits.

The minority opinion dissented from the proposition that the proceeding in question was judicial in its nature, and held that the courts could not be turned into commissions of inquiry to aid legislative action, and held that the Commission or the legislature should seek information by the ordinary processes of legislative or administrative bodies.

1767. A decision that the Federal courts may not be made by act of Congress an agency for compelling testimony before a commission.—On August 29, 1887,[1] Circuit Justice Field, in the northern district of California, delivered the opinion of the court in the matter of the application of the Pacific Railway Commission. This Commission had been created under the act of Congress of March 3, 1887, "authorizing an investigation of the books, accounts, and methods of railroads which have received aid from the United States, and for other purposes." The act authorized the President to appoint three Commissioners to make a searching investigation into the business of the railways in question. and also to ascertain and report—whether any of the directors, officers, or employees of said companies, respectively, have been, or are now, directly or indirectly, interested, and to what amount or extent, in any other railroad, steamship, etc., * * * or other business company or corporation, and with which any agreements, undertakings, or leases have been made or entered into; * * * and further, to inquire and report whether said companies, or either of them, or their officers or agents, have paid any money or other valuable consideration, or done any other act or thing for the purpose of influencing legislation.

The act further provided that the Commissioners, or either of them, should have the power—to require the attendance and testimony of witnesses, and the production of all books, papers, contracts, agreements, and documents relating to the matter under investigation, and to administer oaths; and to that end may invoke the aid of any court of the United States in requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses, and the production of books, papers, and documents.

The act further provided:

That any of the circuit or district courts of the United States within the jurisdiction of which such inquiry is carried on may, in case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpœna issued to any person, issue an order requiring any such person to appear before said Commissioners, or either of them, as the case may be, and produce books and papers, if so ordered, and give evidence touching the matter in question; and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof.

In the discharge of their duties the Commission attended at San Francisco, and called before them Leland Stanford, president of the Central Pacific Railroad Company, one of the companies which received aid in bonds from the Government. Mr. Stanford's testimony showed that he had expended for "general expenses" large sums of the railroad's money, but he declined to answer interrogatories intended to develop the facts as to whether or not any of these sums had been used to influence legislation. He furthermore took the ground that the money expended did not affect the Government's interest in the road; the matter was one merely between himself and the stockholders and directors of the road.

Mr. Stanford, in resisting the efforts of the Commission, further made the point that the Commission propounded questions involving criminality on his part. In respect to this point the law creating the Commission provided—that the claim that any such testimony or evidence may tend to criminate the person giving such evidence shall not excuse such witness from testifying, but such evidence or testimony shall not be used against such person on the trial of any criminal proceeding.

The district attorney, acting for the Commission, moved in the circuit court for a peremptory order to compel the witness to answer the interrogatories.

This motion was denied, Circuit Justice Field delivering the opinion of the court. In the course of this opinion he said especially in reference to the action of counsel for respondent in assailing the validity of the act creating the Commission:

The Pacific Railway Commission, created under the act of Congress of March 3, 1887, is not a judicial body; it possesses no judicial powers; it can determine no rights of the Government, or of the companies whose affairs it investigates. Those rights will remain the subject of judicial inquiry and determination as fully as though the Commission had never been created; and in such inquiry its report to the President of its action will not be even admissible as evidence of any of the matters investigated. It is a mere board of inquiry, directed to obtain information upon certain matters, and report the result of its investigations to the President, who is to lay the same before Congress. In the progress of its investigations, and in the furtherance of them, it is in terms authorized to invoke the aid of the courts of the United States in requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses, and the production of books, papers, and documents. And the act provides that the circuit or district court of the United States, within the jurisdiction of which the inquiry of the Commission is had, in case of contumacy or refusal of any person to obey a subpœna to him, may issue an order requiring such person to appear before the Commissioners, and produce books and papers, and give evidence touching the matters in question.

The investigation directed is to be distinguished from the inquiries authorized upon taking the census. The Constitution provides for an enumeration of the inhabitants of the States at regular periods, in order to furnish a basis for the apportionment of Representatives, and, in connection with the ascertainment of the number of inhabitants, the act of Congress provides for certain inquiries as to their age, birth, marriage, occupation, and respecting some other matters of general interest, and for the refusal of anyone to answer them a small penalty is imposed. (Rev. Stat., sec. 2171.) There is no attempt in such inquiries to inquire into the private affairs and papers of anyone, nor are the courts called upon to enforce answers to them. Similar inquiries usually accompany the taking of a census of every country and are not deemed to encroach upon the rights of the citizen. And in addition to the inquiries usually accompanying the taking of a census, there is no doubt that Congress may authorize a commission to obtain information upon any subject which, in its judgment, it may be important to possess. It may inquire into the extent of the productions of the country of every kind, natural and artificial, and seek information as to the habits, business, and even amusements of the people. But in its inquiries it is controlled by the same guards against the invasion of private rights which limit the investigations of private parties into similar matters. In the pursuit of knowledge it can not compel the production of the private books and papers of the citizen for its inspection, except in the progress of judicial proceedings, or in suits instituted for that purpose, and in both cases only upon averments that its rights are in some way dependent for enforcement upon the evidence those books and papers contain.

Of all the rights of the citizen few are of greater importance or more essential to his peace and happiness than the right of personal security, and that involves not merely protection of his person from assault but exemption of his private affairs, books, and papers from the inspection and scrutiny of others.

The opinion then goes on to discuss the rights of the citizen to privacy, citing and commenting on the cases of Boyd v. United States (116 U. S., 616) and Kilbourn v. Thompson (103 U. S., 168), and then discusses the functions of the courts, concluding that, whether the act creating the Pacific Railroad Commission intended to force the answering of all questions, or only such as were proper in view of the principles of law, it was yet in either case void:

The Federal courts, under the Constitution, can not be made the aids to any investigation by a commission or a committee into the affairs of anyone. * * * The conclusions we have thus reached disposes of the petition of the railway commissioners, and renders it unnecessary to consider whether the interrogatories propounded were proper in themselves, or were sufficiently met by the answers given by Mr. Stanford, or whether any of them were open to objection for the assumptions they made, or the imputations they implied. It is enough that the Federal courts can not be made the instruments to aid the commissioners in their investigations.

1768. The parliamentary law as to the examination of witnesses.

Rule for asking questions of a person under examination before a committee or at the bar of the House.

According to the parliamentary law questions asked a witness are recorded in the Journal.

The parliamentary law provides that the answers of witnesses before the House shall not be written down, but such is not the rule before committes.

A person under examination at the bar withdraws while the House deliberates on the objection to a question.

Either House may request of the other the attendance of a person in custody of the latter House.

Either House may request by message, but not command, the attendance of a Member of the other House.

A message requesting the attendance of a Member of the other House should state clearly the purpose thereof.

According to the parliamentary law neither House compels its Members to attend the other House in obedience to a request.

The parliamentary law relating to the appearance of counsel.

Jefferson's Manual, in Section XIII, has the following in regard to the examination of witnesses:

Common fame is a good ground for the House to proceed by inquiry, and even to accusation. (Resolution House of Commons, 1 Car. 1, 1625; Rush, L. Parl., 115; Grey, 16–22, 92; 8 Grey, 21, 23, 27 45.)

Witnesses are not to be produced but where the House has previously instituted an inquiry (2 Hats., 102), nor then are orders for their attendance given blank. (3 Grey, 51.)

When any person is examined before a committee, or at the bar of the House, any member wishing to ask the person a question must address it to the speaker or chairman, who repeats the question to the person, or says to him, "You hear the question; answer it." But if the propriety of the question be objected to, the Speaker directs the witness, counsel, and parties to withdraw, for no question can be moved or put or debated while they are there. (2 Hats., 108.) Sometimes the questions are previously settled in writing before the witness enters. (Ib., 106, 107; 8 Grey, 64.) The questions asked must be entered in the journals. (3 Grey, 81.) But the testimony given in answer before the House is never written down; but before a committee, it must be, for the information of the House, who are not present to hear it. (7 Grey, 52, 334.)

If either House have occasion for the presence of a person in custody of the other, they ask the other their leave that he may be brought up to them in custody. (3 Hats., 52.)

A member, in his place, gives information to the House of what he knows of any matter under hearing at the bar. (Jour. H. of C., Jan. 22, 1744–5)

Either House may request, but not command, the attendance of a member of the other. They are to make the request by message of the other House, and to express clearly the purpose of attendance, that no improper subject of examination may be tendered to him. The House then gives leave to the member to attend, if he choose it; waiting first to know from the member himself whether he chooses to attend, till which they do not take the message into consideration. But when the peers are sitting as a court of criminal judicature, they may order attendance, unless where it be a case of impeachment by the Commons. There, it is to be a request. (3 Hats., 17; 9 Grey, 306, 406; 10 Grey, 133.)

Counsel are to be heard only on private, not on public, bills, and on such points of law only as the House shall direct. (10 Grey, 61.)

1769. The Speaker, the chairman of the Committee of the Whole, or any other committee, or any Member may administer oaths to witnesses in any case under examination.

The statutes provide that a person summoned as a witness who fails to appear or refuses to testify shall be punished by fine or imprisonment.

No witness is privileged to refuse to testify when examined by the House or its committee on the ground that his testimony would disgrace himself.

Testimony given before a House or its committee may not be used as evidence against the witness in any court, except in case of alleged perjury.

The statutes provide that the fact of a witness' contumacy shall be certified by the Speaker under seal of the House to the district attorney of the District of Columbia.

The law in relation to witnesses (secs. 101–104, 859, R. S.) provides:

SEC. 101.[1] The President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, or a chairman of a Committee of the Whole, or of any committee of either House of Congress [or any Member],[2] is empowered to administer oaths to witnesses in any case under their examination.[3]

SEC. 102.[4] Every person who, having been summoned as a witness by the authority of either House of Congress, to give testimony or to produce papers upon any matter under inquiry before either House, or any committee of either House of Congress, willfully makes default, or who, having appeared, refuses to answer any question pertinent to the question under inquiry, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, punishable by a fine of not more than one thousand dollars nor less than one hundred dollars, and imprisoned in a common jail for not less than one month nor more than twelve months.

SEC. 103.[5] No witness is privileged to refuse to testify to any fact, or to produce any paper, respecting which he shall be examined by either House of Congress, or by any committee of either House, upon the ground that his testimony to such fact or his production of such paper may tend to disgrace him or otherwise render him infamous.

SEC. 859.[6] No testimony given by a witness before either House, or before any committee of either House of Congress, shall be used as evidence in any criminal proceeding against him in any court, except in a prosecution for perjury committed in giving such testimony. But an official paper or record produced by him is not within the same privilege.

SEC. 104.[7] Whenever a witness summoned as mentioned in section 102 fails to testify, and the facts are reported to either House, the President of the Senate or the Speaker of the House, as the case may be, shall certify the fact under the seal of the Senate or House to the district attorney for the District of Columbia, whose duty it shall be to bring the matter before the grand jury for their action.

1770. The House may in a resolution creating a committee of investigation empower it to examine witnesses, but may not give it leave to report at any time, except by a special order changing the rules.—On May 13, 1878,[8] Mr. Clarkson N. Potter, of New York, as a question of privilege, presented a preamble and resolution reciting the allegation of the lagislature of Maryland, that, by reason of fraudulent returns from the States of Florida and Louisiana, due effect had not been given to the electoral vote cast by Maryland on December 6, 1876, alleging fraud with the connivance of high officials of the Government, and providing for the appointment of a select committee with power to administer oaths and "leave to report at any time." The resolution also conferred on the chairman the power to administer oaths.

Mr. Omar D. Conger, of Michigan, made the point of order that the resolution changed or enlarged the law with respect to the power of administering oaths to witnesses.

The Speaker[9] overruled the point of order.

Mr. James A. Garfield, of Ohio, made the point of order against that portion of the resolution giving the committee leave to report at any time, as that would change the order of business prescribed by the rules.

On July 6, 1797 (first session Fifth Congress, Annals, p. 458), during proceedings relating to the impeachment of William Blount, the Speaker had declined to administer the oath to witnesses without authority, and the House declined to give him authority.

The Speaker sustained the point of order.

1771. A former regulation as to counsel appearing before committees.—On May 20, 1876,[1] the House, on the recommendation of the Judiciary Committee, agreed to the following:

Resolved, That all persons or corporations employing counsel or agents to represent their interests in regard to any measure pending at any time before this House or any committee thereof, shall cause the name and authority of such counsel or agent to be filed with the Clerk of the House; and no person whose name and authority are not so filed shall appear as counsel or agent before any committee of this House.

1772. Instance wherein a witness summoned before an investigating committee was accompanied by counsel.—On June 4, 1878,[2] James E. Anderson, a witness before the select committee appointed to investigate the Presidential election of 1876, was accompanied by counsel, who sat behind him and consulted with him during the examination.

1773. A question proposed to be propounded by a member of a committee directly to a witness should not be amended, but should be allowed or rejected in its original form.—On January 25, 1837,[3] in the committee appointed to examine into the management of the deposit banks, Mr. Balie Peyton, of Tennessee, a member of the committee, propounded to a witness this question:

Did Amos Kendall recommend you, or use his influence to procure you an office, agency, or appointment in the deposit bank of this city about the time before alluded to? Was such an application complied with or rejected, on the part of said bank?

Mr. Ransom H. Gillett, of New York, offered the following amendment:

To insert after "Amos Kendall," the words "while he was agent of the Treasury Department."

The Chair[4] decided the motion to be out of order; that interrogatories proposed to be sent to witnesses at a distance, as propounded by the committee were amendable; but those propounded to witnesses in the presence of the committee by individual members were not, but must be either allowed or rejected by the committee.

Mr. Gillett, having appealed, the decision of the Chair was sustained, yeas 5, nays 2.

1774. The validity of testimony taken when a quorum of a committee was not present has been doubted.—On December 17, 1862,[5] the select committee appointed to investigate Government contracts, adopted the following:

Resolved, That inasmuch as certain testimony has been taken by one member of the committee, in the absence of a quorum, touching the official conduct of certain Federal officers in New York, under objection from them, therefore the committee will examine such testimony, and whenever it appears that the testimony of any such witness so taken is found to affect the official character of any such person, such witness shall be reexamined, and so far as his testimony on reexamination affects the official conduct of any Federal officer in New York, it shall be submitted to him for his inspection.

1775. During an investigation by a committee, if a question is objected to, the committee decides whether or not it shall be put.—On May 26, 1856,[1] while the select committee appointed to consider the assault upon Senator Charles Sumner by Preston S. Brooks, of South Carolina, a Member of the House, were examining Mr. Sumner at his lodgings, whither the committee proceeded, Mr. Alexander C. M. Pennington, of New Jersey, a member of the committee, objected to a question propounded by Mr. Howell Cobb, of Georgia, another member of the committee. Thereupon the question "Shall the question be received?" was put, and decided in the negative.

1776. Instance wherein a Speaker gave testimony before a committee of investigation.—On December 12, 1772,[2] Mr. Speaker Blaine was sworn and testified before the select committee appointed to investigate the transactions of the Credit Mobilier.

1777. Members have been summoned before committees to testify as to statements made by them in debate; but in one case a Member formally protested that it was an invasion of his constitutional privilege.—In 1837[3] the select committee appointed to investigate the condition of the Executive Departments of the Government, of which Mr. Henry A. Wise, of Virginia, was chairman, summoned Mr. John Bell, of Tennessee, a Member of the House, and required him. under oath, to respond to this question:

Do you, of your own knowledge, know of any act by either of the heads of the Executive Departments which is either corrupt or a violation of their official duties?

Against this examination Mr. Bell protested, as follows:

I therefore protest against the course of the committee in subjecting me to such an examination as a private injury, a gross personal injustice, and an act, in its consequences to me, oppressive, tyrannical, and without any sufficient ground of public interest or necessity to justify it.

I protest against it as an emanation of Executive power and influence[4] unconstitutionally exerted over the proceedings of the House of Representatives, an influence wholly incompatible with the due independence of Congress as a coordinate department of Government.

I protest against it as a violation of my privilege as a Member of the House of Representatives, the committee having no rightful power to summon or examine me as a witness in the manner proposed. The Constitution declares (Art. I, sec. 6) in relation to this subject that "for any speech or debate in either House, they (Members of Congress) shall not be questioned in any other place." This protection will amount to nothing if I may be put upon trial before this committee and be required to answer upon oath as to the grounds upon which I have made statements of any kind in the House, and it is no argument against this objection to say that I may refuse to answer if I think proper. I have a right to be free from the conclusions which may be drawn from my silence when questioned under such circumstances.

I protest against it as a proceeding in derogation of the fundamental powers and privileges of the House of Representatives. Public rumor, uncontradicted by any authentic denial, has heretofore been regarded as evidence sufficient upon which to found statements in debate, and to institute inquiries into the abuses of public administration. In the House of Commons of Great Britain common fame is held to be sufficient evidence on which to found an impeachment. But who will hereafter enter freely into the debates of Congress upon the numerous questions connected with the purity of the administration? Who will incur the risk of being able to measure his language and qualify his assertions so exactly as to enable him to subscribe an affidavit as to their accuracy when called upon by a committee composed of a majority of his political opponents?

In fine I protest against the course of the committee as unprecedented, so far as I know, in the history of a free government; as a direct attack on the public liberty, inasmuch as the perfect freedom of debate in Congress is essential to its preservation; as a proceeding which could only originate or find countenance at a period when the principles of civil and political liberty are either grossly misunderstood or disregarded; as a proceeding fit only to be employed under an arbitrary government, as the means of suppressing all inquiry into the abuses and corruptions with which it maintains its unjust authority, and upon these several grounds I might object to answer the interrogatory which has been propounded to me. Yet as I am of the opinion that the unjust, unconstitutional, oppressive, and personal objects intended to be effected by the author of this proceeding, and the public injury consequent thereupon, would be rather promoted than defeated by my silence, I think proper, under all the circumstances, to waive all my privileges, whether attached to me as a citizen or as a Member of Congress, and to answer according to my best judgment as to all questions of mere opinion, and, according to the best of my knowledge, information, and belief, as to all matters of fact, except so far as I may think proper to withhold any matter of private confidence or the names of those from whom I may have received material information.

The committee in their report [1] say that they do not consider the position assumed by Mr. Bell "just or reasonable."

1778. In 1839 [2] the select investigating committee appointed to examine into the defalcations in the New York custom-house, summoned Mr. Churchill C. Cambreleng, a Member of the House, to testify concerning a charge which he had made in the course of debate in the House.

Mr. Cambreleng responded without objection.

1779. Discussion of the privilege of a witness summoned to testify before a committee of the House.—On March 2, 1875, Mr. E. Rockwood Hoar, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on the Judiciary,[3] made a report [4] on the bill (H. R. 4855) "to provide for the protection of witnesses required to attend before either branch of Congress or a committee of the same."

The report makes this statement of the circumstances suggesting the bill:

It appeared that the attendance of Whitelaw Reid was required before the Committee on Ways and Means as a witness upon an investigation ordered by this House, in which that committee was authorized to send for persons and papers. He attended accordingly, and after his examination, but before a reasonable time had been afforded for his return to his home in New York, he was arrested and held to bail under a criminal prosecution for a libel and a summons to appear in a civil suit for a libel was also served upon him. He was not arrested in the civil suit, and has made no application for the protection of the House or for their interference in his behalf. We are of the opinion that his arrest upon the criminal process was lawful, and that, if he was entitled to exemption from the service of civil process, he can assert his privilege, if he is disposed to do so, in the court before which such process was made returnable. There is therefore nothing in the case of Mr. Reid which requires the action of the House.

[1] Report No. 194, p. 15.

[2] Third session Twenty-fifth Congress, House Report No. 313, pp. 317, 318, 415.

[3] This committee had been directed on January 19 to inquire whether the arrest of Mr. Reid was an invasion of the privileges of the House. (Second session Forty-third Congress, Journal, p. 203.)

[4] Second session Forty-third Congress, House Report No. 273.

The committee go on to say:

We find that, by the settled parliamentary law of England and America, a witness in attendance upon either branch of Congress, or a committee thereof, with power to send for persons and papers, whether regularly summoned or attending voluntarily upon notice and request, is privileged from arrest, except in case of treason, felony, or breach of the peace. This exception is held to include all indictable crimes and offenses. But it is an open question whether a witness coming within the jurisdiction of the courts of a State or of the District, and only amenable to the service of process by reason of his personal presence, is protected against the service of civil process upon him, which does not require his arrest or detention. Different courts of highly respectable authority have made opposing decisions upon the question. We are not aware that it has ever been determined by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Therefore the committee, believing that "as far as civil rights are concerned" the witness "brought into the District by a superior power should not be regarded as within it for any other purpose than that of giving his testimony and that he should not have his condition changed to his prejudice on that account," recommended the passage of the bill.

The bill passed the House March 2, 1875,[1] and was sent to the Senate, where it was referred to the Judiciary Committee and was not reported therefrom.

1780. The House sometimes transmits to the courts reports in regard to witnesses who have apparently testified falsely.—On March 3, 1875,[2] the House agreed to the following resolution reported from the Committee on Ways and Means.:

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House transmit to the United States district attorney for the District of Columbia a copy of the evidence taken before the Committee on Ways and Means upon the question of a corrupt use of money to procure the passage of an act providing for an additional subsidy for the China mail service, with direction to lay so much of the same as relates to the truth of the testimony given by William S. King and John G. Schumaker before the grand jury of said district for such action as the law seems to require.

1781. On February 26, 1859,[3] Mr. William E. Niblack, of Indiana, from the select committee appointed to investigate the accounts of the late Superintendent of Public Printing, made a report in regard to the testimony of Peter S. Duvall before the said committee, accompanied by the following resolution:

Resolved, That a copy of this report be certified to the United States district attorney for the District of Columbia for such action in the premises as the circumstances in his opinion require.

Mr. Niblack explained that the witness had made statements which were contradicted by the statements of two other witnesses, as well as by strong corroborative testimony.

The resolution was agreed to.

1782. An investigating committee sometimes reports testimony to the House with the recommendation that it be sealed and so kept in the files until further order of the House.—On June 9, 1846,[4] the select committee appointed to investigate certain charges made by the Hon. Charles J. Ingersoll against the Hon. Daniel Webster for official misconduct while Secretary of State, made a report, presenting these resolutions:

Resolved, That the testimony taken in this investigation be sealed up by the Clerk, under the supervision of the committee, indorsed "confidential," and deposited in the archives of the House, and that the same be not opened unless by its order.

Resolved, That this report be laid on the table and printed, and that the select committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

Mr. Jacob Brinkerhoff, of Ohio, made a minority report, recommending that the testimony and exhibits taken before the committee be printed.

On June 17, at the suggestion of the majority of the committee, a resolution was passed ordering the printing of all the testimony.

1783. The House sometimes orders that testimony taken by an investigating committee be taken in charge by the Clerk, to be by him delivered to the next House.—On March 2, 1867,[1] the House ordered the Clerk to lay before the next House of Representatives the testimony and report of the select committee which investigated the affairs of the southern railroads, also the papers on the judiciary's investigation of affairs in the State of Maryland.

On March 8, 1867,[2] the House ordered the testimony in the Maryland case referred to the Judiciary Committee with instructions.

1784. On March 3, 1875,[3] the House agreed to the following resolution:

Resolved, That a copy of the testimony taken before the Committee on Ways and Means upon the question of a corrupt use of money to procure the passage of an act providing for an additional subsidy for the China mail service be delivered to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, to be by him laid before the House at the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress, to the end that they may make further inquiry and take due action upon the questions affecting William S. King and John G. Schumaker, and further proceed thereon as they shall deem just.

1785. The House sometimes directs the Speaker to certify to the Executive authority testimony taken by a House committee and affecting an official.—On May 16, 1876,[4] the House agreed to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House be, and he is hereby, directed to certify to the proper authorities of the District of Columbia the testimony heretofore taken by the order of this House relating to the conduct of A. M. Clapp as Congressional Printer, to the end that he may be indicted and prosecuted.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire whether A. M. Clapp, Congressional Printer, is an officer who may be impeached under the Constitution of the United States, and report to the House at as early a day as practicable.

1786. A telegram from a person beyond reach of the process of the House and not verified by oath was held not competent evidence for the consideration of an investigating committee.

A charge that the chairman of an investigating committee had suppressed evidence was presented as a matter of privilege.

On May 2, 1876,[1] the House agreed to a resolution directing the Judiciary Committee to investigate the sale of certain bonds of the Little Rock and Fort Smith Railroad Company to the Union Pacific Railroad Company. No allegation was made that any Member was involved in the inquiry; and it does not appear that the Judiciary Committee reported to the House that the progress of the investigation had involved the name of any Member.[2] But on June 5, 1876, Mr. James G. Blaine, of Maine, rising to a question of privilege,[3] alleged that the investigation had in fact been aimed at him and that certain evidence favorable to him had been suppressed. He therefore offered, as privileged, the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to report forthwith to the House whether, in acting under the resolution of the House of May 2 relative to the purchase by the Pacific Railroad Company of seventy-five land-grant bonds of the Little Rock and Fort Smith Railroad, it has sent any telegram to one Josiah Caldwell, in Europe, and received a reply thereto. And, if so, to report said telegram and reply, with the date when said reply was received and the reasons why the same has been suppressed.

After debate, by a vote of 125 yeas and 97 nays, the resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. On August 3[4] the report, which was in the nature of a vindication of Mr. J. Proctor Knott, of Kentucky, chairman of the committee, was reported by unanimous vote of the committee. But debate arising, and members of the committee expressing divergent views, the report was recommitted.

On August 15[5] the same report was again presented, accompanied by minority views. The report states that in the course of the investigation authorized under the resolution of May 2 it was developed that Caldwell had made certain statements as to the subject-matter of the investigation. These statements were excluded as evidence, first, because irrelevant, and, second, because Caldwell was in Europe, beyond the reach of the process of the House. Under these circumstances it was determined by the committee that a telegram should be sent by the chairman to Caldwell, asking him to appear before the committee and testify. The report goes on:

After the action of the committee, and before any communication had been had with Caldwell, a telegram purporting to come from him was delivered to the chairman, as follows:

"Have just read in New York papers Scott's evidence about our bond transaction, and can fully corroborate it. I never gave Blaine any Fort Smith bonds, directly or otherwise. I have three foreign railway contracts on my hands, which makes it impossible for me to leave without great pecuniary loss, or would gladly voluntarily come home and so testify. Can make affidavit to this effect and mail it if desired."

The resolution referred to your committee in substance demands that this telegram be made part of the testimony taken by the subcommittee engaged in the investigation under the Tarbox resolution.

If this demand is to be complied with, it must be upon the ground that such telegram is competent evidence in this investigation.

The report concludes that it was not, (1) because not made under oath, although witnesses actually present before the committee were required to testify under oath; (2) because there was not the slightest evidence that Mr. Caldwell sent the telegram, the mere receipt of it not establishing its authenticity in absence of the original message written by the sender;[1] (3) because the copy of the message raised no presumption as to the original and would not have done so even had it been in direct response to a telegram.[2]

Therefore the telegram was not an instrument of evidence, and the chairman in withholding it did not suppress evidence. The committee also find that the chairman acted in good faith and without a purpose to injure any person involved in the investigation, and therefore recommend the indefinite postponement of the resolution.

The minority dissented from the report because it was brought in during the last hours of the session, because there had not been sufficient investigation, and because a speech of the chairman,[3] Mr. Knott, made subsequent to the drafting of the report, had cast doubt upon the assertion that he was innocent of the charge.

The report was adopted,[4] on a vote by tellers, 81 ayes to 39 noes.

1787. A member of the Cabinet who had been implicated by the terms of a resolution creating a committee of investigation was permitted to have witnesses summoned.—In 1878[5] the select committee of the House created to investigate the Presidential election of 1876 granted the application of the Secretary of the Treasury, John Sherman (who had been accused in the preamble of the resolution creating the committee and who appeared by counsel before the committee), to take certain testimony

Thus, on June 21, 1878,[6] Thomas H. Jenks was sworn as a witness called in the interest of Mr. Sherman.

1788. Latitude permitted by an investigating committee to the counsel of an executive officer who had been implicated by the terms of the resolution creating the committee.—In 1878[7] the House select committee on Alleged Frauds in the Presidential Election of 1876 permitted John Sherman, Secretary of the Treasury, whose conduct had been impeached in the preamble of the resolution creating the committee of investigation, to be represented before the committee by counsel (Mr. Shellabarger), but the counsel was not permitted to ask questions, and questions that the counsel desired to ask were required to be communicated to the witness through some member of the committee.

1789. Instance wherein an investigating committee permitted a person implicated by testimony already given to appear and testify.—On February 8, 1879,[1] while the select committee appointed to investigate the alleged frauds in the Presidential election of 1876 were investigating the cipher dispatches, a letter was received from Samuel J. Tilden, taking the liberty of requesting that before you leave [the committee were sitting in New York] an opportunity be permitted me to appear before you to submit some testimony which I deem pertinent to the inquiry with which you are charged.

Mr. Tilden's name had been implicated in testimony already given.

The committee gave him leave to appear, and he appeared and testified.

1790. When the House desires the testimony of Senators it is proper to ask and obtain leave for them to attend.—On March 29, 1816,[2] Mr. Hugh Nelson, of Virginia, offered this resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the official conduct of Matthias B. Tallmadge, one of the district judges for the State of New York, and to report their opinion whether the said Matthias B. Tallmadge hath so acted in his judicial capacity as to require the interposition of the constitutional power of this House, and that the said committee be authorized to send for persons, papers, and records.

Mr. Nelson was appointed chairman of this committee, and on April 8[3] reported from the committee a resolution which was agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States be requested to permit the attendance of the Honorable Nathan Sanford, a Member of their body, before the committee of the House of Representatives appointed to inquire into the official conduct of Judge Tallmadge, to be examined touching the subjects contained in the preceding report relating to the alleged misconduct of Judge Tallmadge in his office as one of the judges of the district court for the State of New York.[4]

On April 12, 1816,[5] the Senate passed a resolution permitting the attendance of Mr. Sanford, as requested by the House, and informed the House of that fact by message.

On April 17[6] the House resolved to postpone further proceedings in the inquiry until the next session of Congress.

1791. On April 19, 1832,[7] during the trial of Samuel Houston at the bar of the House for assault on a Member of the House because of words spoken in debate, the accused sent to the Chair a request that the House pass the proper order to enable him to obtain the attendance of Senators Felix Grundy and Alexander Buckner to testify. A Member of the House requested that the names of two other Senators, Thomas Ewing and John Tipton, be added.

The House then agreed to the following:

Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate, informing the Senate that the House of Representatives request the attendance of Felix Grundy, Alexander Buckner, Thomas Ewing, and John Tipton, Members of the Senate, to give evidence before the House of Representatives, now sitting on the trial of Samuel Houston, accused of a breach of the privileges of the House of Representatives by assaulting and beating Mr. Stanbery, a Member of that House.

The message having been delivered to the Senate by the Clerk, the Senators therein named appeared, and were conducted by the Sergeant-at-Arms to the seats which had been prepared for them within the Hall.

When the message of the House was received in the Senate,[1] Mr. Daniel Webster, of Massachusetts, said that as this was a case of emergency he would move that the pending bill be laid aside. This being done, Mr. Webster moved that leave be given the Senators named to attend the House of Representatives. This motion was agreed to.

The Senators were sworn, like other witnesses, when they testified before the House.[2]

1792. A committee of the House having summoned certain Senators by subpœna, the summons was either disregarded or obeyed under protest.—In 1837 [3] in the course of an investigation into the condition of the Executive Departments of the Government, a select committee, of which Mr. Henry A. Wise, of Virginia, was chairman, summoned to appear and testify before it the following Members of the Senate: John C. Calhoun, of South Carolina, and Hugh L. White and Felix Grundy, of Tennessee. It does not appear that the House had previously obtained from the Senate the customary permission to ask their attendance.

Mr. Calhoun neither attended on the committee nor replied to their call.[4]

Messrs. White and Grundy appeared and announced their willingness to testify, but filed protests, which were entered on the journal of the committee.

Mr. White's protest, filed January 28, 1837, is as follows:

I now appear before your committee at the time specified in the subpœna, but not in obedience to its mandate. I am a Member of the Senate of the United States, now in session, and in the daily discharge of my duties as a Senator, and while I am thus engaged do deny that any committee of the House of Representatives has the power, by its mandate, to compel me to absent myself from the body of which I am a Member. I do therefore protest against the power assumed by your committee in the issuance and service of said subpœna; but at the same time that I feel it my duty thus to protest against the exercise of a power which I believe is not vested in your committee, I assure them that I will at all times, when my duties as Senator do not compel me to be elsewhere, voluntarily attend and give them, upon oath, all the information I possess in relation to any of the matters which may come within the range of their investigation. I respectfully ask that this protest may be entered on the journal of your proceedings lest hereafter it may be thought I have sanctioned the exercise of a power which, it is easy to foresee, may be so used as to destroy that body of which I am an humble Member.

[4] Report No. 194, p. 14. The committee, in fact, by an entry on their journal, explained that the subpœna summoning Mr. Calhoun was inadvertently issued; and by the terms of their explanation seem to disclaim any right to take a Senator from his duties. (Journal of the Committee, pp. 40, 41.)

Mr. Grundy's protest, which was filed on February 7, says:

I can not recognize the authority of your committee to call a Senator from his duties in that body of which he is a Member to appear and give testimony before them. Reserving to the Senate, however, of which I belong, the entire control of each of its Members in relation to their respective duties, I will, if notified when the committee wish to examine me (should I not at the time be engaged in the business of the Senate), voluntarily wait upon the committee and give testimony upon the subjects of inquiry directed by the House of Representatives.

1793. In 1878,[1] in the select committee to investigate the Presidential election of 1876, a letter of Stanley Matthews, of Ohio, a Member of the Senate, declining the invitation of the committee to appear before it and testify, was read, and caused discussion as to the right of the House to subpœna a Senator. Messrs. B. F. Butler, of Massachusetts, and S. S. Cox, of New York, discussed it particularly. Mr. Butler said:

The President of the Senate pro tempore (the late acting Vice-President), acting in obedience to an invitation much less formal, has sat in that chair within the last fifteen minutes. Members of the Senate have frequently and always attended when called upon. From a knowledge of public affairs reaching back thirty years, I can say (and I have had occasion to examine the matter before) that never has that invitation been refused during the existence of this Government. I have sat on committees before which Mr. Sumner appeared on invitation. I have sat on committees before which other Senators have appeared. In this very room the Vice-President of the United States, Mr. Colfax, attended on the invitation of a committee (in the Credit Mobilier investigation). Senator Patterson, of New Hampshire, appeared here on the invitation of that committee. Members of the House appeared here. The Speaker of the House came here and was a witness before that committee. And the question is to be determined now, if it is raised, whether that invitation can be, with due respect to us and the House which we represent, slighted.

The committee, on motion of Mr. Butler, voted to issue a subpœna for Mr. Matthews.

On June 10, 1878,[2] the chairman of the committee, Mr. Potter, sent the subpœna to Mr. Matthews with a courteous note. The above proceedings took place before the adjournment of Congress.

On August 12, 1878 [3] (after Congress had adjourned), the committee then being in New York, the chairman stated that a summons had been issued to Mr. Matthews and had been served on him and a return made, but Mr. Matthews had not appeared and had indicated that he would not appear. Mr. Butler thought a minute to report him to the House should be made on the records of the committee.

On August 16,[4] on motion of Mr. Butler, the entry was made on the records of the committee.

1794. A Senator having neglected to accept an invitation or respond to a subpœna requesting him to testify before a House committee, the House by message requested that the Senate give him leave to attend.

The Senate neglected to respond to a request of the House that a Senator be permitted to attend a House committee.

Form of subpœna issued to secure the attendance of a Senator.

On June 17, 1878,[1] Mr. Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts, from the committee appointed to investigate the electoral count in Florida and Louisiana, submitted a report setting forth that the committee had invited Hon. Stanley Matthews, a Senator from the State of Ohio, to appear before them and give testimony, believing him to be a material witness to certain facts necessary and important to be known and relating to the subject-matter of the investigation. In response to this invitation Mr. Matthews had written to the chairman of the committee a letter setting forth that he had, on June 5,[2] called the attention of the Senate to the testimony given before the House committee tending to implicate him in certain alleged frauds and wrongs in connection with the election in Louisiana, and the Senate had referred the subject to a committee of investigation. Mr. Matthews asserted that he had no knowledge whatever of any matter relating to the subject, except in so far as appeared in the evidence before the House committee, and he reserved that for explanation before the Senate committee. Therefore, without intending any disrespect for the House or its committee, he felt constrained by a sense of duty toward the Senate and himself to decline the invitation. The report, in the form of the recitation of a preamble, goes on to state that the committee on June 10 ordered the issue of the following subpœna:

By authority of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States of America.

JOHN G. THOMPSON, Esq.,

Sergeant-at-Arms, or his Special Messenger:

You are hereby commanded to summon the Hon. Stanley Matthews to be and appear before the special investigating committee of the House of Representatives of the United States, of which the Hon. Clarkson N. Potter is chairman, in their chamber, in the city of Washington, on Tuesday, June 11, 1878, at the hour of 10 a. m., then and there to testify touching matters of inquiry committed to said committee; and he is not to depart without leave of said committee.

Herein fail not, and make return of this summons.

Witness my hand and the seal of the House of Representatives of the United States, at the city of Washington, this 10th day of June, 1878.

[SEAL.] SAMUEL J. RANDALL, Speaker.

Attest:

GEORGE M. ADAMS, Clerk.

At the same time, and with this summons, a letter was handed to Mr. Matthews from the chairman of the committee, assuring him that the committee did not intend to cause him inconvenience in the discharge of his duties as Senator.

The preamble and resolution then continue:

And whereas the said Matthews failed to appear in answer to said summons at the time and place named before your committee or at any other time and place; and

Whereas it may be that the duties of said Matthews as Senator and the exigencies of the public service require the presence of said Matthews in his place as Senator, so that he could not appear in answer either to the invitation or summons of your committee as aforesaid, of which exigencies the Senate alone can judge: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the House of Representatives do send the following message to the Senate of the United States in this behalf:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, June 17, 1878.

Resolved, That the House of Representatives do request the Senate to give leave to Hon. Stanley Matthews, Senator from the State of Ohio, to attend before the committee of the House of Representatives now charged with the investigation of the frauds in the electoral vote of the States of Louisiana and Florida, to give such evidence of facts concerning the subject-matter of said investigation as may be in his knowledge or possession as he may be required.

Mr. Butler explained that the resolution was in the exact form laid down by May's Parliamentary Practice.

The resolution was agreed to, yeas 104, nays 18.

On June 18[1] in the Senate the message from the House was taken up, and Mr. William A. Wallace, of Pennsylvania, proposed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate,in compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of yesterday, do allow the attendance of Hon. Stanley Matthews, a Member of this House, before the committee of the House of Representatives now charged with the investigation of alleged frauds in the electoral votes of the States of Louisiana and Florida, for the purpose of giving such evidence of facts concerning the subject-matter of said investigation as may be in his knowledge or possession.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

Objection being made to the immediate adoption of this resolution, it was referred to the Committee of Privileges and Elections.[2]

1795. An instance wherein a committee of the House took the testimony of a Senator, although consent of the Senate had not been obtained. (Footnote.)

A Member having stated that a portion of a House document had been suppressed, the House, on request of the printers, ordered an investigation.

On January 21, 1823,[3] the Speaker laid before the House a letter from Messrs. Gales and Seaton, printers of the House, asking an investigation of a charge, made in the Washington Republican (newspaper), that as printers of the House they had suppressed portions of a public document relating to the relations of Secretary of the Treasury Wm. H. Crawford with certain banks.

It was urged that the House should not proceed on mere newspaper rumor to an investigation; but a Member, Mr. John W. Campbell, of Ohio, having stated that his own investigations had shown a suppression of a portion of a House document, the matter was referred to a select committee.

That committee reported on January 30. They stated that, while they had been sensible of the importance of the charge as affecting Messrs. Gales and Seaton, they had also been mindful that it involved a contempt of the authority and dignity of the House.

To the investigation of such a subject [says their report], involving at once the confidence which this House and the nation shall repose in the information upon which it acts, the character of one of the first officers of the Government, and the fidelity of the public printers, your committee have not proceeded without the most cautious inspection of the documents submitted to them, and the most solemn sanction to the testimony of the witnesses, upon which their opinion was to be founded.

[2] Senate Journal, p. 762. It does not appear that the committee reported the resolution. See also Third session Forty-fifth Congress, House Miscellaneous Document No. 31, pp. 148–153, 160, 874, 956.

[3] Second session Seventeenth Congress, Annals, pp. 652–656, 735–739.

The committee, having found that the printers were not responsible for the suppression, recommended:

The interesting nature of the present inquiry has suggested to your committee the propriety of submitting to the House the expediency of appointing some Member or Members of its own body, in every case, to superintend the publication of all documents which may hereafter be printed by order of the House.

On February 5,[1] Mr. Campbell offered a resolution which, after long debate, was agreed to, providing for an investigation to ascertian by whom the suppression was made.

On February 27[2] the committee reported the results of an exhaustive examination, including testimony given under oath by witnesses, including Members of the House and Senate.[3] The report included no recommendations for action.

1796. The House, by resolution, authorized its Clerk to produce papers and its Members to give testimony before a court of impeachment.—On July 6, 1876,[4] Mr. Scott Lord, of New York, from the managers on the part of the House to conduct the impeachment of William W. Belknap, reported this resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House, on the request of the managers to conduct the impeachment against William W. Belknap, appear before the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, with such papers of the House as the managers may require, and that the members of the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department have permission to appear and testify in such court in regard to such impeachment, and to produce such papers in relation thereto as the managers may require.

1797. The Secretary of the Senate obeyed a subpœna duces tecum of a House investigating committee.—On June 5, 1878,[5] George C. Gorham, secretary of the Senate, obeying a subpœna duces tecum of the House of Representatives, appeared before the select committee to investigate the Presidential election of 1876, and being sworn, produced the papers called for and testified.

1798. The Senate has not considered that its privilege forbade the House to summon one of its officers as a witness.—On June 27, 1832,[6] in the Senate, Mr. John Holmes, of Maine, offered this resolution:

Resolved, That the assistant doorkeeper of the Senate be permitted to attend as a witness before a committee of the House of Representatives, agreeably to his summons.

Mr. Holmes said that the doorkeeper had been summoned by a document under the signature of the Clerk, with the seal of the House, and that the resolution conformed with the practice of the British Parliament.

Mr. Henry Clay, of Kentucky, did not concur that the constitutional privileges of Senators extended to the officers of the body. On his motion the resolution was laid on the table.

1799. A telegram from the chairman of a committee making investigations in a distant place, addressed to the Speaker and on the subject of contumacious witnesses, was held in order as a communication of high privilege.—On December 16, 1876,[1] the Speaker laid before the House a telegram from Mr. William R. Morrison, of Illinois, chairman of the select committee investigating affairs in Louisiana, addressed to the Speaker, and informing the House through him that the efforts of the committee to obtain testimony had been resisted, and that the process of the House would be needed.

Mr. George F. Hoar, of Massachusetts, raised the question of order that a telegraphic dispatch sent by a particular Member was not a proper mode of communicating to the House, and not a proper mode of submitting a report from a committee.

The Speaker[2] ruled that the communication could be received as a question of high privilege. It came addressed to the Speaker as Speaker, and through the ordinary telegraphic channel.

Mr. Hoar did not appeal, but stated that after reflection it seemed to him that the decision of the Chair was right.

1800. A Sergeant-at-Arms, serving subpœnas for a committee, makes his return and it is entered on the journal of the committee.—When the Sergeant-at-Arms, who is serving a committee having power to send for persons and papers, is unable to find the person whom he has been commanded to produce, he makes a return of that fact to the committee and it is entered on the journal of the committee. Thus, on February 15, 1857,[3] the Sergeant-at-Arms made a return which appears as follows on the journal of the select committee appointed to investigate certain alleged corrupt combinations among Members:

> The Sergeant-at-Arms returned that he had diligently sought Horace Greely in the city of New York, and learned that he (Mr. Greely) had gone to the west, probably to Ohio or Iowa, and that the time of his return was uncertain.

1801. The House may confer upon the subcommittees of a committee the power to send for persons and papers.

A general investigation having been conducted by subcommittees, the several reports were made to the committee and appended to its general report.

Minority views may accompany the report of a subcommittee made to the committee.

By the resolution adopted December 4, 1876, three special committees were each authorized to detail subcommittees, each subcommittee to have power to send for persons and papers in making investigation. The mode of proceeding is illustrated by the report of the select committee on the recent election in Louisiana. That report[4] was made to the House by Mr. William R. Morrison, of Illinois, its chairman, on February 1, 1877. It was signed by himself and nine of his associates. Appended to it were the reports[5] of four subcommittees, which had conducted examinations in different localities. The members of the subcommittee concurring in one of these subcommittee reports generally, but not in every case, appended their signatures.

The minority of the main committee also filed their views,[1] appending their signatures thereto, and appended to this statement of minority views, were the views of the minority of each subcommittee,[2] generally signed by the member making it.

1802. A committee not being able to decide the question of issuing certain subpœnas, authorized a member of the committee to exhibit its journal, so that the House might act.—On June 1, 1860,[3] Mr. Warren Winslow, of North Carolina, a member of the select committee appointed to investigate the alleged influence of the Executive in the House, and corruption in elections, submitted[4] a paper containing a statement of certain proceedings of the committee in regard to a subpœna for certain witnesses. The paper was the journal of the committee, and it showed that Mr. Winslow had moved that subpœnas be issued for certain witnesses, and that on this motion the vote was ayes 2, noes 2. So the motion failed. The journal of the committee also showed that the committee voted that Mr. Winslow be allowed to have, for use in the House, the journal of the committee for the record of the action on the motion to issue the subpœnas.

Mr. Winslow thereupon presented to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Speaker be directed to issue his warrant, directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms, ordering him to summon the following-named persons to appear forthwith before the select committee, etc.

On June 2, after debate, this resolution was agreed to, yeas 166, nays 4.

1803. The committee regulates the summoning of its witnesses.—On June 2, 1860,[5] in the select committee appointed to investigate the subject of Executive influence over legislation, corruption in elections, etc., it was—

Ordered, That hereafter witnesses shall be summoned pursuant to the order of the committee, and that the Clerk shall enter upon the journal of this committee the name of the witnesses so ordered to be summoned, at the time such order shall be made.

Protests had previously been made that witnesses had appeared who had not been summoned by order of the committee.

1804. A Committee of the Whole, charged with an investigation in 1792, was given the power to send for persons and papers.—On November 13, 1792,[6] the House—

Resolved, That the Committee of the Whole House, to whom is referred the report of the committee appointed to inquire into the causes of the failure of the expedition under Major-General St. Clair, be empowered to send for persons, papers, and records for their information.

It does not appear that the Committee of the Whole availed itself of this permission.

1805. A question as to issuing a warrant for the arrest of a person who has avoided a summons by seeking a foreign country.—On February 8, 1875,[1] a proposition was made to cause the issue of a warrant for the arrest of William S. King, who was alleged to have avoided the summons of the House to appear and testify by going to Canada. A copy of the summons had been mailed to him in Canada, but an officer of the House had been unable to serve the summons on him on American soil. It was urged against the procedure that a man could not be in contempt who had not had a process legally served on him, and that it would be impossible to arrest him in Canada. In behalf of the resolution, it was urged that its adoption would be a precautionary measure, enabling the witness to be obtained should he return to this country. The proposition was not pressed to a decision.

1806. The Speaker may be authorized and directed to issue subpœnas during a recess of Congress.—On July 30, 1861,[2] the House adopted a resolution allowing the select committee empowered to ascertain and report the number and names of disloyal persons employed by the Government to sit and take testimony during the coming recess of Congress, and as a part of this leave adopted the following:

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House, during the recess of Congress, is hereby authorized and directed to issue subpœnas, upon the request of the committee, in the same manner as during the session of Congress.

1807. Form of subpœna for summoning witnesses to testify before a committee of the House, and of the return thereon.—Subpœnas issued by the Speaker for summoning witnesses to appear before a committee are as follows in form:

By authority of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States of America.

To the SERGEANT-AT-ARMS, or his SPECIAL MESSENGER:

You are hereby commanded to summon ——— ——— to be and appear before the ——— committee of the House of Representatives of the United States, of which the Hon. ——— ——— is chairman, ——— in their chamber in the city of Washington, on ———, at the hour of ——, then and there to testify touching matters of inquiry committed to said committee; and he is not to depart without leave of said committee.

1808. Forms of subpœnas used at different times.—On January 21, 1839,[1] the select committee chosen to investigate the defalcations in the custom-house at New York adopted the following form of the warrant for the summoning of witnesses to appear before said committee:

By authority of the House of Representatives of the United States.

The select committee appointed by the House of Representatives to investigate the defalcations of public officers, to ——— ———, greeting:

You are hereby commanded to summon ——— ——— to appear before said committee, at — — —, in the city of ———, on —— instant, at —— o'clock ——, to testify, and the truth to speak, touching or concerning the subjects of investigation before said committee.

Witness, James Harlan, chairman of said committee, at ———, in the city of ———, this —— day of January, in the year 1839; and in the 63d year of the independence of the United States.

——— ———, Chairman.

1809. On January 25, 1837,[2] in the select committee appointed to investigate the Executive Departments of the Government, Mr. Henry A. Wise, of Virginia, proposed, and the committee unanimously agreed to, the following form of subpœna to witnesses:

To the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives:

You will cause ——— ——— to be summoned to appear before the committee of investigation appointed under a resolution of the House of the 17th day of January, at —— o'clock, on ———, to testify, and the truth to say, touching the matters of inquiry before the said committee.

HENRY A. WISE, Chairman.

1810. Instance of the authorization of a subpœna by telegraph.—On June 11, 1879,[3] the Senate, without debate, agreed to the following:

Resolved, That E. R. Wheeler, of Spencer, Mass., be summoned by telegraphic subpœna to appear without delay before the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to give evidence in a matter pending before said committee.

1811. The House has, by resolution, demanded of certain of its Members the production of papers and information.

A paper presented in the House by a Member in response to the order of the House is mentioned in the Journal, but not printed in full.

On January 7, 1808,[4] during consideration of a proposition relating to a proposed investigation of the conduct of the General of the Army of the United States, Mr. William A. Burwell, of Virginia, proposed this resolution:

Resolved, That Mr. John Randolph, Representative in Congress from the State of Virginia, and Mr. Daniel Clark, Delegate from the Territory of Orleans, be requested to lay upon the clerk's table all papers and other information in their possession in relation to the conduct of Brig. Gen. James Wilkinson, while in the service of the United States, in corruptly receiving money from the Government or agents of Spain.

Considerable debate arose over this resolution, involving, however, rather the merits of the proposed investigation than the power of the House to compel its Members to give testimony, although the latter subject was touched on somewhat.[5]

The resolution was agreed to, yeas 90, nays 19.

On January 8 Mr. Clark presented to the House a certain document, and on January 11 Mr. Clark presented a written statement, sworn to by himself and properly attested by the chief judge of the circuit court of the District of Columbia.[1]

1812. In 1876, after examination and discussion, the House declared its right through a subpœna duces tecum to compel the production of books, papers, and especially telegrams.—On December 16, 1876,[2] the Speaker laid before the House a telegraphic message from Mr. William R. Morrison, of Illinois, chairman of the select committee investigating affairs in Louisiana, informing the House that the efforts of the committee to obtain testimony had been resisted, and that the process of the House would be required. Accompanying the message was a communication from William Orton, president of the Western Union Telegraph Company, stating that the company had decided to instruct its employees not to produce before committees of either House of Congress messages received or sent by representatives of either of the two parties, or at least not to produce such telegrams until after Congress should have approved the subpœnas of the committee.

This communication from Mr. Morrison was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary with instructions to report what action the House should take.

On December 20 the committee, through Mr. William P. Lynde, of Wisconsin, reported:

That the communication fails to inform the House of the names of the person or persons who refuse to produce papers and telegrams, or the circumstances under which the refusal was made. The House has the power to compel the production of books, papers, and telegrams mentioned in the investigation before the committee, and any witness who shall refuse to produce such papers or telegrams when required should be brought to the bar of the House to answer a violation of the privilege of the House.

The committee report the following resolutions and recommend their adoption:

Resolved, That whenever any witness duly subpœnaed to appear before any committee of investigation of the House refuses to appear before such committee or refuses to produce any books, papers, or telegrams in his possession or under his control, when required, the committee shall report the name of such witness, and the facts and circumstances relating to such refusal, for the action of the House.

Resolved, That whenever a witness has been duly subpœnaed to appear before a committee of this House any person who shall tamper with such witness in regard to the evidence to be given by him before the committee, or who shall interfere with or prevent the attendance of such witness before the committee to give testimony, or interfere with or prevent, or endeavor to intimidate or prevent, such witness from producing any books, papers, or telegrams required by the committee, on the facts being reported to the House such person shall be brought to the bar of the House to answer for a breach of the privileges of the House.

This report gave rise to a lengthy debate as to the proper practice and the rights and powers of the House in the matter to compelling the production of papers. A proposition of Mr. Frank H. Hurd, of Ohio, was offered as an amendment in the form of an additional resolution, as follows, and was disagreed to, yeas 93, nays 122:

Resolved, That the subpœnas issued by House committees commanding telegrams, books, papers, and other documents to be produced should describe them with such convenient particularity as may be, in order that they may be made capable of identification; and in cases where telegrams are ordered to be produced they should be described by reference to the names of the parties sending and receiving the same, the general subject-matter of their contents, and the date, as near as may be, of their transmission; but the committees charged with the inquiry shall not be required to make such description when, after having determined that they have reasonable ground to believe that telegrams are material to such inquiry, they shall be ignorant of the parties to such telegrams, of their contents, and dates; but any description which will enable such telegrams to be identified shall be deemed sufficient.

Another view was embodied in two resolutions offered by Mr. J. Proctor Knott, of Kentucky, as a substitute for the resolutions of the committee. This substitute was agreed to, yeas 116, noes 33, as follows:

Resolved, That there is nothing in the law rendering a communication transmitted by telegraph any more privileged than a communication made orally or in any other manner whatever; that this House has the power through its subpœnas, under the hand and seal of the Speaker, to require any person to appear before any committee to which it has given authority to examine witnesses, and send for persons and papers, and bring with him such books or papers, whether the paper be telegraphic messages or others, for the inspection of such committee, as such committee may deem necessary to the investigation with which such committee may have been charged; and that such committee may order and direct any witness who may be brought before it to produce to the committee any book or paper, whether such paper be a telegraphic despatch or other, which may appear to be in his possession or under his control, which said committee may deem necessary to the investigation with which it may have been charged; and that any person upon whom such subpœna shall have been served who shall disobey the same, or, having appeared as a witness, shall disobey the order of such a committee to produce any book or paper which he shall have been ordered by such committee to produce, should be brought to the bar of the House upon a report of the facts by the committee to answer for a contempt of the authority of the House and dealt with as the law under the facts may require.

Resolved, That any person who shall prevent, or attempt to prevent, any person who shall have been subpœnaed to appear before any committee of this House from so appearing or from testifying before said committee, or from producing any book or paper which such witness may have been required to produce, or prevent or attempt to prevent any such witness from speaking the truth before such committee, should, upon a report by the committee of all the facts, be brought to the bar of the House to answer for a contempt, and dealt with as the law under the facts may require.

The resolutions as amended were then adopted.

1813. Instance wherein the House empowered the Ways and Means Committee to send for persons and papers in any matter arising out of business referred to the committee.—On February 13, 1873,[1] Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Ways and Means, presented the following resolution, which was agreed to without division:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be, and they are hereby, authorized to send for persons and papers in any matter of examination pending before said committee arising out of business referred to it by the House of Representatives.

The committee took testimony under this resolution.[2]

1814. The Senate has authorized the compulsory attendance of witnesses in legislative inquiries.—On January 18, 1882,[3] in the Senate, Mr. James Z. George, of Mississippi, from the Committee on Claims, offered the following:

Resolved, That the Committee on Claims be empowered to summon and examine witnesses to testify in regard to the claim of J. M. Wilbur for relief, now pending before said committee, etc.

This resolution was agreed to, Mr. Justin S. Morrill, of Vermont, asking if it did not introduce a novel procedure into legislation, but making no further opposition.

1815. On June 7, 1860,[1] Mr. James A. Bayard, of Delaware, from the Committee on Judiciary of the Senate, made a report concerning the sufficiency of a warrant issued for the arrest of a witness who had disregarded the summons of the committee appointed to investigate the circumstances of the raid of John Brown at Harpers Ferry. In the course of this report the assumption is made that the Senate does have power to summon witnesses to give testimony for legislative purposes.

1816. The House, after extended discussion, assumed the right to compel the attendance of witnesses in an inquiry entirely legislative in its character.

In a debate as to the right of the House to compel the attendance of witnesses for a legislative inquiry, the precedents of Parliament were considered.

On December 31, 1827,[2] Mr. Rollin C. Mallary, of Vermont, by direction of the Committee on Manufactures, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Manufactures be vested with the power and authority to send for persons and papers.

Mr. Thomas J. Oakley, of New York, proposed an amendment striking out the words vested with power and authority to send for persons and papers, and inserting as follows:

empowered to send for and to examine persons, on oath, concerning the present condition of our manufactures, and to report the minutes of such examination to this House.

An extended debate arose over this proposition. It was stated in its favor that the committee, in framing the tariff bill,[3] found many conflicting memorials before them, and that the truth could be arrived at best by oral testimony. This course had been pursued by the House of Commons. The power asked for could not be considered dangerous, for the subject deeply affected the interests of the people, and it was proposed merely to compel the attendance of witnesses, a power exercised in the most insignificant cases of litigation between persons. The viva voce examination was much more satisfactory than the written memorials. The common law of Parliament should dictate that the legislature must possess the power requisite to procure the information needed in order to act understandingly. Committees of investigation enjoyed the power. Indeed, it seemed true that committees already had the power to examine under oath, the statutes conferring on the chairmen the power to administer oaths.

In opposition it was argued that no one could cite a case in the House of Representatives where a demand for like powers had been made by a committee whose duties were similar to those of the Committee on Manufactures. The power to send for persons and papers had hithherto been exercised by the committees having judicial functions and exercising the judicial power of the House. To send the [3] At this period the Committee on Manufactures sometimes reported revenue bills.

Sergeant-at-Arms to all parts of the country to compel citizens to attend and testify on a tariff matter would be an extraordinary exercise of a power hitherto used only in cases of contested elections and impeachments. The powers of the House of Representatives could not be compared with those of the House of Commons, since the latter was restrained by no written constitution. And it had not been made plain that the House of Commons had ever issued a compulsory process in such a case.

It appears from the debate that Mr. Oakley's amendment was intended to authorize the committee to send for and examine witnesses, but not to compel their attendance against their will.

The amendment was agreed to, 100 ayes to 78 noes. The resolution as amended was then agreed to, yeas 102, nays 88.

1817. On April 4, 1828,[1] Mr. James Hamilton, of South Carolina, from the Select Committee on Retrenchment in the Expenses of the Government, reported this resolution:

Resolved, That the select committee on the subject of retrenchment be empowered to send for persons and papers, for the purpose of continuing and completing the examination.

Objection was made to this resolution by several Members, notably Messrs. Silas Wood and Henry R. Storrs, and James Strong, of New York, who urged that so great a power should always be under the control of the House, and should not be delegated except for certain specified purposes. Mr. Strong thought that the witnesses and documents wanted ought to be named.

Mr. Hamilton having stated to the House the objects to which the power was to be applied, the resolution was agreed to by the House.

1818. On January 16, 1844,[2] on motion of Mr. Cave Johnson, of Tennessee, by leave, the following resolution was presented and agreed to:

Resolved, That a subpœna issue to Col. Charles K. Gardner, the secretary of the commissioners for adjusting Cherokee claims, for the purpose of giving evidence before the Committee on Indian Affairs; and that he bring with him all records and papers connected with said business.

1819. On March 7, 1844,[3] the House, on motion of Mr. Cave Johnson, of Tennessee, Ordered, That a subpœna be issued to summon Gen. John H. Eaton to appear as a witness before the Committee on Indian Affairs.

1820. On June 14, 1882,[4] the House, by resolution, authorized the issuance of a subpœna summoning Frank Kraft, a stenographer, to appear before a subcommittee of the Committee of Elections and present his notes in order to compare them with the printed depositions before the committee, there being a question as to an alleged alteration of the testimony. The House at the same time authorized the subcommittee to administer oaths.

An instance wherein the chairman of an investigating committee administered the oath to himself and testified.—On January 27, 1837,[1] in the select committee appointed to examine into the condition of the Executive Departments of the Government, and of which Mr. Henry A. Wise, of Virginia, was chairman, Mr. Abijah Mann, of New York, moved that Mr. Wise be sworn, as he wished to propound to him certain questions.

Mr. Wise was sworn by reading himself the oath and kissing the book.

1822. Form of oath administered to witnesses before a committee.—On January 27, 1837,[1] in the select committee appointed to examine into the condition of the Executive Departments of the Government, Mr. Henry A. Wise, of Virginia, the chairman, submitted, and the committee agreed to unanimously, the following form of oath to be administered to witnesses:

> You do solemnly swear that the evidence you shall give touching the subjects of investigation of this committee shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth; so help you God.

1823. The authority to administer oaths should be given by law rather than by rule of either House.—On April 5, 1876,[2] at the time of the impeachment of Secretary Belknap, Mr. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, called attention to the fact that the rule of the Senate provided that the presiding officer of the Senate should administer the oath to the Members of the Senate sitting as a court. Mr. Edmunds said that he found no law which authorized the President of the Senate to administer this oath, and it seemed to him to stand on the rule alone. Therefore a doubt arose as to the constitutional requirement for the oath. That meant a legal and binding oath, of course, and it was understood that a legal oath was one administered by some one having authority under law to administer oaths. Therefore Mr. Edmunds proposed that the Chief Justice of the United States be invited to administer the oath. This motion was agreed to, and the oath was so administered.

1824. On February 5, 1884,[3] Mr. Nathaniel J. Hammond, of Georgia, from the Committee on the Judiciary, made a report on the bill to authorize the chairman of a subcommittee of any committee of the House to administer oaths. The report says:

> It may be true that chairmen of such subcommittees have frequently before administered oaths. But the authority is wanting, in the opinion of this committee; and even if it be doubtful, this act should pass, because in every indictment for perjury the indictment must set forth, among other things, by what court and before whom the oath was taken, averring such court or person to have competent authority to administer the same.[4]

1825. The rules provide for the rate of compensation of witnesses summoned to appear before the House or either of its committees.

Present form and history of Rule XXXVII.

Rule XXXVII provides:

> The rule for paying witnesses subpœnaed to appear before the House or either of its committees shall be as follows: For each day a witness shall attend, the sum of $2; for each mile he shall travel in coming to or going from the place of examination, the sum of 5 cents each way; but nothing shall be paid for traveling when the witness has been summoned at the place of trial.

This is the form adopted in 1880. It was taken from old Rule 138, which dated from May 31, 1872,[1] and is practically the same, except that the rule of compensation was then $4 a day instead of $2. The debate on February 27, 1880,[2] shows that $2 was fixed as being the rate paid witnesses in United States courts.[3]

The compensation of a witness residing in the District of Columbia was before the adoption of this rule fixed by statute at a sum not exceeding $2 a day.[4]

1827. A Member on his own responsibility presenting a statement of a charge against another Member, a resolution of investigation was held to be privileged.

A Member who had moved an investigation requested that he be not appointed one of the committee, as he would have to appear as a witness.

On September 4, 1888,[3] Mr. William D. Kelley, of Pennsylvania, as a question of privilege, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the special committee engaged in investigating the construction of the new Library building be directed to inquire and report to this House whether any Member of the House, acting by and for himself or in concert and combination with others, has sought by persuasion, intimidation, or other corrupt or improper means to influence or control the action of Mr. J. L. Smithmeyer, the architect of said building, in the selection, acceptance, or approval of inferior or improper materials to be used in the construction of said building.

Mr. Kelley supported this resolution by the statement on his own responsibility that there was evidence to sustain the charge and that he would produce it before the committee.

The Speaker[4] said:

The Chair thinks this is a privileged resolution as it relates to the conduct of a Member of the House.

The resolution was agreed to, with an amendment providing that the investigation should be by a select committee.

Mr. Kelley requested that he be not appointed on the committee, because he should have to appear before the committee.

The Speaker appointed the committee on September 8, Mr. Kelley not being included in the number.

1828. Propositions to investigate charges against Members have been presented as questions of privilege.—On June 11, 1862,[1] Mr. John A. Bingham, of Ohio, as a question of privilege, submitted the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas information has been received by the Government that Hon. Benjamin Wood, a Representative in Congress from the State of New York and a Member of this House, has been engaged in communicating or attempting to communicate important intelligence to the Confederate rebels in arms against the United States: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary inquire into the alleged conduct of said Benjamin Wood in the premises, and, to that end, that said committee be authorized to send for persons and papers and to examine witnesses, upon oath or affirmation, and to employ a stenographer at the usual compensation and make report to the House.

1829. On March 23, 1864,[2] Mr. Francis P. Blair, jr., of Missouri, as a question of privilege, presented a resolution which, as amended by the House, was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That a select committee of three Members be appointed by the Speaker, with power to send for persons and papers and investigate the charges made by Hon. J. W. McClurg, of Missouri, against F. P. Blair, jr., a Member of the House of Representatives from the First district of Missouri, of violating the laws in the matter of an alleged liquor speculation; and to inquire into the genuineness or falsity of the alleged order for the purchase of liquor, bearing date June 3, 1863.

1830. On January 18, 1865,[3] Mr. Green Clay Smith, of Kentucky, as a question of privilege, presented the following, which was considered and agreed to:

Whereas in a public document dated Lexington, Ky., September, 1864, signed by Brig. Gen. Speed S. Frye and John Mason Brown, colonel Forty-fifth Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, transmitted to the Kentucky legislature by Governor Thomas E. Bramlette, with his message of January 4, 1865, the Hon. Lucien Anderson, a Member of this body, is charged with corruption, bribery, and malfeasance in office: Therefore,

Resolved, That a committee of five Members of this House be appointed by the Speaker to investigate said charge, with power to send for persons and papers.

On March 3 the committee reported that "the charges were not sustained by the proof in the case."

1831. A newspaper article charging that an unnamed member of a certain committee was corrupt in his representative capacity was held to involve a question of privilege.—On February 18, 1859,[4] Mr. Mathias H. Nichols, of Ohio, as a question of privilege, submitted the following:

Whereas in the correspondence of the New York Daily Times, signed "S.," under date of the 15th of February, A. D. 1858, as also in the correspondence of other papers, it is charged that a member of the Committee on Accounts of this House made a bargain to receive money as a consideration for passing certain claims in said committee, and that subsequently the said member demanded the consideration for said service; and whereas it is further alleged that a member of said committee compelled claimants before said committee to agree to give a portion of the bills before said committee in consideration for their allowance by the same: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That a committee of five Members be appointed by the Speaker to investigate said charge or charges, said committee to report before the close of the present session of Congress.

Mr. Henry C. Burnett, of Kentucky, made the point of order that the resolution as drawn involved no question of privilege.

The Speaker[1] said:

The Chair is of the opinion, taking the preamble and resolution together, that they involve the privileges of the House.

The resolution and preamble were then agreed to.

On February 19 the Speaker appointed as the committee Messrs. Nichols, George Eustis, jr., of Louisiana; William G. Whiteley, of Delaware; and Clark B. Cochrane, of New York.[2]

On February 25, 1859, the committee reported, giving the testimony, and stating that very early in the examination the fact was developed that the person referred to in the resolution was John A. Searing, of New York, chairman of the Committee on Accounts. Thereupon the committee, by unanimous vote, determined to suspend the examination until Mr. Searing could be informed that he was at liberty to attend the examination, and confront and cross-examine the witnesses. Mr. Searing accordingly appeared but did not avail himself of the privilege of cross-examination of the witnesses. The committee recommended the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That, upon a review of all the testimony taken in the matter of the charge against John A. Searing, a Member of this House from the State of New York, and chairman of the Committee on Accounts, the evidence would not warrant a conviction nor subject him to expulsion.

When this resolution was considered on March 3, Mr. William H. Kelsey, of New York, made a point of order against the report on the ground that the committee had no authority to try Mr. Searing, but that, under the parliamentary law, they should either have reported that there was no ground for the charges, or that there was probable cause, and recommended that further proceedings be instituted.

The Speaker said:

The Chair overrules the question of order upon the ground, in the first place, that it was competent for the committee to report such a resolution as they should see proper in reference to the case. Upon the latter point made by the gentleman from New York the Chair would remark that it was decided by a former House, and decided adversely to the view taken by the gentleman.

The resolution was then agreed to, after a motion to lay it on the table had been decided in the negative.

1832. A Member who had been defamed in his reputation as a Representative by a newspaper article presented the case as one of privilege, and the House ordered an investigation.—On January 10, 1871,[3] Mr. James Brooks, of New York, rising to a question of privilege, read to the House an article from a newspaper in which the editor, Hugh J. Hastings, made charges affecting his character as a Representative. Mr. Brooks at the same time submitted a paper purporting to be the affidavit of the said Hastings, wherein the latter had confessed himself, while under indictment for libel, as a defamer of character. Mr. Brooks asked an investigation by a committee of the House.

A discussion arose as to how far the House would be justified in going in a case where it seemed so evident that the Member had been attacked by a man whose reliability was in question. It was urged that an attack from such a source should not be noticed by the House. Mr. Oliver J. Dickey, of Pennsylvania, proposed the following:

Resolved, That it would be unworthy the dignity of the House and unjust to the character of the gentleman from New York, Mr. Brooks, to found an investigation on charges made by one of such a character as his accuser.

On the other hand, it was urged that definite charges of corruption had been made against Mr. Brooks, and that he was entitled to an investigation. After further debate, on motion of Mr. Horace Maynard, of Tennessee, Ordered, That the original resolution, together with the various amendments, be referred to a select committee of five Members, with power to send for persons and papers, and with leave to report at any time.

On January 16 a memorial of Mr. Hastings, denying the authenticity of the affidavit and protesting against the jurisdiction of the House in the matter of the controversy between himself and Mr. Brooks, was presented and referred to the select committee.

On January 18, Mr. John A. Bingham, of Ohio, from the select committee, reported a resolution, which was agreed to by the House, that Mr. Brooks was exonerated of the charges by reason of the refusal of said Hastings to testify before the select committee as to the truth of the accusations.

1833. The House has sometimes ordered investigations on the basis of general and more or less vague newspaper charges.—On June 26, 1862,[1] Mr. E. P. Walton, of Vermont, as a question of privilege, submitted the following:

Whereas the publishers of the New York Tribune, on the authority of one of their correspondents, have declared and published that "offers of a pecuniary nature" have been made, apparently for the purpose of obtaining the action of this House improperly, corruptly, and criminally, which charge, if true, involves a breach of the privileges of the House, and if false in respect to any Members of this House or others who are implicated is a breach of the privileges accorded to reporters by the courtesy of the House: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed forthwith to inquire by whom and on what authority such charge, and any other contained in the article referred to, has been made, and to make thorough investigation as to their truth or falsity and report all the evidence to the House, with their opinion thereon, and such resolutions as to them shall seem meet, and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers and report at any time.

This resolution was agreed to, yeas 102, nays 8.

1834. On December 5, 1878,[2] the House ordered an investigation of a charge made by a Washington newspaper that there had been corruption in regard to the passage of certain District of Columbia legislation, and that a "Vermont Representative," a "Chicago Member," and a "Maryland Member" had received certain amounts of money corruptly.

1835. In 1846 the Senate investigated a general newspaper charge of corruption.—On March 12, 1846,[1] the Senate raised a select committee to investigate a general charge of corruption made against a portion of the Senate by a newspaper in Washington. This charge mentioned no individuals by name, but charged a portion of the Senate with having sold out to England in the settlement of the Oregon boundary question.

1836. A committee which had been empowered to investigate charges of corruption on the part of its members recommended that the evidence be transmitted to the Attorney-General.—On January 22, 1903,[2] Mr. George E. Foss, of Illinois, announcing that he was acting on instruction from the Committee on Naval Affairs, presented this resolution, which was agreed to by the House:

Whereas information has come to the Committee on Naval Affairs, through a member of said committee, of an attempt to corruptly influence his action respecting proposed legislation pending before said committee and the House:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs, or such subcommittee thereof as said committee may appoint, be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to fully investigate said matter, and for such purpose it is hereby authorized and empowered to send for persons and papers, to compel the attendance of witnesses, and to administer oaths. Said committee shall have authority to report at any time, and the expenses incurred hereunder shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers approved by the chairman.

On February 3[3] Mr. Robert W. Tayler, of Ohio, submitted the report, which presented the testimony and the following conclusions:

Your committee has most carefully heard and considered the testimony taken before it, and upon the same has come to the following conclusions:

1. That the charge made by Mr. Lessler that an attempt had been made to corruptly influence his action respecting proposed legislation is sustained by the evidence, such attempt, in the opinon of the committee, having been made by one Philip Doblin, on his own initiative and responsibility, with the idea of making money for himself if he should find Mr. Lessler corruptly approachable.

2. That there is no evidence to sustain the charge of an attempt by Lemuel E. Quigg to corruptly influence a member of the committee on Naval Affairs respecting proposed legislation pending before said committee and the House.

3. That there is no evidence to sustain the charge of an attempt by the Holland Submarine Boat Company or any of its agents to corruptly influence a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs respecting proposed legislation before said committee and the House.

In view of the foregoing, we recommend that the clerk of the committee be directed to certify to the Attorney-General of the United States a copy of the testimony taken at the hearing, with a request that he take such action as the law and the facts warrant.

The report, which was referred to the House Calendar, was not acted on by the House.

1837. The investigation of charges against Stanley Matthews, a Senator from Ohio.

Form of resolution providing for investigation of charges against a Senator.

The Senate requested of the House and received a copy of testimony taken before a House committee and implicating a Senator.

[3] House Report No. 3482.

A Senate committee, with authority to take testimony in the recess between two sessions of the same Congress, was yet unable to compel testimony from a recalcitrant witness.

Stanley Matthews, a Senator from Ohio, was sworn and examined before a Senate committee appointed to investigate his conduct.

A Senate committee determined that a witness summoned to testify before it was not entitled to counsel.

On June 5, 1878,[1] in the Senate, Mr. Stanley Matthews, of Ohio, rose to a question of privilege, and having addressed the Senate upon the subject of certain statements made elsewhere, calculated to reflect upon his character and standing as a Member of the Senate, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That a select committee of seven Senators be appointed to inquire into and consider all things touching the matter stated and referred to by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Matthews] and the events connected therewith, and particularly what connection, if any, that Senator had with any real or pretended frauds or other wrongs committed in the conduct and returns of the election in the State of Louisiana in 1876, and with any promises of protection or reward, if any, made by anyone to one James E. Anderson or others, in consideration of, or connection with, any official conduct by said Anderson or others, in relation to said election or the returns thereof; and into all the circumstances of any recommendation by the said Senator of the said Anderson for appointment to office; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers, to employ a clerk and stenographer, and have leave to sit during the recess.

Ordered, That the committee be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The committee appointed were: Messrs. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont; William B. Allison, of Iowa; John J. Ingalls, of Kansas; George F. Hoar, of Massachusetts; David Davis, of Illinois; William P. Whyte, of Maryland, and Charles W. Jones, of Florida.

On June 19, on motion of Mr . Allison:

Resolved, That the select committee appointed under the resolution of the 5th instant to make inquiry concerning the alleged connection of Senator Matthews with matters relative to the late Presidential election in Louisiana, in exercising the power heretofore granted to sit during the recess of Congress, may hold its sessions at such place or places as it shall deem most convenient for the purposes of the investigation.

On December 10, 1878, on motion of Mr. Allison:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives be respectfully requested to transmit to the Senate a copy of the testimony of one James E. Anderson relating to the Hon. Stanley Matthews, a Member of the Senate from the State of Ohio, understood to have been taken before one of the committees of the House of Representatives.

This testimony was duly communicated to the Senate by message from the House, and was referred to the select committee.

On March 1, 1879, Mr. Allison submitted the report of the committee, which was a recital of the proceedings of the committee:

The committee held its first meeting on the 11th June, 1878, and determined, on the 13th of June, to summon James E. Anderson, named in said resolution. Mr. Anderson appeared, but was not examined, for the reason that his presence was requested before a committee of the House, known as the Potter committee, as appears from the following letter addressed to the acting chairman:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., June 18, 1878.

Mr. Senator ALLISON, Chairman, etc.:

Mrs. Jenks is about to be put on the stand, and we would prefer, if entirely agreeable to the Senate committee, that Mr Anderson should be present during her examination. This is important to the House committee. At any other time take him.

W. R. MORRISON,
Acting Chairman.

The committee again met on the 21st of June, when Anderson, the witness, again appeared and refused to testify; the circumstances of his refusal are fully set forth in the printed proceedings of the committee herewith reported. Congress having adjourned on the 20th day of June, 1878, the committee had no power to compel the witness, Anderson, to testify. On motion of Mr. Whyte, the committee adjourned to meet again when called by the chairman of the committee, it being then understood that no meeting would be called during the recess of Congress, as the committee had no power to enforce its orders in vacation. The committee again met on the 10th day of December, 1878. The chairman stated that he had received a telegram from James E. Anderson, dated Eureka, Nev., saying that he would now appear before the committee if summoned. On motion of Mr. Edmunds, it was "Ordered, That there be reported to the Senate the following:

"'Resolved, That the House of Representatives be respectfully requested to transmit to the Senate a copy of the testimony of one James E. Anderson relating to the Hon. Stanley Matthews, a Member of the Senate from the State of Ohio, understood to have been taken before one of the committees of the House of Representatives.'

"Mr. Edmunds submitted a motion that James E. Anderson be reported to the Senate as in contempt of its authority for refusing to testify before this committee, and that the Senate be requested to take the proper proceedings to secure his attendance.

"The motion was not agreed to, there being three ayes: Messrs. Edmunds, Davis, and Whyte. The noes were: Messrs. Allison (chairman), Hoar, and Ingalls. Mr. Jones, absent.

"On motion of Mr. Whyte, the committee adjourned to meet at the call of the chairman"—

It being understood that the committee should await the action of the House on the resolution calling for the testimony of Anderson taken by the House committee, which resolution was reported to the Senate on the 10th of December, 1878, and agreed to. On the 28th day of January, 1879, the House of Representatives transmitted to the Senate the testimony of James E. Anderson in pursuance of the request made by resolution of the Senate heretofore referred to, passed on the 10th day of December 1878. This testimony was on the 28th day of January, 1879, referred to this committee and ordered to be printed. On the 7th February the committee met pursuant to the call of the chairman—

"Present: The chairman (Mr. Allison), Mr. Edmunds, Mr. Hoar, Mr. Davis, and Mr. Whyte"—

When the following proceedings were had:

"On motion of Mr. Edmunds, Senator Matthews was directed to be notified that the committee had received a copy of the testimony of James E. Anderson before a select committee of the House of Representatives, and was ready to hear what he had to say on the subject.

"The chairman having transmitted such notification, Hon. Stanley Matthews appeared before the committee.

Hon. Stanley Matthews was then sworn and examined.

The committee append to their report the records of the committee[1] showing the refusal of Mr. Anderson to testify:

FRIDAY, June 21, 1878.

The committee met pursuant to call.

Present: Messrs. Allison (acting chairman), Hoar, Ingalls, Davis, Whyte, and Jones.

Hon. Stanley Matthews was present by invitation.

[1] Pages 686–691 of Senate Document No. 11.

James E. Anderson, who had been summoned as a witness, appeared.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. Will you be sworn?

Mr. ANDERSON. I will state to the committee before I take the oath that I desire to be represented here by counsel.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. You desire to be represented by counsel?

Mr. ANDERSON. I desire to be represented by counsel.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. A witness!

Mr. ANDERSON. A witness. I desire to be represented by counsel.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. Chairman, I suppose he does not desire to have counsel present before we determine the question whether he shall be sworn.

Mr. ANDERSON. I should like to have the question settled before I am sworn as to whether I can have counsel or not.

Mr. DAVIS. That is a matter we can dispose of hereafter. [To the acting chairman.] You can swear him and tell him we can discuss this matter afterwards. We can not dispose of this question now, probably.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. Have you arranged for your counsel, if you have counsel?

Mr. ANDERSON. I will by to-morrow.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. Chairman, I hope there will be no delay about swearing the witness.

Mr. DAVIS. Oh, no, sir.

Mr. INGALLS This is a question for the committee to discuss.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. You will be sworn, Mr. Anderson.

The oath was administered.

The WITNESS. Now, I renew my request.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN That we shall be obliged to consider

Mr. DAVIS. With closed doors, of course

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. I think we had better settle the question now.

The WITNESS. Can you excuse me for ten minutes?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. No, we can not excuse you just at this moment.

The room was therefore cleared of all but members of the committee. After some time spent in deliberation the doors were reopened.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. Mr. Anderson, the committee have decided that you are not entitled to counsel.

The WITNESS. I simply desire to say that I have no statement to make and no questions to answer

Later, after Mr. Anderson had reiterated his request for counsel and had declined to testify otherwise, the following occurred:

The committee room was cleared for deliberation; and after some time spent in consultation, Mr. Matthews was invited to attend, and he accordingly appeared.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. You have heard, Mr. Matthews, what Mr. Anderson has said. Have you any suggestion to make to the committee in reference to going on without Mr. Anderson's testimony?

Mr. DAVIS. In other words, you know that the committee decided that the case, whatever it was, should be made out, and then you should be put on the stand. You have seen how this ends for the present. Have you any suggestion to make? Until the Senate meets we have no way of compelling his attendance.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I dislike very much to take the responsibility of making any suggestions to the committee on the subject. I am ready here to-day, and shall be at any future time that the convenience of the committee shall fix, for the purpose of assisting the committee and facilitating it in any way within my power in the objects and purposes for which it was originated and authorized.

The only course, other than that of waiting until the committee can have the power of the Senate to compel the attendance of the witness, is to obtain from the committee of the other House the statements which he has already made under oath before it, and which constituted the ground on the basis of which I asked the Senate for the appointment of this committee. In case the committee think that that is sufficient for the purpose of the investigation with which they are charged, and obtain that testimony, I am ready to go on as if it had been delivered again here. But whether the committee ought to take that course, I think, is a question which the committee ought to decide for themselves. I do not wish to be considered as giving any opinion or advice or expressing any wish in regard to that matter.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. I think we can now relieve you from attendance, Mr. Matthews.

Mr. Matthews thereupon retired, and the doors were thrown open to the public generally.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. Mr. Reporter, will you state what took place a moment ago, when Mr. Matthews was called in?

The stenographer read the statement made by Mr. Matthews.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. The reporter has stated all that took place. Stand up, Mr. Anderson. [James E. Anderson rose.] The committee have decided that we will require the testimony of Mr. Anderson; and I now wish to ask you, Mr. Anderson, if you are willing to answer such questions as may be propounded to you by the committee or any member of it?

Mr. ANDERSON. I am not.

Q. You still persist?—A. I still persist.

Q. In refusing to answer any question pertaining to the matter before this committee?

Mr. ANDERSON. I do.

Q. And you therefore set the committee at defiance?

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. Chairman, in the absence of the Senate we have no power to punish Mr. Anderson for the contempt in refusing to answer our questions. Under these circumstances I move that this committee adjourn, subject to the call of the chairman.

The motion was agreed to.

1838. The investigation of charges against L. F. Grover, a Senator from Oregon.

Form of resolution for authorizing investigation of charges against a Senator.

Discussion as to the rules which should govern the admission of evidence before a legislative committee of investigation.

On March 9, 1877,[1] in the Senate, Mr. La Fayette Grover, of Oregon, presented the following, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the thirteen memorials heretofore presented to the Senate by Hon. J. H. Mitchell, purporting to be signed by 369 citizens of the State of Oregon, reciting that it was currently reported and generally believed that the election of L. F. Grover as a Senator of the United States was procured by bribery, corruption, and other unlawful means in the legislature of the State of Oregon, and that the said L F. Grover did corruptly and fraudulently issue a certificate of election to one E. A. Cronin as a Presidential elector on December 6, 1876, and that the said L. F. Grover did bear false witness before the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections on or about January 6, 1877, be now referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, who shall thoroughly investigate and report upon the foregoing charges, with power to send for persons and papers.

On March 14,[2] Mr. John H. Mitchell, of Oregon, offered the following:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections be authorized to designate a subcommittee of three of its members who shall have authority to sit in the vacation for the purpose of taking testimony and making report to full committee at commencement of next session in pursuance of the resolution of the Senate authorizing an investigation into certain charges preferred against La Fayette Grover, Senator from Oregon; and such subcommittee shall have all the powers to send for persons and papers and administer oaths that the full committee now has.

On March 17,[1] the resolution was considered, and Mr. Eli Saulsbury, of Delaware, proposed this amendment:

Strike out all after the word "resolved" and in lieu thereof insert:

That the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to which was referred a resolution of the Senate relating to the election of La Fayette Grover as Senator from the State of Oregon, be, and the said committee is, instructed to appoint the judge of the fourth judicial district of said State a commissioner to take testimony relating to the matters referred to in said resolution, and the said commissioner so appointed shall have power and authority, and it shall be his duty, to issue subpœnas for witnesses as well on behalf of the said La Fayette Grover as against him, and to give due notice of the time and place when and where the testimony will be taken. The testimony so taken shall be forwarded to the said committee, which shall report the same, with their conclusions thereon, at the next regular session of the Senate.

On motion by Mr. Mitchell to amend the amendment by striking out all after the word "instructed" and in lieu thereof inserting:

To appoint from its members a subcommittee of three, who shall take testimony relating to the matters referred to in said resolution and report to the full committee on the first Monday in December next; and for such purpose said subcommittee shall have power to sit in vacation; and if they deem expedient, go to the State of Oregon; and such committee shall have power to employ a clerk, stenographer, and sergeant-at-arms, and shall have all the powers of the general committee to administer oaths and send for persons and papers; and the expenses of such subcommittee, not exceeding $10,000, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of such subcommittee.

After debate, it was determined in the affirmative.

On motion by Mr. Saulsbury to further amend the amendment by adding thereto the following:

And that the said L. F. Grover shall be notified of the sessions of the said subcommittee, with the right to be present at the examination of witnesses.

It was determined in the affirmative.

The amendment of Mr. Saulsbury, as amended, was then agreed to; and,

On the question to agree to the resolution as amended, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to which was referred a resolution of the Senate relating to the election of La Fayette Grover as Senator from the State of Oregon, be, and the said committee is, instructed to appoint from its members a subcommittee of three, who shall take testimony relating to the matters referred to in said resolution, and report to the full committee on the first Monday in December next; and for such purpose such subcommittee shall have power to sit in vacation, and, if they deem expedient, go to the State of Oregon; and such subcommittee shall have power to employ a clerk, stenographer, and sergeant-at-arms, and shall have all the power of the general committee to administer oaths and send for persons and papers; and the expenses of such subcommittee, not exceeding $10,000, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of such subcommittee; and that the said L. F. Grover shall be notified of the sessions of the said subcommittee, with the right to be present at the examination of witnesses.

It was determined in the affirmative, yeas 39, nays 8.

On June 15, 1878,[2] the committee submitted a report with a recommendation that the committee be discharged, the evidence not, in their opinion, sustaining the charge. Mr. Eli Saulsbury, of Delaware, in views filed by him as a part of the report, concurred with the findings of the committee, but criticised its method of procedure:

The undersigned, as a member of the subcommittee charged with the duty of making the investigations required by the first-mentioned resolution, begs leave respectfully to submit his own conclusions from the evidence taken.

An examination of the testimony will show that the widest latitude was given to the investigation by the subcommittee. Witnesses were not restricted to matters within their own knowledge, but were allowed to testify as to their beliefs and suspicions, unsupported by any facts, and to narrate hearsay evidence of no higher character than the fugitive rumors which are not unfrequently current on the streets of a State capital preceding the election of a United States Senator.

It may be at times impossible for a legislative committee to apply to an investigation with which it is charged the rules which govern the admissibility of evidence in courts of justice, but the undersigned must be allowed to express his conviction that in an investigation into the truth of allegations affecting the personal honor of a Member of the Senate, as well as his right to a seat in the body, no such wide departure should be allowed in the admission of testimony as the evidence in this case will show was permitted. While Senator Grover can have no cause to regret the latitude that was given to the inquiry into matters alleged against him or the regularity of his election, by reason of anything elicited against him or those to whom he owes his election to the Senate, it ought not to be allowed to become a precedent to govern similar investigations in the future.

The undersigned objected at the very commencement of the investigation to the latitude in the examination of witnesses which is usually allowed in investigations by legislative committees, and insisted on an observance, as far as possible, of the rules which obtain in courts of justice in that regard. Had his suggestion been adopted in practice, the testimony in this case would have been compressed into a very narrow compass and would have excluded a large mass of irrelevant testimony taken by the subcommittee.[1]

1839. A Senator, having been indicted by a grand jury, asked and obtained an investigation by a committee of the Senate.

A question as to how far a legislative investigating committee should be governed by the rules of evidence.

A decision by a court that the statute prohibiting a Senator from receiving compensation for procuring an office for another does not apply to a Senator-elect.

On February 1, 1904,[2] in the Senate, Mr. Charles H. Dietrich, of Nebraska, said:

Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege. By a Federal grand jury at Omaha I have recently been indicted for alleged violation of the laws of the United States, and on a trial of the indictments before a Federal court at Omaha was discharged by the Federal judge without the cause being heard upon its merits, upon the ground that my acts were no violation of the Federal law.

[1] In 1858 (Election Cases, S. Doc. No. 11, special session 58th Cong , p. 949; 1st sess. 35th Cong., S. Report No. 314, Globe, pp. 2075–2079, 2123, 2163) the Senate considered the case of Henry M. Rice, Senator from Minnesota. May 12, 1858, the credentials of Mr. Rice were presented, and he took his seat in the Senate. On the same day the following resolution was submitted by Mr. Harlan, of Iowa, for consideration: "Resolved, That a committee be appointed to investigate the allegation of fraud and extortion made against Henry M. Rice as agent of the Secretary of War in the sale of the Fort Crawford Reservation, by settlers on said reservation, and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers." This resolution was amended so that the Committee on Military Affairs were instructed to make the investigation. That committee reported June 9, 1858, that "after an examination of all the testimony adduced, they do not find that it sustains any allegation which imputes criminality to or arraigns the integrity of Mr. Rice, and finding nothing in the developments of the investigation which, in the opinion of the committee, tend to disqualify him for a seat in the Senate, they herewith submit the record in the case as a part of this report, and ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject." The report was unanimously agreed to.

Before taking further part in the deliberations of this body I owe a duty to the Senate, whose honor has been assailed, to the State which in part I represent, whose credit has been attacked, and to myself, whose integrity has been impugned. If guilty of the least of these charges, I deserve to be driven from this high place in disgrace and receive the severest penalty of the criminal law. Confident in my innocence, I desire to submit the whole matter to the Senate.

Thereupon Mr. Dietrich submitted a resolution, which was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the President pro tempore shall appoint a committee of five to investigate and report to the Senate all the facts connected with the appointment of Jacob Fisher as postmaster at Hastings, Nebr., and the leasing of the building used at this time for a post-office in that city, and particularly to investigate and report as to the action of Charles H. Dietrich, a Senator from Nebraska, in connection with such appointment and leasing.

The President pro tempore[1] appointed as the committee Messrs. George F. Hoar, of Massachusetts; Orville H. Platt, of Connecticut; John C. Spooner, of Wisconsin; Francis M. Cockrell, of Missouri, and Edmund W. Pettus, of Alabama.

On February 2 the Senate agreed to this resolution, which had been presented on the preceding day by Mr. Hoar:

Resolved, That the special committee appointed to inquire into certain charges affecting the Hon. Charles H. Dietrich, a Senator from the State of Nebraska, be authorized to employ a clerk and stenographer and, by themselves or any subcommittee of their number, to sit during the sessions of the Senate, to send for persons and papers, and to administer oaths.

On April 14[2] Mr. Platt presented the report of the committee, which found that—

Upon full consideration of all of the evidence, the committee is of opinion that Senator Dietrich has not been guilty of any violation of the statutes of the United States or of any corrupt or unworthy conduct relating either to the appointment of Jacob Fisher as postmaster at Hastings, Nebr., or the leasing of the building in question to the United States for the purposes of a post-office.

As to method of procedure the report says:

The committee, with the consent of Senator Dietrich, in order that no possible fact bearing upon the matter might be overlooked, received the statements of all of the witnesses in full, not regarding strictly the rules of evidence in that respect.

It will appear that the committee, with such consent of Senator Dietrich, admitted not only such evidence against him as would have been competent in a court of justice, but also a good deal of hearsay testimony—being all that was brought to their attention—as a possible clew to further information. The committee did not determine how far this proceeding would have been justified for any reason without such consent, even if they had carefully refrained from attaching any weight to it in their final decision; but it, in fact, did not in the least tend to shake or affect the conviction they have reached.

As to the charges against Senator Dietrich the report says:

Senator Dietrich was indicted in the district court of Nebraska in five different cases, afterwards remitted to the circuit court,[3] the record in two of which is printed with the testimony taken by the

[2] Record, pp. 4800, 4801.

[3] In delivering the opinion of the court, Judge Van Devanter said:

"Section 1781 of the Revised Statutes, under which this action is brought, contains two distinct and separate prohibitions. The first paragraph, under which this indictment is brought, provides that 'every Member of Congress, officer, or agent of the Government' who commits certain acts shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and provides for certain punishment. The other paragraph provides that committee in this case, which record, as the committee thinks, fairly presents all the charges against him, so that the printing of the record in the other three cases is unnecessary.

In the first of the cases, the record of which is printed, Senator Dietrich is charged in effect that while a Senator in Congress from the State of Nebraska he took, received, and agreed to receive a bribe from Jacob Fisher for procuring and aiding to procure for said Fisher the office of postmaster at Hastings, Nebr. To this indictment Mr. Dietrich pleaded not guilty, and a jury was impaneled to try the case. After the opening statement of the United States district attorney, in which he admitted that the date of the offenses charged was prior to the taking of the oath of office of Senator by Mr. Dietrich, a verdict of acquittal was directed by Circuit Judge Van Devanter, who held that the statute in question did not apply to a Senator elect, and a verdict of acquittal was accordingly rendered.

In the second case, the record of which is printed, it is charged that Mr. Dietrich, while a Senator in Congress from the State of Nebraska, did hold and enjoy a contract theretofore entered into between himself and the United States for the use and occupation, for the purposes of a United States post-office at Hastings, Nebr., of a lot and building owned by the defendant. In this case a demurrer was entered, argued, and overruled, but subsequently, on the motion of the district attorney, a nolle prosequi was entered, and Senator Dietrich was discharged.

One of the other cases against Senator Dietrich differs from the first, the record of which is printed, only in the manner of charging the same offenses alleged in the first case, and in this case a nolle prosequi was also entered, upon the motion of the district attorney, and Senator Dietrich was discharged.

In the other two cases Senator Dietrich and Mr. Fisher were indicted jointly for a conspiracy to violate section 1781 of the Revised Statutes, the ground of such conspiracy being the alleged agreement between Messrs. Dietrich and Fisher, which was set up as a separate offense in the first case referred to. In these two cases demurrers were entered and sustained, upon the ground that the indictment did not charge a conspiracy, but only separate offenses against Dietrich and Fisher.

So that, eliminating technicalities, the offenses charged against Senator Dietrich were—

"First. That as Senator he received from Fisher either the sum of $1,300 or $500, or the equivalent of the same in property, for procuring for said Fisher the office of postmaster at Hastings; and

"Second That as Senator he held and enjoyed a contract with the Government."

The statute which Senator Dietrich was alleged to have violated in the first case referred to is section 1781 of the Revised Statutes, as follows:

"Every Member of Congress or any officer or agent of the Government who, directly or indirectly, takes, receives, or agrees to receive from any person for procuring, or aiding to procure, any contract, office, or place from the Government or any department thereof, or from any officer of the United States, for any person whatever, or for giving any such contract, office, or place to any person whomsoever, * * * shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be imprisoned not more than two years and fined not more than $10,000. * * * And any Member of Congress or officer convicted of a violation of this section shall, moreover, be disqualified from holding any office of honor, profit, or trust under the Government of the United States."

every Member of Congress, officer, or agent of the Government 'after his election,' etc., shall be liable to the penalty provided for the commission of such acts."

The opinion then holds that a man elected to Congress does not actually become a member of that body until he has qualified and taken the oath at the bar of the House to which he has been elected. The last paragraph, said the court, refers to acts which may be committed by Members of Congress after their qualification or acceptance of duties of their offices.

"The two Houses of Congress under the Constitution," says the court, "are the only judges of whom shall sit as members of their respective bodies. The district attorney has admitted that there was no session of Congress from March 28, the date of the election by the legislature of Senator Dietrich, and December 2, the date of the convening of Congress. Until the latter date there could be no question raised as to his actual membership in the Senate, nor could he qualify before that body until that time. Until then it was not known whether he would be permitted to enter upon his duties as a United States Senator and as the representative of the people of Nebraska before that body.

"Our opinion, therefore, is that this defendant was not a United States Senator at the time of the acts charged in this indictment, within the inhibition of this statute. The jury is instructed to find a verdict of not guilty."

The statute which he was alleged to have violated in the second case is section 3739 of the Revised Statutes, which is here quoted, together with the pertinent sections, 3740 and 3741:

"SEC. 3739. No Member of or Delegate to Congress shall directly or indirectly, himself, or by any other person in trust for him, or for his use or benefit, or on his account, undertake, execute, hold, or enjoy, in whole or in part, any contract or agreement made or entered into in behalf of the United States by any officer or person authorized to make contracts on behalf of the United States. Every person who violates this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be fined $3,000. All contracts or agreements made in violation of this section shall be void; and whenever any sum of money is advanced on the part of the United States, in consideration of any such contract or agreement, it shall be forthwith repaid; and in case of refusal or delay to repay the same, when demanded by the proper officer of the Department under whose authority such contract or agreement shall have been made or entered into, every person so refusing or delaying, together with his surety or sureties, shall be forthwith prosecuted at law for the recovery of any such sum of money so advanced.

"SEC. 3740. Nothing contained in the preceding section shall extend, or be construed to extend, to any contract or agreement made or entered into or accepted by any incorporated company where such contract or agreement is made for the general benefit of such incorporation or company, nor to the purchase or sale of bills of exchange or other property by any Member of (or Delegate to) Congress where the same are ready for delivery and payment thereof is made at the time of making or entering into the contract or agreement.

"SEC. 3741. In every such contract or agreement to be made or entered into or accepted by or on behalf of the United States there shall be inserted an express condition that no Member of (or Delegate to) Congress shall be admitted to any share or part of such contract or agreement or to any benefit to arise thereupon."

The committee found no evidence to sustain the charge that the postmaster in question had been appointed for a corrupt consideration.

As to the rental of the building the committee found the transaction proper and not open to criticism.

1840. When testimony elicited by a committee involves a Member, the committee is to report to the House that the Member may be heard and special authority be given to inquire concerning him.—Section XI of Jefferson's Manual provides:

When a committee is charged with an inquiry, if a Member prove to be involved, they can not proceed against him, but must make a special report to the House; whereupon the Member is heard in his place, or at the bar, or a special authority is given to the committee to inquire concerning him. (9 Grey, 523.)

1841. A committee charged with an investigation sometimes adopts rules to govern the examination of witnesses and the use of the testimony by persons implicated.—On March 3, 1838,[1] the select committee appointed to investigate the causes of the death of Jonathan Cilley, of Maine, agreed to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the following interrogatory be put to all the witnesses who shall be examined before this committee.

Please state what you know in regard to the causes which led to the death of the Hon. Jonathan Cilley, late a Member of the House of Representatives, and the circumstances connected therewith; and if present on the field, state further all that transpired, in the order in which it occurred; what were the propositions made for settling the difference; and what was said and responded on each proposition, in the words of the persons speaking.

On March 14, 1838, the committee agreed to the following:

The committee having, in reply to the general interrogatory propounded, received written statements from Messrs. Crittenden and Pierce, of the Senate, Messrs. Wise, Bynum, Jones, Menefee, Duncan, Hawes, and Calhoun, of the House of Representatives, and Messrs. Claiborne, Schaumberg, Foltz, Fuller, and Brown, in relation to the causes which led to the death of the Hon. Jonathan Cilley, and the circumstances connected therewith, adopts the following rules for the examination of witnesses:

Resolved, That the clerk shall prepare three files of all the testimony above mentioned; one of which shall be given to Mr. Graves, one to Mr. Wise and the two friends of Mr. Graves, who acted with him on the field, and one to Mr. Jones and the two friends of Mr. Cilley who acted with him on the field, in the confidence that they will be used for the sole purpose of preparing additional interrogatories.

2. The further examination shall be by written interrogatories, prepared and submitted to the committee, and which, if approved, shall be propounded to the witnesses by the chairman, and his answer immediately taken down by the Clerk, or written by the witness, in the presence of the committee.

3. The order of proceeding shall be as follows:

1. The witness being called before the committee, the statement made by him shall be read by the Clerk, if he desire it.

2. The additional interrogatories shall then be proposed.

3. Interrogatories, in conclusion, may then be proposed by the committee.

4. These being answered, the witness shall subscribe his testimony, and his examination be finally closed.

Resolved, That this committee will grant leave to any person who may be implicated to propound interrogatories in the usual mode, and the evidence taken shall be open to his examination for that purpose, in the hands of the clerk.

1842. On January 20, 1839,[1] the select committee appointed to investigate the defalcations in the custom-house at New York, adopted the following:

Resolved, That the Member who shall name or cause a witness to be summoned shall have the right to proceed first with the examination of such witness; and when said Member shall have concluded, the Members, in alphabetical order, shall have the right to examine the witness. No Member having the witness under examination shall be interrupted by a question from another Member, without his consent; and after each has been called for examination in chief, the Members shall again be called alphabetically for cross-examination, until all have concluded.

1843. Charges against a Member having developed during examination by a committee, a resolution directing the committee to report them was offered as of privilege, and agreed to by the House.—On July 21, 1854,[2] Mr. Thomas H. Bayly, of Virginia, submitted, as a question of privilege, the following resolution:

Resolved, That the special committee of which the Hon. Mr. Letcher is chairman be instructed to communicate to this House any communication made to that committee reflecting upon the representative character of T. H. Bayly, a Member of this House, by B. E. Green or others, with a view that the House may take such action as to it may seem proper, the said committee having decided that it was not within their jurisdiction.

The record of debates shows that this was assumed to be a question of privilege, and no point was insisted upon against its consideration, although objection was made that the matter before the committee should not thus be taken up by the House.

[2] First session Thirty-third Congress, Journal, p. 1178; Globe, p. 1835.

The resolution was agreed to, and Mr. Letcher at once communicated the letter of B. E. Green.

This letter, on motion of Mr. Bayly, was referred to a special committee of investigation.

1844. Examination by committees into alleged corrupt practices having implicated Members, the committees reported recommendations without first seeking the order of the House.

The rule of Parliament relating to Members implicated by testimony, discussed but not applied.

On February 19, 1857,[1] Mr. Henry Winter Davis, of Maryland, from the select committee appointed to investigate certain alleged corrupt combinations among Members of Congress, made a report having reference to William A. Gilbert, a Member of the House from the State of New York.

Mr. Galusha A. Grow, of Pennsylvania, objected to the reception of the report on the ground that, as it implicated a Member of the House, it could not be received as a question of privilege. He cited the precedent in the case of the Graves-Cilley duel in support of this contention. There was debate, during which it was urged, on the authority of the parliamentary law, that the committee should have reported to the House that a Member was implicated, so that the House might take action; and that a recommendation for final action and punishment should not be thus presented.

The resolutions with which the report concluded were as follows:

Resolved, That William A. Gilbert, a Member of this House from New York, did agree with F. F. C. Triplett to procure the passage of a resolution or bill through the present Congress for the purchase by Congress of certain copies of the book of the said Triplett on the pension and bounty land laws, in consideration that the said Triplett should allow him to receive a certain sum of money out of the appropriation for the purchase of the book.

Resolved, That William A. Gilbert did cast his vote on the Iowa land bill, depending heretofore before this Congress, for a corrupt consideration consisting of seven square miles of land and some stock given or to be given to him.

Resolved, That William A. Gilbert, a Member of this House from New York, be forthwith expelled from this House.

After the reading of the report and the resolutions, and further debate, the House, by a vote of 168 yeas and 5 nays, received the report.

1845. Method of procedure where testimony before an investigating committee implicates Members of the House.—On February 19, 1857,[2] the select committee[3] appointed to investigate charges that Members of the House, not named, had entered into corrupt combinations made a general report. The report gives the following as its rule of action:

Where testimony was taken tending to implicate any Member of the House, a copy of such testimony should be furnished to such Member, and an opportunity given him to explain or contradict it by other evidence; or, if the Member desired to do so, by his own statement, under oath or not under oath, as he might think proper. This course was regarded by the committee as more liberal toward the Members whose conduct might be called in question than to pursue the practice in some former cases of merely reading the testimony to them. And every Member, who is in any degree implicated by the testimony taken, was informed that if he desired it the witness or witnesses by whom he was implicated would be recalled by the committee for examination.

1846. The committee investigating charges made by a Member of the House against a member of the press gallery allowed the Member to be represented by counsel.—In the proceedings of the select committee to investigate the charges made by Mr. J. Warren Keifer, of Ohio, on the floor of the House against H. V. Boynton, a member of the press gallery, the committee determined that the examination of witnesses for the prosecution should be conducted by counsel for Mr. Keifer, and that the examination of witnesses for Mr. Boynton be conducted in chief by the committee.[1]

1847. A Member's character being impeached by the statement of another Member before an investigating committee, the committee allowed both Members to be represented by counsel.—On September 11, 1888,[2] the select committee appointed by the House to inquire "whether any Member of the House" had been guilty of improper conduct in relation to certain contracts for the new library met, and Hon. William D. Kelley, of Pennsylvania, who had proposed the resolution of inquiry, appeared, and announced that the Member against whom the resolution was directed was Mr. William G. Stahlnecker.

The committee thereupon granted the privilege to both Mr. Kelley and Mr. Stahlnecker that they should be represented by counsel.

Mr. Kelley was requested to furnish a bill of particulars of the charges against Mr. Stahlnecker, and also to furnish a copy to Mr. Stahlnecker.

1848. A Member implicated by the testimony taken by a committee was permitted to read the testimony, testify himself, and call witnesses.—On May 29, 1856,[3] the select committee of the House appointed to take into consideration the assault upon Senator Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts, by Representative Preston S. Brooks, of South Carolina, were informed by their chairman that he had, in accordance with their order, called on Mr. Lawrence M. Keitt, of South Carolina, a Member implicated by the testimony, and informed him that he should have the opportunity of reading the testimony, of testifying himself, and of calling witnesses that he might see fit to have subpœnaed.

1849. A citizen who considered himself implicated by the investigation of a committee was allowed to insert an explanation in the report.—In 1843[4] the Committee on Indian Affairs allowed a citizen who considered himself implicated by statements contained in a report published as part of the committee's report to the House to submit an explanation, and this was included among the documents printed as part of the report to the House.

1850. A committee of the House having reported that it had taken testimony which inculpated a Senator, the House directed that it be transmitted to the Senate.—On March 21, 1867,[1] the Committee on Public Expenditures of the House reported that while engaged in the investigation ordered by the House they had taken testimony which apparently inculpated one or more Members of the Senate, and in the opinion of the committee it was proper to report the fact to the House, that such action might be taken as comported with the courtesy due from one House of Congress to the other. The committee therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the House having been informed by one of its committees that testimony has been brought to the knowledge of said committee, which testimony apparently inculpates one or more Members of the Senate, the House therefore direct that all such testimony be transmitted to the Senate for its information.

The House agreed to the resolution.

1851. Testimony affecting a Senator, when taken by a House committee in open session, need not be under seal when transmitted to the Senate.

A modification of the rule of Parliament in reference to the communication of testimony.

On February 4, 1873,[2] Mr. Luke P. Poland, of Vermont, from the select committee appointed to investigate the Credit Mobilier, reported the following:

Whereas the evidence taken by the select committee of the House appointed December 2, 1872, for the purpose of examining into charges of bribery of Members of this House contains matter affecting Members of the Senate: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be directed to transmit to the Senate a copy of all evidence thus far reported to the House by said committee, together with a copy of that resolution.

Mr. Poland said that the parliamentary law seemed to require the evidence to be transmitted under seal, but such procedure presupposed the evidence to be taken by the committee without the knowledge of the outside world. But in this case a different rule had been followed, so he proposed the resolution in this form.

The resolution was agreed to.

1852. A committee of the House having taken testimony affecting a Senator, it was ordered that a copy of it be sent to him.—On March 26, 1867,[3] Mr. Charles A. Eldridge, of Wisconsin, offered the following resolution relating to testimony affecting a Senator, and the House agreed to the same:

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be, and is hereby, instructed to make and certify a copy of the testimony of Davis A. Hull, taken before the Committee on Public Expenditures in its investigation of the New York custom-house frauds, and deliver the same so certified to Senator Patterson, of Tennessee; and said committee is hereby authorized to allow the Clerk the opportunity to make said copy of said testimony.

1853. Testimony taken by the Senate having implicated a Member of the House, the House ordered an investigation, although the testimony had not been transmitted.—On February 22, 1873,[4] Mr. Michael C. Kerr, of Indiana, presented as a question of privilege a resolution providing for an investigation of certain allegations against a Member of the House in certain testimony taken before the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections. The resolution as at first presented provided that "said testimony taken before said Senate Committee be referred" to the committee proposed for the investigation; but the debate developed the fact that the testimony had not been transmitted to the House, and the resolution was modified. The Member affected stated that he had asked the opportunity to appear before the committee of the Senate and rebut the charges, but they had denied him this privilege on the ground that he was not under investigation in that committee.

The preamble and resolution as agreed to provided—

Whereas it is alleged, in testimony recently taken before the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate, that Mr. J. Hale Sypher, a Member of this House from the State of Louisiana, in 1870, at and before the general election in that year in said State for Representatives in Congress, and when said Sypher was a candidate for election as a Member of the present House, did unlawfully and corruptly procure to be made false and fraudulent registrations, and did with like intent procure to be cast and counted for himself and others false and fraudulent votes, and did procure gross frauds to be committed in connection with the conduct of said election, in his own interests and in the interests of others; and whereas the honor of this House and duty toward the country require that said charges be fully investigated: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Elections be directed at once to investigate said several charges, and to that end have authority to send for persons and papers, and that said testimony taken before said Senate committee, as printed, be referred to said Committee on Elections, and that said committee be directed to report its conclusions to the House as soon as practicable.

On March 3,[1] Mr. George W. McCrary, of Iowa, submitted a report stating that in the limited time allowed it had been found impossible to make an investigation, and proposing a resolution discharging the Committee of Elections from the further consideration of the subject, and laying the resolution on the table.

This resolution was agreed to without division, after debate by Mr. Sypher.

1854. Testimony taken before a joint select committee tending to impeach the official characters of a Senator and a Representative, the committee ordered the testimony to be reported to each House.—On January 9, 1872,[2] a report was submitted in the House from the joint select committee to inquire into the condition of the late insurrectionary States in regard to certain testimony tending to impeach the official character of a Senator and Members of the House. This report was signed by the chairman on the part of the Senate and the chairman on the part of the House.

On the same day, January 9, 1872,[3] in the Senate, Mr. John Scott, of Pennsylvania, from the Joint Select Committee to Investigate Alleged Outrages in Southern States, submitted the following report (No. 15):

At a meeting of "the Joint Select Committee to Inquire into the Condition of the late Insurrectionary States, so far as regards the execution of the laws and the safety of the lives and property of the citizens of the United States," convened at their room in the Capitol on the 22d of September, 1871, Messrs. Scott, Pool, and Blair were appointed a subcommittee to examine the witnesses then in attendance; which subcommittee organized on the 23d of September, 1871, and examined Edward Wheeler, of Arkansas. On the 25th of September, 1871, said subcommittee examined William G. Whipple, of Arkansas.

The testimony of these witnesses tends to impeach the official character and conduct of a Member of the United States Senate from the State of Arkansas, and also to affect the right of a Member of the House of Representatives from that State to retain his seat in the House. Other evidence of the same character was offered, and one of the gentlemen affected by this testimony claimed the right to bring witnesses before the committee to contradict or explain the same. The committee, however, upon consideration decided that the subject-matter to which said testimony related did not come within the limits of the investigation they were directed to make, and therefore declined to prosecute the inquiry any further, discharging a witness who had been subpœnaed and was then awaiting an examination.

The joint select committee, pursuing what they deemed to be the proper parliamentary course, at a meeting on December 21, 1871, adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the committee report the testimony taken before the committee affecting Senator Clayton and Mr. Edwards, a Representative from Arkansas, to the Senate and House of Representatives, with a recommendation that each House take such action as it may deem proper."

Agreeably to this resolution of said joint select committee, the undersigned, the chairman on the part of the Senate and the chairman on the part of the House of Representatives, beg leave to submit the testimony hereto annexed of Edward Wheeler and William G. Whipple, both of the State of Arkansas, said Wheeler and Whipple having been the only witnesses from that State who were examined by the committee, to the Senate and House of Representatives, respectively, for such action as each House may deem advisable.

JOHN SCOTT,
Chairman on the part of the Senate.
LUKE P. POLAND,
Chairman on the part of the House of Representatives.

The Senate proceeded, by unaminous consent, to consider the report, and Mr. Clayton, having addressed the Senate on the subject thereof, concluded his remarks with the request that a select committee be appointed to investigate the allegations against him therein referred to;

Whereupon Mr. Wright submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the report of the committee and the testimony accompanying be referred to a special committee of three, with power to send for persons and papers, to investigate and report upon the charges therein contained against Hon. Powell Clayton, a Member of this body.

June 10, 1872, the committee reported that the investigation was completed, but that the committee were unable at that time to arrange the testimony and report back such parts of it as were relevant; that they held it but the plainest justice to Mr. Clayton that they should make known the general result of their investigation; that they consequently submitted a partial report, reserving the right to submit a final report with the testimony, and recommending that the Senate delay action on the subject until such time; that the charges were not sustained, and that the testimony failed to impeach the Senator's official conduct or character. There was a minority report, which did not enter into the merits of the case, but held that the action of the committee in reporting at that time was premature. February 26, 1873, the committee submitted the evidence, and made a final report, recommending the adoption of a resolution that the charges referred to the committee were not sustained, and that they be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

There was a minority report holding that the charge made of procuring his seat by the corrupt use of money was sustained by the evidence, and that he also obtained 5 votes, which made his majority, by giving to electors lucrative offices when he was governor, as a consideration for their votes. March 25, 1873, the resolution was agreed to.

1855. The Senate having requested from the House the testimony taken by a certain investigating committee, the House ordered it communicated in secrecy, with the injunction that it be returned.—On February 14, 1872,[1] a message from the Senate in executive session transmitted to the House the following:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives be requested to furnish to the Senate, in executive session, the testimony taken by the committee who investigated the question of attempted bribery in the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson.

The message having been communicated, Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, offered the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be directed to furnish the Senate, in confidence, the testimony taken by the committee who investigated the question of attempted bribery in the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, as requested by its resolution of the 13th of February, 1872, and that the same be communicated to the Senate in secrecy in executive session; and that when no longer required by the Senate it be returned to the House for its safe custody.

As to the use of the words "request" and "direct" in resolutions of inquiry addressed to the Executive.

Form and history of section 5 of Rule XXII.

Section 5 of Rule XXII provides:

All resolutions of inquiry addressed to the heads of Executive Departments shall be reported to the House within one week after presentation.

From its earliest days the House has exercised the right to call on the President and heads of Departments for information.[3] On December 12, 1820,[4] a rule was proposed that—a proposition requesting information from the President of the United States, or directing[5] it to be furnished by the head of either of the Executive Departments or by the Postmaster-General, shall lie on the table one day.

[4] Second session Sixteenth Congress, Journal, pp. 67, 70.

[5] The use of the words "request" and "direct" in this form of the rule simply embodied the prior practice of the House. For Cabinet officers the House used the words "be directed to" or "be required to." See instances in 1815. (First session Fourteenth Congress, Journal, pp. 92, 201, 206, 262.) But in resolutions of inquiry to the President the words "be requested" were usually employed, and sometimes the words "if, in his opinion, it will not be inconsistent with the public welfare" were added. (See Journal of first session Fourteenth Congress, pp. 122, 227, 310, etc., also Mr. Daniel Webster's resolutions, first session Thirteenth Congress, Annals, pp. 150, 170, 302–311.)

The object of this was to cause greater care and deliberation in making demands. This proposition was adopted, and on January 22, 1822,[1] the rule was amended to give them consideration after reports of committees, and providing that the Clerk should cause the same to be delivered. Before this time the House had appointed a committee to present resolutions of inquiry to the President.[2]

The rule of 1820 [3] with reference to resolutions of inquiry existed until May 1, 1879, when Mr. Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Rules, presented a resolution providing that in the call for resolutions every Monday[4] resolutions of inquiry might be introduced and referred, and that the committee should be privileged to report them at any time. Mr. John H. Baker, of Indiana, proposed an amendment providing that the committee should report on the resolution within one week. With this amendment, the resolution was agreed to. Mr. Randall stated that the new rule was intended to give greater facility to Members who had, under the old arrangement, been forced to seek unanimous consent to get resolutions adopted. The reference to a committee would prevent abuse of the privilege. Mr. Alexander H. Stephens, of Georgia, recalled that when he entered Congress, in 1843, such resolutions were introduced in large numbers and sometimes, without information, the House imposed great labors on the Executive Departments. The reference to committee would obviate that. When the rules were revised in 1880,[5] this rule, which was Rule No. 130 in the old system, became section 1 of Rule XXIV. Section 1 then referred to the call of the States and Territories each Monday for the introduction of bills and resolutions, and when that call was abolished, in 1890,[6] the portion relating to resolutions of inquiry became a new section of Rule XXII, which is the present form.

1857. A resolution of inquiry is not privileged for consideration until it has been referred to a committee, and then only under conditions prescribed by the rules.—On January 3, 1900,[7] Mr. William Sulzer, of New York, offered as a privileged matter a resolution of inquiry relative to certain alleged transactions of the Secretary of the Treasury with certain national banks.

The Speaker[1] said:

This is in no sense a resolution of privilege, but must go to the Speaker, to be referred to the appropriate committee, under Rule XXII.

The Chair calls attention to paragraph 3 of Rule XXII. After referring in paragraph 1 to private resolutions, it says:

"3. All other bills, memorials, and resolutions may in like manner be delivered, indorsed with the names of Members introducing them, to the Speaker, to be by him referred."

The titles, etc., to be indorsed thereon.

Paragraph 5 of Rule XXII provides that "All resolutions of inquiry addressed to the heads of Executive Departments shall be reported to the House within one week after presentation."

The rules are not only distinct and explicit in saying what shall be done with these resolutions of inquiry, but the practice as long and well settled must certainly be known to the gentleman from New York. The rules are so explicit also that no harm can come, as the committee is bound under the rules to report within one week. The Chair therefore rules the matter to be not privileged, and not in order for immediate consideration.

1858. The week's time required to make a resolution of inquiry privileged is seven days, exclusive of either the first or last day.—On July 1, 1902,[2] Mr. William Sulzer, of New York, claiming the floor for a privileged motion moved to discharge the Committee on Military Affairs from the consideration of a resolution which he described as a resolution of inquiry relating to the army transport service.

Mr. John A. T. Hull, of Iowa, made the point of order that the motion was not yet privileged.

The Speaker[1] said:

This resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs June 25. Only six days have elapsed; so it is not yet privileged. * * * In order to make it seven days we would have to count the first and the last days. * * * The rule says one week, if the Chair remembers right. * * * Within one week after the introduction. This is clearly not privileged as yet.

1859. On March 3, 1905,[3] Mr. Willard D. Vandiver, of Missouri, as a privileged question, moved to discharge the Committee on the Judiciary from the further consideration of a resolution of inquiry relating to the so-called armor-plate trust.

Mr. John J. Jenkins, of Wisconsin, having raised a question that the motion was not privileged, the Speaker[4] said:

This resolution seems to have been introduced February 24, and this is the 3d day of March. The week's time required to make a resolution of inquiry privileged is * * * seven days, exclusive of either the first or the last day, but not exclusive of both.

1860. A resolution authorizing a committee to request information has been treated as a resolution of inquiry.—On December 8, 1903,[5] Mr. Jesse Overstreet, of Indiana, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads is hereby authorized to request the Postmaster-General to send to the committee all papers connected with the recent investigation of his Department.

[5] Second session Fifty-eighth Congress, Record, pp. 51-54.

Mr. Irving P. Wanger, of Pennsylvania, proposing to object, the Speaker [1] said:

The Chair will state that on examining the resolution it seems to be a report from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads of a resolution of inquiry, and, in the opinion of the Chair, does not require unanimous consent. The question therefore is on agreeing to the resolution.

Later, the previous question having in the meantime been ordered, Mr. James D. Richardson, of Tennessee, made the point of order that the resolution was not privileged.

After debate, the Speaker said:

The Chair does not desire to hear further discussion. If the point of order were well taken, it comes too late; and the previous question having been ordered, it is not necessary for the Chair to rule. But the Chair is of opinion at this time that if the point of order had been made in apt time the Chair would have overruled the point of order. The resolution comes in an unusual form, it is true, but the object of the resolution is to obtain information—"the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life;" and therefore, in the opinion of the Chair, the resolution is in order.

1861. Only resolutions of inquiry addressed to the heads of Executive Departments are privileged.—On January 27, 1891,[2] Mr. Benjamin A. Enloe, of Tennessee, on the ground of its being a question of privilege, submitted a resolution requesting certain information from the Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

The resolution having been read, the Speaker [3] ruled that it did not present a privileged question, for the reason that under clause 5 of Rule XXII only "resolutions of inquiry addressed to the heads of Executive Departments" were required to be reported to the House within one week after presentation, thus presenting under the practice a privileged question when it was alleged that the rule had not been complied with.

1862. On March 12, 1904,[4] Mr. Frederick H. Gillett, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, submitted as privileged a report on the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the Civil Service Commission be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the House of Representatives, as follows:

In how many cases the civil-service law and the regulations made thereunder have been suspended, and by whom, since the 4th day of March, 1885, giving, with said information, the dates of all such suspensions, and where such suspensions have operated to put in office individuals who otherwise could not have been appointed, the names of such individuals, and the date of the suspension of said civil-service law and the regulations made thereunder, in each individual case.

The Speaker [1] said:

As the Chair understands, this is not a privileged matter under the rules, as it is not a resolution calling upon the head of a Department, but upon the Civil Service Commission. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts ask its consideration now?

Thereupon, by unanimous consent, the resolution was agreed to.

1863. On February 4, 1904,[1] Mr. Edgar D. Crumpacker, of Indiana, from the Committee on the Census, reported as privileged the following resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That the Director of the Census be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the House what persons have been selected and employed by him and the dates and periods of time for which such persons have been employed in the Census Office under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1903, which provided as follows, etc.: * * *

And how long such employees have continued under such appointment, and, if such appointments were discontinued, for what reasons they were so discontinued.

The resolution having been read, the Speaker[2] said:

The Chair desires to say that the Chair is of opinion that this is not a matter of privilege. It is not in the language of the rule addressed to the head of an Executive Department. The Chair merely wants to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the resolution was, by unanimous consent, considered.

1864. The privilege of resolutions of inquiry applies to those addressed to the President of the United States.—On January 29, 1906,[3] Mr. Oscar W. Gillespie, of Texas, claiming the floor for a privileged question, moved to discharge the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce from consideration of the following resolution of inquiry, which had been referred to that committee more than one week previously:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to report to the House of Representatives, for its information, all the facts within the knowledge of the Interstate Commerce Commission which shows or tends to show that there exists at this time, or heretofore within the last twelve months has existed, a combination or arrangement between the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, the Pennsylvania Company, the Norfolk and Western Railway Company, the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, the Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington Railroad Company, the Northern Central Railway Company, and the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company, or any two or more of said railroad companies, in violation of the act passed July 2, 1890, and entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," or acts amendatory thereof.

The motion was agreed to, and then the resolution, being before the House, was agreed to after it had been amended on motion of Mr. Sereno E. Payne, of New York, by the insertion of the words—

if not incompatible with the public interests

Mr. John Dalzell, of Pennsylvania, having moved to reconsider, a question arose as to the form of the resolution, Mr. Dalzell saying:

Mr. Speaker, the President is not the head of a Department within the meaning of that rule. But, in the second place, if that information ought to be had by reason of an inquiry addressed to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and it is sought to evade the rule because that is not an Executive Department, then this resolution can not be made privileged by addressing it to the President of the United States.

The Speaker[2] said:

The Chair does not know that he ought to rule on a subject not before the House, but if before the House the Chair would be prepared to rule; and perhaps by unanimous consent the Chair may be indulged in an informal expression of opinion, which he might not possibly be bound by, as to whether the President is the head of the Executive Departments. Now, it seems to the Chair, under a fair construction of this rule, that the President is the head not only of one but all the Executive Departments. The Chair only intimates what he would hold as at present advised if the question were before the House.

The motion to reconsider was laid on the table, yeas 122, nays 93.[1]

1865. A committee not having reported a resolution of inquiry within the time fixed by the rule, the House may reach the resolution only by a motion to discharge the committee from its consideration.—On June 29, 1886,[2] Mr. John M. Glover, of Missouri, as a privileged question, moved that the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department be discharged from the consideration of a resolution of inquiry relating to alleged frauds in the revenue, and that the resolution be put on its passage.

The Speaker[3] said:

The gentleman may move to discharge the committee from the further consideration of the resolution, but that is the extent of his motion. * * * When the committee is discharged then the resolution is before the House, but the question of consideration can be raised against it by one Member.

Mr. Glover having made the proper motion was proceeding to debate, when he was called to order by Mr. Nathaniel J. Hammond, of Georgia.

The Speaker said:

There is nothing before the House except the simple motion to discharge the committee. The merits of the resolution pending before the committee are not before the House for discussion.

The motion to discharge the committee was disagreed to.

Mr. Glover then moved that the committee be directed to report the resolution within a given time.

The Speaker said:

That is not a privileged motion. The privileged motion is to discharge the committee.

Mr. John A. Anderson, of Kansas, made the point of order that, the resolution not having been reported within the time prescribed by the rule, the committee having custody of the same was thereby discharged from the consideration of it.

The Speaker overruled the point of order, and held that the committee could only be discharged by motion, which the House had just refused to do.

1866. A resolution of inquiry not being reported back within one week, a motion to discharge the committee from the consideration of it presents a privileged question.—On April 25, 1882,[4] Mr. William E. Robinson, of New York, moved, as a matter of privilege, to discharge the Committee on Foreign Affairs from the consideration of a resolution relating to alleged imprisonment of American citizens abroad, which had been referred to the committee more than a week previous.

Mr. John A. Kasson, of Iowa, made the point of order that the motion did not present a question of privilege.

[3] John G. Carlisle, of Kentucky, Speaker.

[4] First session Forty-seventh Congress, Journal, p. 1124; Record, p. 3275.

The Speaker[1] ruled:

The resolution, from the further consideration of which it is sought to discharge the Committee on Foreign Affairs, is a resolution of inquiry, and originally introduced as such and referred to that committee. Upon being reported back to the House it was recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Affairs with certain instructions. The Chair holds, in the first place, that the resolution, upon being recommitted to the committee, holds the same relation to the committee and the same right under the rules of the House to be considered by the committee and reported back in the same time as if it had been an original resolution of inquiry referred to them at the time of its recommitment. Under the last clause of paragraph 1 of Rule XXIV[2] the committees of the House are required to report resolutions of inquiry directed to heads of Executive Departments back within one week from the time of their reference. This being so, the question now before us is, Is it a question of privilege to ask to discharge the Committee on Foreign Affairs from the further consideration of the resolution of inquiry as recommitted?

The Chair holds that this is a matter affecting the order of the business of the House. There may be perfectly good, wise, and valid reasons why the committee have not reported back the resolution, but the Chair is inclined to hold that the House may control the matter, and after the time has expired for reporting the resolution back the House has a right, as a matter of privilege, to call upon the committee to report it back or to discharge the committee from its further consideration. The Chair therefore holds that the resolution presented by the gentleman from New York, in so far as it seeks to discharge the Committee on Foreign Affairs from further consideration of the resolution of inquiry, is a matter of privilege, and therefore overrules the point of order.

1867. On April 28, 1886,[3] Mr. W. P. Taulbee, of Kentucky, claiming the floor for a privileged motion, moved that the Committee on Reform of the Civil Service be discharged from the further consideration of a resolution of inquiry as to certain alleged practices in the Treasury Department, which had been referred to the committee more than a week previous.

The Speaker[4] held the motion to be out of order, but stated that a motion to instruct the committee to report the resolution within a given time would be in order.

1868. On February 10, 1891,[5] Mr. Benjamin A. Enloe, of Tennessee, called attention of the House that a resolution of inquiry concerning the execution of the law relating to the National Geological Park, which had been referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, had not been reported within the time required by the rules, and offered as privileged a motion to discharge the committee from the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. Joseph G. Cannon, of Illinois, having made the point of order that no question of privilege was involved, the Speaker[6] ruled that this was a privileged question, but not a question of privilege. The gentleman from Tennessee was entitled to have the question decided whether or not the committee should be discharged. That, however, was a question of procedure, to be decided without debate. The question of the priority of business was not debatable.[7]

1869. On March 18, 1892,[1] Mr. Allen R. Bushnell, of Wisconsin, as a privileged question, moved to discharge the Committee on Rivers and Harbors from the consideration of a resolution of inquiry requesting of the Secretary of War and Attorney-General information relating to alleged injuries to the navigation of the upper Mississippi River. This resolution had not been reported within the time prescribed by the rule.

Mr. John Lind, of Minnesota, made the point of order that the motion was not privileged because the resolution was erroneously referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and that that committee had no jurisdiction of the subject.

The Speaker[2] overruled the point of order, holding that the resolution might have been properly referred to either the Committee on Rivers and Harbors or the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

1870. On July 15, 1892,[3] Mr. Benjamin A. Enloe, of Tennessee, moved, as a privileged motion, to discharge the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads from the consideration of a resolution of inquiry requesting the Postmaster-General to transmit certain information to the House, the resolution having been referred to the committee more than a week previous.

Mr. Christopher A. Bergen, of New Jersey, and Mr. Albert J. Hopkins, of Illinois, submitted the point of order that the motion was not privileged.

The Speaker[2] overruled the point of order on the ground that, it being the duty of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to report the resolution within one week after its reference, on its failure to so report it a motion to discharge the committee was privileged. The Speaker also held that the duty to report within one week carried with it the right to report at any time during that period, and, if delayed, the right to report at any time thereafter, and consequently the right of consideration when reported.

1871. At the expiration of a week a motion to discharge a committee from the consideration of a resolution of inquiry is privileged, although the resolution may have been delayed in reaching the committee.—On September 22, 1893,[4] Mr. Eugene F. Loud, of California, as a privileged motion, moved that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the consideration of a resolution of inquiry requesting information from the Attorney-General as to the enforcement of the "Chinese-exclusion act."

Mr. Loud alleged, as a ground for his motion, that the resolution had been presented and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary one week ago.

Mr. William C. Oates, of Alabama, submitted the point that the resolution had not been before the committee, and that the motion of Mr. Loud was, therefore, not in order.

It appeared that the resolution was introduced and referred to the committee one week before, but was not delivered to the committee until four days thereafter.

[4] First session Fifty-third Congress, Journal, pp. 106, 107.

The Speaker[1] overruled the point made by Mr. Oates and held that, pursuant to clause 4 of Rule XXII, resolutions of inquiry are required to be reported within one week[2] from their presentation to the House, regardless of the time when they may be actually delivered to the committee, and that the motion of Mr. Loud was, therefore, privileged.

1872. A resolution of inquiry, to enjoy its privilege, should call for facts rather than opinions and should not require an investigation.—On December 19, 1905,[3] Mr. Webster E. Brown, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Mines and Mining, reported back from that committee this resolution, with a favorable recommendation:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish to Congress a report on the progress of the investigation of the black sands of the Pacific slope, authority for which was included in that section of the sundry civil act approved March 3, 1905, which provided for the preparation of the report on the mineral resources of the United States, and for his opinion as to whether or not this investigation should be continued.

A question arose as to whether or not this resolution was privileged as a resolution of inquiry, whereupon the Speaker[4] held:

The Chair thinks the first part of the resolution privileged. The latter part is not privileged, and that destroys the privilege of the whole resolution.

1873. On January 18, 1906,[5] Mr. Oscar W. Gillespie, of Texas, claimed the floor for a privileged motion in order to move to discharge the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce from the further consideration of the following resolution, which had been referred to that committee more than a week previously:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to forthwith report to the House of Representatives, for its information, whether there exists at this time, or heretofore within the last twelve months there has existed, a combination or arrangement between the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, the Pennsylvania Company, the Norfolk and Western Railway Company, the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, the Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington Railroad Company, and the Northern Central Railway Company, and the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company, or any two or more of said railroad companies, in violation of the act passed July 2, 1890, and entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," or acts amendatory thereof; and the said Attorney-General is also requested to report to this House all the facts upon which he bases his conclusion.

Mr. Sereno E. Payne, of New York, made the point of order that the resolution was not privileged, as it asked for an opinion of the Attorney-General as well as for facts.

After debate, the Speaker[4] said:

The House undoubtedly has power to call for facts. And under the rule, where a resolution privileged within the meaning of the rule is referred to a committee and is not reported within a certain time, it is in order to move to discharge the committee and bring the resolution before the House for consideration. But that rule applies to a resolution calling for facts and information. Now, the query the Chair puts to the gentleman is, Does not the concluding lines in these words, "and the facts upon which he bases his conclusion," show that what is practically asked for is the conclusion or opinion of the Attorney-General or the head of the Department of Justice, and does not that destroy, under the rule, the privileged character of the resolution? * * * In reading the resolution without the last line the Chair might perhaps have a doubt as to whether it were a resolution of inquiry asking for facts or one asking for an opinion. Now, the Chair is perfectly clear that, under the precedents, if the resolution is to be made privileged, it must be a resolution of inquiry as to facts existing—something in esse. It seems to the Chair that a resolution asking an opinion from the head of a Department would not be privileged. While it is in the power, the Chair apprehends, for the House by resolution to ask an opinion of the head of a Department, it occurs to the Chair that such a resolution would not be privileged and would not come within the rule that is now invoked. But whatever the ruling of the Chair might be, were it not for the concluding line or lines of the resolution it is perfectly patent to the Chair that what is desired by the resolution is not the facts alone, if at all, but the conclusion or opinion of the Attorney-General Therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

1874. On February 13, 1906,[1] Mr. Oscar W. Gillespie, of Texas, moved to discharge the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads from the consideration of the following resolution of inquiry, which had been referred to that committee more than one week previously:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish the House, at his earliest convenience, a comparative statement showing the cost to the Government for the transportation of the mails per ton per mile by the railroads and the cost of transporting express matter per ton per mile by the railroads.

Mr. Sereno E. Payne, of New York, made the point of order that the resolution called for an investigation by the Post-Office Department.

In the course of the debate and at its conclusion the Speaker[2] said:

The Chair notices that this resolution provides that the Postmaster-General be requested to furnish the House, at his earliest convenience, a comparative statement showing the cost to the Government for the transportation of mails per ton per mile by the railroads and the cost of transporting express matter per ton per mile by the railroads. The doubt in the mind of the Chair is that this calls for information touching a matter that is not at all under the Postmaster-General, so far as express matter is concerned; and therefore it would seem that if the resolution were to be adopted that it would set on foot an investigation in the Post-Office Department.

It seems to the Chair—and the Chair suggests to the gentleman that the language goes further—that he furnish the House at his earliest convenience a comparative statement showing the cost for transporting mails and the cost of transporting express matter. Now, it might be assumed that if he does not have the information he will so report; but it will also be assumed that he will be required to enter into an inquiry.

It seems to the Chair that the resolution, requesting the Postmaster-General to report the cost to the Government of transporting the mails per ton per mile by the railroads, if it stopped there, would be a privileged resolution under the rule; but when it adds "and the cost of transporting express matter per ton per mile by the railroads" it does not cover a question of privilege under the rule, and it is only the question of privilege that is to be considered. The gentleman arises in his place and makes his motion to discharge the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads from further consideration of this resolution because, a week having elapsed since it was referred to that committee, it has not reported the same back. In other words, the rule enables the gentleman, if he has the proper case under the rule, to halt the consideration of all other resolutions that are not privileged and the ordinary business of the House, and to halt the House in the consideration of business upon the Calendars from the various committees, and dispose of this resolution by virtue of this rule. Now, if the motion does not prevail and it is not a question of privilege, the resolution remains with the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads for disposition under the rules of the House, the same as other business.

Now, the uniform ruling of the Chair in former Congresses and in this Congress has been by construction not to enlarge the matter of privilege in these cases. It does seem, following the precedents for the orderly transaction of business in the House, that the construction holding the resolution privileged should be strict, and in the opinion of the Chair the latter clause of the resolution is not privileged and vitiates the resolution as a question of privilege. Therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.[1]

1875. A resolution of inquiry is usually simple rather than concurrent in form.—On March 28, 1902,[2] Mr. Charles F. Cochran, of Missouri, moved to discharge the Committee on Rivers and Harbors from the consideration of the following resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Secretary of War is hereby instructed to send to the House of Representatives information as to the condition of river improvements heretofore constructed on the Missouri River at a point south of St. Joseph, Mo., whether said improvements are incomplete and, on account of their incomplete condition, in danger of destruction, and the sum necessary to complete said improvements and prevent their destruction by the encroachments of the current.

The committee having been discharged, the resolution was so amended as to convert it into a simple resolution, and as amended the resolution was agreed to.

1876. Joint resolutions are not required for calling for information from the Executive Departments.—On February 3, 1899,[3] Mr. Jacob H. Bromwell, of Ohio, presented and the House agreed to a resolution requesting the President to return to the House the joint resolution (H. Res. 298) calling for information from the Secretary of State concerning certain outrages perpetrated upon American citizens in China. Mr. Bromwell explained that the President had called attention to the fact that the resolution was joint in form and if signed by the President might be considered a precedent that the House alone had not the right to call for such information.

On February 4 the joint resolution was returned by the President and was by the House laid on the table.

Mr. Bromwell then offered a simple resolution of the House calling for the information, and the same was agreed to.

[1] On April 15, 1898 (second session Fifty-fifth Congress, Record, pp. 3908, 3909), Mr. William H. Fleming, of Georgia, as a privileged motion, presented a resolution discharging the Committee on Naval Affairs from the consideration of the following resolution, which had been presented more than a week before:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to inform the House of Representatives if the Senate printed Document No. 207, Fifty-fifth Congress, second session, contains all the evidence embraced in the report of the naval court of inquiry upon the destruction of the U. S. battle ship Maine in Havana Harbor, February 15, 1898, now of file in the Navy Department; and if any portion of said evidence has been omitted in said printed document the Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to transmit to the House of Representatives a copy of such omitted evidence."

Mr. Walter Evans, of Kentucky, made the point of order that the resolution to discharge the committee did not present a question of privilege. It was urged that the direction to the Secretary of the Navy contained in the latter part of the resolution was not privileged, and that this destroyed the privileged character of the resolution.

The Speaker (Thomas B. Reed, of Maine) sustained the point of order.

1877. The privilege of a resolution of inquiry may be destroyed by a preamble, although the matter therein recited may be germane to the subject of inquiry.—On March 3, 1907 [legislative day of March 2],[1] Mr. Choice B. Randell, of Texas, proposed to call up as a privileged resolution of inquiry a resolution as follows:

Whereas it is currently reported that negotiations have been entered into by the executive department of the United States, and under its direction, with the Government of the German Empire affecting the commerce between Germany and the United States and the tariffs and regulations on and concerning the same, thereby changing the conditions of trade between these countries and affecting the revenues of this Government received from import duties without the action of Congress: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the President of the United States is hereby requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to direct the Secretary of State to report to him for the information of the House, etc.

Mr. James E. Watson, of Indiana, made the point of order that the preamble destroyed the privilege.

The Speaker[2] held:

It has been frequently held that a preamble to a resolution of inquiry that makes an alleged statement of fact destroys the privilege, although the balance of the resolution might be privileged. That has been frequently held by many Speakers and was ruled by the present Speaker at the last session of Congress on a resolution presented by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Cockran]. Clearly this is not privileged, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

1878. On June 28, 1906,[3] Mr. W. Bourke Cockran, of New York, as a privileged motion, proposed to discharge the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads from consideration of the following resolution:

Whereas at a court of general sessions of the peace in and for the county of New York, the same being a court of record of the State of New York, one Norman Hapgood was on the 31st day of October, 1905, indicted by a grand jury on a charge of libel, for that he had written and published of and concerning one Joseph M. Deuel, then and now a judge of the court of special sessions in the said city and county of New York, the following words, to wit: "He is part owner and one of the editors of a paper of which the occupation is printing scandal about people who are not cowardly enough to pay for silence;" and

Whereas the said Norman Hapgood on the 31st day of October, 1905, was arraigned upon the said indictment before the said court and entered a plea of not guilty thereto; and

Whereas the said indictment, having been duly transferred from the said court of general sessions of the peace in and for the city and county of New York to the supreme court of the State of New York, came on for trial on the 15th day of January, 1906, in said court, before the Hon. James Fitzgerald, a justice thereof, and a jury; and the said Norman Hapgood having admitted that he had written and published the matter charged in said indictment to be libelous, justified it on the ground that the same was true, and the jury after hearing evidence rendered its verdict that he was not guilty of libel; and

Whereas it appeared from the uncontradicted evidence given on said trial that the paper of which the said Joseph M. Deuel was part owner and one of the editors, the characterization of which as "a paper of which the occupation is printing scandal about people who are not cowardly enough to pay for silence" by the said Hapgood was charged in said evidence to be a libel, is a weekly publication entitled, called, and known as "Town Topics;" and

Whereas the said verdict of not guilty and the judgment of aquittal entered thereon in favor of said Hapgood is a judicial declaration by a court of competent jurisdiction that the description of Town Topics charged in said indictment to be libelous is in fact true: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, requested to inform the House of Representatives whether said paper, periodical, or publication entitled, called, and known as "Town Topics," so adjudged by a competent court to be "a paper of which the occupation is printing scandal about people who are not cowardly enough to pay for silence," is admitted now to the use of the mails, and whether its said occupation of extorting money by blackmail is in any way facilitated, promoted, or assisted by this Government through the operation of its Post-Office Department.

Mr. Jesse Overstreet, of Indiana, made the point of order that the motion was not privileged.

After debate the Speaker[1] ruled:

The only question presented to the Chair under the point of order is whether this motion is a privileged motion under the rules of the House. The motion is to discharge the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads from the consideration of the resolution which has been read. After seven days the motion is privileged, providing the resolution has nothing in it which destroys that privilege.

Now, this resolution is coupled with the preamble, which recites that there was an indictment in a State court for libel, recites that the defendant justified, recites that there was a trial, recites that the defendant was acquitted, and then in the recitation in the last whereas sets forth matter which does not reflect upon the party whom the State of New York alleged had been libeled in very complimentary terms; in fact, to the contrary. The resolution refers to the preamble and certain matters alleged in the preamble, none of which are matters that are privileged under the rules of the House.

A resolution calling for information from the Department upon a question of fact is privileged, and if this resolution alone covered such information it would be privileged. The Chair has no doubt that the preamble destroys the privilege that otherwise would be contained in the resolution, and therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. Cockran then asked:

Would it be in order, Mr. Speaker, to move to strike out the preamble and allow the resolution to stand?

The Speaker replied:

That would bring the House to a vote on that very question, and this is a matter not before the House. It was introduced and went to the committee. This is a motion to bring it before the House, and the privilege being destroyed by nonprivileged matter, the Chair sustains the point of order, which of course, if the ruling of the Chair is correct, prevents the House obtaining possession of the resolution in this way.

1879. Resolutions of inquiry are delivered under direction of the Clerk.—On January 22, 1822,[2] a rule was adopted that resolutions of inquiry, passed by the House, should be delivered under direction of the Clerk. Heretofore such resolutions addressed to the President had been delivered by a committee especially appointed in each case. Resolutions directed to heads of Departments were probably sent by the Clerk, no mention of method being made.

1880. The House decided early in its history that the secretaries of the President's Cabinet should not be called to give information personally on the floor of the House.—On November 13, 1792,[3] the following resolution was proposed:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of War be notified that this House intend, on Wednesday next, to take into consideration the report of the committee appointed to inquire into the causes of the failure of the late expedition under General St. Clair, to the end that they may attend the House, and furnish such information as may be conducive to the due investigation of the matters stated in the said report.

Mr. Hugh Williamson, of North Carolina, moved to strike out the portion respecting the attendance of the Secretaries. This motion was supported by Mr. James Madison, of Virginia, who thought the introduction of the Secretaries on the floor of the House contrary to the practice of the House and the spirit of the Government.[1] He favored written information.

Messrs. Fisher Ames and Elbridge Gerry, of Massachusetts, favored the proposition of the resolution.

The House agreed to the amendment, and then negatived the resolution as amended.

1881. Members of the President's Cabinet appear before committees of the House and give testimony.—Cabinet officers frequently appear before committees of the House. Thus, on February 3, 1837,[2] Hon. Levi Woodbury, Secretary of the Treasury, appeared in obedience to a summons, before the committee appointed to investigate the Executive Departments, and gave his testimony. Also, on February 13, Hon. John Forsyth, Secretary of State, appeared and testified before the same committee.

1882. On February 13, 1839,[3] Levi Woodbury, Secretary of the Treasury, appeared before the select committee appointed to investigate the defalcations in the New York custom-house, and was sworn as a witness, and testified.

1883. On January 16, 1861,[4] the chairman of the select committee on seizure of forts, arsenals, etc., by direction of the committee, addressed the Secretary of the Navy requesting him to attend the committee and give testimony. The chairman concluded as follows: "Please state whether a formal subpœna will be required."

The Secretary attended without the subpœna.

1884. In 1842 the House vigorously asserted and President Tyler as vigorously denied the right of the House to all papers and information in possession of the Executive relating to subjects over which the jurisdiction of the House extended.—On June 3, 1842,[5] the Speaker laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War in answer to a call of the House, of the 18th of May, for information as to the affairs of the Cherokee Indians and as to frauds upon them, stating that, as negotiations were pending with the Indians for the settlement of their claims and all other matters of difference between them and the Government, it was believed to be inconsistent with the public interest to disclose the information called for by the House; and that, as regarded the frauds referred to, the evidence being ex parte, and not under oath, it would be unjust to the parties implicated, and would defeat the ends of justice to promulgate the papers called for.[1]

On the succeeding day this communication was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

On July 24,[2] Mr. James Cooper, of Pennsylvania, from this committee,[3] made a report.

The report of the committee recommended the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives has the right to demand from the Executive such information as may be in his possession relating to subjects of the deliberations of the House and within the sphere of its legitimate powers.

Resolved, That the reports and facts called for by the House of Representatives, by its resolution of the 18th ultimo, related to subjects of its deliberations and were within the sphere of its legitimate powers, and should have been communicated; Therefore,

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be communicated to this House "the several reports lately made to the Department" of War by Lieutenant-Colonel Hitchcock relative to the affairs of the Cherokee Indians, together with all information communicated by him concerning the frauds he was charged to investigate; also all facts in the possession of the Executive, "from any source, relating to the subject."

On August 13, after a debate extending over several days,[4] the first resolution was amended by adding after "Executive" the words "or heads of Departments," and as amended was agreed to, yeas 140, nays 8. The second resolution was agreed to, yeas 94, nays 64, and the third was also agreed to, yeas 83, nays 60.

The committee in their report [5] took the ground that the House of Representatives had a right to all the information in the possession of the Executive, when such information related to subjects over which the jurisdiction of the House extended. This was one of the incidental powers of the House, like the power to punish for contempts. The committee denied that the relations with the Indian tribes were the same as those with foreign nations, and therefore denied the exclusive jurisdiction of the Executive and Senate over treaties or agreements with the Indians. The committee concluded by deeming it conclusive of the question that in the fifty years of the history of the Government there was no single precedent to justify the refusal to communicate the information required.[6]

1885. On December 30, 1842,[1] Mr. James Cooper, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported the following resolution which seems to have been agreed to by the House:

Whereas a resolution calling on the President of the United States "to cause to be communicated to this House the several reports lately made to the Department of War by Lieutenant-Colonel Hitchcock relative to the affairs of the Cherokee Indians, together with all information communicated by him concerning the frauds he was charged to investigate; also all facts in possession of the Executive from any source relating to the subject," was adopted by this House on the 13th day of August last; and whereas the information received by the said resolution has not been communicated, nor any reason assigned for the delay; Therefore,

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House when the information called for by the aforesaid resolution may be expected.

On February 1 President Tyler responded to this resolution. He communicated the papers called for, but at the same time he dissented from any doctrine that might imply the right of the House of Representatives to demand from the Executive or the heads of Departments all papers without regard to the discretion of those officers:

If, by the assertion of this claim [says the President], of right to call on the Executive for all the information in its possession relating to any subject of deliberation of the House and within the sphere of its legitimate powers, it is intended to assert, also, that the Executive is bound to comply with such call, without the authority to exercise any discretion on its part in reference to the nature of the information required, or to the interests of the country or of individuals to be affected by such compliance, then do I feel bound, in the discharge of the high duty imposed upon me, "to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States," to declare, in the most respectful manner, my entire dissent from such a proposition. The instrument from which the several Departments of the Government derive their authority makes each independent of the other in the discharge of their respective functions. The injunction of the Constitution that the President "shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed," necessarily confers an authority, commensurate with the obligation imposed, to inquire into the manner in which all public agents perform the duties assigned to them by law. To be effective, these inquiries must often be confidential. They may result in the collection of truth or of falsehood; or they may be incomplete, and may require further prosecution. To maintain that the President can exercise no discretion after the time in which the matters thus collected shall be promulgated, or in respect to the character of the information obtained, would deprive him at once of the means of performing one of the most salutary duties of his office. An inquiry might be arrested at its first stage, and the officers whose conduct demanded investigation may be enabled to elude or defeat it. To require from the Executive the transfer of this discretion to a coordinate branch of the Government is equivalent to the denial of its possession by him and would render him dependent upon that branch in the performance of a duty purely executive.

Nor can it be a sound position that all papers, documents, and information of every description, which may happen by any means to come into the possession of the President or of the heads of Departments, must necessarily be subject to the call of the House of Representatives, merely because they relate to a subject of the deliberations of the House, although that subject may be within the sphere of its legitimate powers. It can not be that the only test is whether the information relates to a legitimate subject of deliberation. The Executive Departments and the citizens of this country have their rights and duties, as well as the House of Representatives; and the maxim that the rights of one person or body are to be so exercised as not to impair those of others is applicable in its fullest extent to this question. Impertinence or malignity may seek to make the executive department the means of incalculable and irremediable injury to innocent parties by throwing into them libels most foul and atrocious. Shall there be no discretionary authority permitted to refuse to become the instruments of such malevolence?

And although information comes through a proper channel to an executive officer, it may often be of a character to forbid its being made public. The officer charged with a confidential inquiry, and who reports its result under the pledge of confidence which his appointment implies, ought not to be exposed individually to the resentment of those whose conduct may be impugned by the information he collects. The knowledge that such is to be the consequence will inevitably prevent the performance of duties of that character, and thus the Government will be deprived of an important means of investigating the conduct of its agents.

It is certainly no new doctrine in the halls of judicature or of legislation that certain communications and papers are privileged, and that the general authority to compel testimony must give way in certain cases to the paramount rights of individuals or of the Government. Thus, no man can be compelled to accuse himself, to answer any question that tends to render him infamous, or to produce his own private papers on any occasion. The communication of a client to his counsel and the admissions made at the confessional in the course of religious discipline are privileged communications. In the courts of that country from which we derive our great principles of individual liberty and the rules of evidence, it is well settled, and the doctrine has been fully recognized in this country, that a minister of the Crown or the head of a department can not be compelled to produce any papers, or to disclose any transactions relating to the executive functions of the Government which he declares are confidential, or such as the public interest requires should not be divulged; and the persons who have been the channels of communication to officers of the State are in like manner protected from the disclosure of their names. Other instances of privileged communications might be enumerated, if it were deemed necessary. These principles are as applicable to evidence sought by a legislature as to that required by a court.

The practice of the Government since its foundation has sanctioned the principle that there must necessarily be a discretionary authority in reference to the nature of the information called for by either House of Congress.

The authority was claimed and exercised by General Washington in 1796. In 1825 President Monroe declined compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives calling for the correspondence between the Executive Departments of this Government and the officers of the United States Navy and others, at or near the ports of South America on the Pacific Ocean. In a communication made by the Secretary of War in 1832 to the Committee of the House on the Public Lands, by direction of President Jackson, he denies the obligation of the Executive to furnish the information called for and maintains the authority of the President to exercise a sound discretion in complying with calls of that description by the House of Representatives or its committees. Without multiplying other instances, it is not deemed improper to refer to the refusal of the President at the last session of the present Congress to comply with the resolutions of the House of Representatives calling for the names of the Members of Congress who had applied for offices. As no further notice was taken in any form of this refusal it would seem to be a fair inference that the House itself admitted that there were cases in which the President had a discretionary authority in respect to the transmission of information in the possession of any of the Executive Departments.

Apprehensive that silence under the claim supposed to be set up in the resolutions of the House of Representatives under consideration might be construed as an acquiescence in its soundness, I have deemed it due to the great importance of the subject to state my views that a compliance in part with the resolution may not be deemed a surrender of a necessary authority of the Executive.

President Tyler's message was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and on February 25, this committee submitted to the House a report[1] which combats the argument of the President:

It is undoubtedly true [says this report, after a review of the origin and circumstances of the controversy] to a certain extent, that the Constitution, from which the several Departments of the Government derive their power, had made each of them independent of the other in the discharge of their several functions. But what are the functions which are exercised independently of each other by the several Departments of the Government? The President exercises the office or function of Commander in Chief of the Army independently of Congress; his power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States is exercised independently of Congress; he has the power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties independently of the House of Representatives; he has the power to nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint ambassadors, ministers, consuls, and judges of the Supreme Court, independently of the House of Representatives, etc. But what has all this to do with the right of the House to institute inquiries and investigate abuses? It is a function of the House of Representatives to investigate abuses—sometimes for the purpose of legislating to prevent their recurrence—sometimes for the purpose of punishing the offenders; but in either case its power to examine witnesses, to compel the production of papers, to exercise all the powers of a judicial tribunal in the investigation of like offenses subject to certain well-established rules has never been doubted, and is as clearly implied in the Constitution as the right of the President "to inquire into the manner in which all public agents perform the duties assigned to them by law."

The House of Representatives has the sole power of impeachment. The President himself, in the discharge of his most independent functions, is subject to the exercise of this power—a power which implies the right of inquiry on the part of the House to the fullest and most unlimited extent. The committee need not say that the right of inquiry without the right to produce evidence would be nugatory. They will presently look further into this subject, but before proceeding to do so they will remark that the exercise of this right does not in any wise abridge the independent discharge of the Executive functions. In the exercise of the right, claimed by the House in its resolutions, to demand from the Executive such information as may be in his possession relative to subjects of its deliberations and within the sphere of its legitimate power, is not, as the President alleges, "equivalent to the denial" of a right of inquiry by him into the same matter. The exercise of this right by the House is not in design and can not be in effect "to arrest inquiry by the Executive and enable officers whose conduct demands investigation to elude and defeat it."

The report goes on to say that the Executive has limited powers of inquiry, its commissions not having the power to compel the testimony of witnesses, and then continues:

But the power of the House to pursue an investigation of this kind is as ample as that of any other tribunal. All the means to enforce the attendance of witnesses, the power to issue commissions to take the testimony of those who are absent, as well as to procure all the necessary instruments of evidence relative to any subject of inquiry in which it may be engaged, is possessed by the House in as much plentitude as by the judicial tribunals of the country. We shall show hereafter that the House has the right to compel the production of evidence which, for reasons of state policy, may be withheld from the courts.

The committee next take up the paragraph of the message which denies the right of the House to demand documents and papers of every description that may relate to the subject of its deliberations, and continues:

This is principally but a reiteration of the assertion of the President that the resolution adopted by the House of Representatives declaratory of its rights is too broad and would invest it with powers not conferred upon it by the Constitution and which, if carried into practice, would invade the rights of the Executive. The latter part of this proposition has already been fully disproved. It has been shown that the exercise of the right to demand from the Executive and heads of departments such papers or copies of papers, or other information, as may be in their possession is no invasion of the rights of the Executive, impairs none of its just powers, nor suspends any of its functions.

But is the resolution adopted by the House more comprehensive than a fair construction of the Constitution warrants? The resolution asserts that the "House has a right to demand from the Executive and heads of departments such information as may be in their possession relating to subjects of the deliberations of the House and within the sphere of its legitimate powers."

The question involved in this resolution is: Does the House of Representatives possess the right to investigate abuses?—a right virtually denied to the House is the Executive doctrines prevail. For the right to investigate abuses without full power to procure information and evidence would present the anomaly of the existence of a right without the means of enforcing it.

By the Constitution of the United States the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the Government are liable to impeachment for treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors, and the sole power to impeach is vested in the House of Representatives. If the House possess the power to impeach it must likewise possess all the incidents of that power—the power to compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of all such papers as may be considered necessary to prove the charges on which the impeachment is founded. If it did not the power of impeachment conferred on it by the Constitution would be nugatory. It could not exercise it with effect. But is the power of the House to compel the production of papers or the attendance of witnesses limited to proceedings in cases of impeachment? Has the House of Representatives no power to inquire into offenses not impeachable? Does not the power to impeach for great offenses involve the power to inquire into all offenses? It necessarily does so. In its character of grand inquest of the nation it possesses this right and in this character the House acts, whether it be engaged in investigation of some petty fraud committed by some subordinate officer of the Government or the impeachment of the President for high crimes and misdemeanors. This right to demand information belongs to its character—is one of its attributes, not merely an accidental right which it acquires when it takes upon itself the duty of impeachment. It is not a right which it derives from the act of proceeding to investigate a particular kind of offense and which it loses when it is engaged in the investigation of another or smaller offense. It is a permanent right inherent in it and not an incident of some peculiar function.

The power of the House to institute inquiries and investigate abuses has been exercised by it from the beginning of the Government to the present day. Such inquiries and investigations have at various times been made in every department of the Government and every branch of the public service, civil and military, and the power of the House to inquire into all official abuses and misconduct and into the management of public affairs at home and abroad, as far as the knowledge of the committee extends, has never been denied or questioned until now. Let this power to investigate the abuses which may exist in the several departments of the Government be surrendered by the House and there will be no check upon extravagance; the responsibility of public officers will be at an end; profligate and corrupt agents, unawed by the fear of exposure, will riot in the spoils of a plundered treasury, whilst Congress will have lost all power to bring them to account or to protect the public interest against their rapacity.

By claiming for the House "the right to demand from the Executive and heads of departments such information as may be in their possession relating to subjects of the deliberation of the House and within the sphere of its legitimate powers," the committee do not mean to assert that there may not be at some times information and papers in their possession which should not be made public. Such there no doubt are; but the House has the right to inspect them, and it, and not the Executive, is to be the judge of the propriety of making them public. The President has all along assumed in his message that the publication of all information and papers is a necessary consequence of their communication to the House. In this he is mistaken. It does not follow that all information communicated to the House must be made public. Confidential communications are almost daily made by the Executive to the Senate and secrecy is always observed in regard to them as long as the public interest requires it. There is nothing in the constitution of the House to prevent it from doing the same thing. Information transmitted to it by the Executive, on his suggestion that it is of confidential character, may be referred to a committee under the charge of secrecy until an examination of it can be made, when, if the committee concur in opinion with the Executive, its publication will be dispensed with. This is the true parliamentary course. It furnishes at once a security against secret abuses and the irresponsibility of the public officers and agents which would follow the denial of the right of the House to demand information, and at the same time protect the state against the discovery of facts important for the time to be concealed. In the present case on the suggestion of the President, the report and other papers were referred to the committee under at least an implied injunction of secrecy, and if the committee had concurred with the President in opinion nothing would have been easier than to have returned them to the Executive department, their contents remaining unknown excepting to the committee. Thus it will be seen that the resolution protested against by the President requires nothing from the Executive which can ever prove detrimental to the interest of the State, unless it be presumed that those interests would be more safe in his keeping than in that of the House—a presumption which finds no warrant in the Constitution and as little in the executive history of the Government.

Taking up the President's contention in regard to privileged communications which involve the paramount rights of individuals, in regard to the right of the citizen to refuse to incriminate himself, and to the privilege of ministers of the Crown in England, the report proceeds:

The general rule of law is that no one will be permitted to withhold any communication which is important as evidence, however secret and confidential the nature of that communication may have been. There are, however, some instances where the courts exclude particular evidence on the ground of public policy, because greater mischief and inconvenience would result to the State from the reception of it than would overbalance the injury which individuals might sustain by its exclusion. The interests of individuals are made to give way to the paramount interest of the community. Thus a witness is not allowed to reveal facts in a court of justice the disclosure of which might be injurious to the State; and of course the same rule prevails in relation to papers the contents of which would have a like tendency. The communication of evidence to a jury is a promulgation of it to the country, and the law so regards it, and it is so in fact. Hence the rule which excludes evidence the disclosure of which would be detrimental to the interests of the State. But this rule is only applicable to the judicial, and not to parliamentary tribunals; and the error of the President consists in not having observed the distinction.

The reason of the rule which excludes certain evidence is founded on the fact that its reception by the courts is equivalent to a publication, which principles of public policy forbid in particular cases. The reason of this rule, however, does not extend to parliamentary tribunals, which may conduct their investigations in secret, without divulging any evidence which may be prejudicial to the State. The practice of conducting investigations by secret committees has constantly prevailed in the British House of Commons ever since the Revolution of 1688, and perhaps from an earlier period; and the committee are aware of no instance in which evidence has been excluded in pursuance of the above rule. There is no reason for its observance in such cases, because there is no necessity for the publication of the evidence which may be delivered before such a tribunal. Thus it appears there exists no rule which would exclude any evidence from the House or a committee of the House, which are as competent to guard the interests of the State, and have as high motives for doing so as the Executive can have. On the other hand, it has already been shown that to withhold such evidence at the mere discretion of the Executive would be in effect to strip the House of the right to institute inquiries and investigate abuses. The consequence of this every one foresees. Public officers and agents will become irresponsible, peculations and abuses of every kind will be perpetrated with impunity, and fraud and corruption will walk abroad unrebuked in open day. Such would be the practical operation of the rule laid down by the President; but this rule, it had been shown, is applicable only to judicial and not to legislative investigations.

It is certainly a sound rule of law that a witness is not bound to answer questions when, by doing so, he would criminate himself, nor is he under any obligation to produce his private papers when they would have a similar tendency. But in what manner does this rule conflict with the resolutions of the House asserting its right to call upon the Executive and heads of Departments for such information as may be in their possession relating to subjects of its deliberations? The information referred to in the resolution is the official information spread upon the records of the Departments or contained in their archives or on their files. This information is not the private property of the Executive or heads of Departments; nor is there any rule of law which would exclude it from being given in evidence in the impeachment of the President or any of the heads of Departments or other persons. It is not privileged in the sense spoken of by the President. All the information in the possession of the Executive and of the Departments is subject to the demands of the courts, legally made, for purposes of evidence, except when it is of such a character as would be prejudicial to the State. The President himself is subject to the process of the court to compel the attendance of witnesses. He is liable to the writ of subpœna ad testificandum; and in the trial of Aaron Burr it was decided he was liable to be served with a subpœna duces tecum. It was intimated, however, by the court that he would not be bound to produce confidential communications or papers, the disclosure of which would be prejudicial to the public safety. This rule of the courts, which excludes evidence on the ground of State policy, the committee have already shown is applicable to judicial and not parliamentary proceedings. This distinction should be constantly borne in mind. Forgetfulness of it is believed to be a principal cause of the errors into which the President has fallen.

The report goes on to discuss and deny the citation of the President in regard to the Crown ministers of England, and having done this, takes up the language of the resolution which declares the right of the House and says:

This, it will be remarked, does not include any assertion of right on the part of the House to demand from the Executive the information in his possession relating to negotiations with foreign governments or appointments to office. By the Constitution the power of making treaties is vested in the President and Senate. The House has no participation in the treaty-making power, nor in that of appointment to office; and the resolution, only asserting the right of the House to demand information relative to subjects over which its power extends, will be found not to conflict in the slightest degree with the cases cited. On the other hand, a majority of these cases will be found not only to admit as broad, but a broader right than the resolution asserts. But although the terms of the resolution do not assert the right of the House to demand from the Executive information of negotiations and appointments to office, the committee do not intend to disclaim its right. It will be time enough to settle this question when it shall arise.

The committee next goes on to discuss the precedents cited by the President, and to argue that they do not sustain the contention which he makes. During this discussion the committee say:

But if the Constitution did not by the clearest implications confer upon the House the right to demand from the Executive and heads of Departments the information and papers in their possession, the uninterrupted exercise of this right, acquiesced in and admitted as it has been for almost half a century, would give it the force and sanction of a customary law. The history of the Government from its foundation to the present day, as far as the committee have been able to discover, does not furnish an instance, except that already referred to, where the Executive has refused to communicate the information required by either House of Congress, unless the discretion to do so was conferred upon him by the resolution containing the demand. Whenever the resolution has been positive and imperative in its terms there has always been a compliance. It has, however, been the usual, perhaps the almost universal practice of both Houses of Congress, in demanding information from the President, to invest him with the discretion of communicating it or not, as he should judge proper. There is often a convenience in doing so. But if, by virtue of his office or constitutional functions, he possesses this discretion, why has it always been deemed necessary to invest him with it by special grant? It is plain, from what has been the practice in such cases, that both the President and Congress have concurred in regarding this discretion as belonging to the latter. If it does not, both branches of Congress have been practicing a continued usurpation upon the Executive for a period of more than fifty years; and, what is singular, the Executive has acquiesced in it during all the time without complaint and probably without having discovered it. It was left for the sharper scrutiny of the present Chief Magistrate to discover, and to his more intrepid firmness to resist, this usurpation.

The report of the committee recommends no action of the House in regard to this matter.

1886. The House having asserted its right to direct the heads of the Executive Departments to furnish information, the Secretary of War returned an answer to a portion of the inquiry, declining to respond to the remainder.—On December 2, 1861,[1] the House agreed to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to report to the House whether any, and, if any, what, measures have been taken to ascertain who is responsible for the disastrous movement of our troops at Balls Bluff.

[1] Second session Thirty-seventh Congress, Journal, p. 10.

The Secretary of War having replied that a compliance with the resolution would, in the opinion of the general in chief, be injurious to the public service, on January 6, 1862,[1] Mr. Roscoe Conkling, of New York, submitted the following:

Resolved, That the said answer is not responsive nor satisfactory to the House, and that the Secretary be directed to return a further answer.

In the debate on this resolution it was urged, on the one hand, that the management of the armies belonged to the executive department of the Government, and that an investigation into failures belonged rather to the military tribunals than to the House. On the other hand, it was urged that as the Congress raised the armies it had a right to inquire as to their management. It was also urged that the House had a right to direct the heads of Executive Departments to furnish information and that this right, exercised also by the Parliament of Great Britain, had been recognized by a rule of the House adopted in 1820.[2]

The House agreed to the resolution—yeas 80, nays 54.

On January 10, 1862,[3] a communication was received from the Secretary of War, in response to the resolution, acknowledging the receipt of the resolution, and saying:

In reply, I have respectfully to state that "measures have been taken to ascertain who is responsible for the disastrous movement of our troops at Balls Bluff," but that it is not deemed compatible with the public interest to make known those measures at the present time.

This communication was referred to the Joint Select Committee on the conduct of the War.

1887. President Jackson declined to furnish to the Senate a copy of a paper purporting to have been read by him to the heads of the Executive Departments.—On December 11, 1833,[4] after considerable debate as to the propriety of the proceeding, the Senate agreed to a resolution requesting the President of the United States to communicate to the Senate "a copy of the paper which had been published, and which purports to have been read by him to the heads of the Executive Departments, dated the 18th day of September last, relating to the removal of the deposits of the public money from the Bank of the United States and its offices." On December 12 President Jackson responded in a message denying the constitutional right of the Senate to make such an inquiry, and declining to send the paper in question.

1888. On request, President Johnson furnished to the House the minutes of a meeting of the Cabinet.—On July 8, 1867,[5] the House passed a resolution asking the President if certain publications relating to action of the President and Cabinet were authorized and accurate, and that he be requested to furnish to the House the full minutes of the meeting. On July 20 the President (Mr. Johnson) sent a message stating that the publication was made by proper authority, and transmitting the desired documents.

1889. President Grant declined to answer an inquiry of the House as to whether or not he had performed any executive acts at a distance from the seat of Government.—On April 3, 1876,[1] on motion of Mr. J. C. S. Blackburn, of Kentucky, and under suspension of the rules, the House agreed to the following:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House, if, in his opinion, it is not incompatible with the public interest, whether since the 4th day of March, 1869, any executive offices, acts, or duties, and, if any, what, have been performed at a distance from the seat of government established by law, and for how long a period at any one time, and in what part of the United States; also whether any public necessity existed for such performance, and, if so, of what character, and how far the performances of such executive offices, acts, or duties at such distance from the seat of government established by law was in compliance with the act of Congress of the 16th day of July, 1790.

On May 4,[2] the President (Mr. Grant) replied in a message, declining to make any specific and detailed answer, saying:

I have never hesitated and shall not hesitate to communicate to Congress, and to either branch thereof, all the information which the Constitution makes it the duty of the President to give, or which my judgment may suggest to me or a request from either House may indicate to me will be useful in the discharge of the appropriate duties confided to them. I fail, however, to find in the Constitution of the United States the authority given to the House of Representatives (one branch of the Congress in which is vested the legislative power of the Government) to require of the Executive, an independent branch of the Government, coordinate with the Senate and House of Representatives, an account of his discharge of his appropriate and purely executive offices, acts, and duties, either as to when, where, or how performed.

What the House of Representatives may require as a right in its demand upon the Executive for information is limited to what is necessary for the proper discharge of its powers of legislation or impeachment. The inquiry in the resolution of the House as to where executive acts have within the last seven years been performed and at what distance from any particular spot, or for how long a period at any one time, etc., does not necessarily belong to the province of legislation. It does not profess to be asked for that object.

If this information be sought through an inquiry of the President as to his executive acts in view or in aid of the power of impeachment vested in the House, it is asked in derogation of an inherent natural right, recognized in this country by a constitutional guarantee which protects every citizen, the President as well as the humblest in the land, from being made a witness against himself.

1890. The President having failed to respond to a resolution of inquiry, the House respectfully reminded him of the fact.—On December 3, 1866,[3] the House asked a second time of the President for information, respectfully reminding him of the first application.

1891. The head of a Department having declined to respond to an inquiry of the House, a demand for a further answer was entertained as a matter of privilege.—On January 6, 1862,[4] Mr. Roscoe Conkling, of New York, submitted as a question of privilege, the following:

Whereas on the second day of the session, this House adopted a resolution, of which the following is a copy:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to report to this House whether any, and if any, what measures have been taken to ascertain who is responsible for the disastrous movement of our troops at Ball's Bluff.

And whereas, on the 16th of December, the Secretary of War returned an answer whereof the following is a copy:

WAR DEPARTMENT, December 12, 1861.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a resolution of the House of Representatives calling for certain information with regard to the disastrous movement of our troops at Ball's Bluff, and to transmit to you a report of the Adjutant-General of the United States Army, from which you will perceive that a compliance with the resolution, at this time, would, in the opinion of the general-in-chief, be injurious to the public service.

Very respectfully,

SIMON CAMERON, Secretary of War.

Hon. G. A. GROW,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, December 11, 1861.

SIR: In compliance with your instructions, I have the honor to report, in reference to the resolution of the honorable the House of Representatives, received the 3d instant, that (here quotes the resolution), that the general-in-chief of the Army is of opinion an inquiry on the subject of the resolution would, at this time, be injurious to the public service. The resolution is herewith respectfully returned.

Respectfully submitted.

L. THOMAS, Adjutant-General.

Hon. SECRETARY OF WAR, Washington.

Therefore,

Resolved, That the said answer is not responsive nor satisfactory to the House, and that the Secretary be directed to return a further answer.

Mr. William A. Richardson, of Illinois, having raised a question as to whether or not the resolution involved a question of privilege, the Speaker [1] submitted the question to the House, and the House decided to entertain the resolution as a question of privilege.

1892. A demand that the head of an Executive Department transmit a more complete reply to a resolution of inquiry may not be presented as a matter of privilege.—On February 12, 1847,[2] Mr. George Rathbun, of New York, claiming the floor for a question of privilege, stated that the Secretary of the Treasury had made to the House an inadequate reply to its call for information concerning the secret inspectors of customs, and offered this resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to report forthwith to this House the names of all persons who now are, or have been since the 4th day of March, 1845, secret agents or inspectors of customs.

Mr. George C. Dromgoole, of Virginia, objected to the introduction of the resolution on the ground that it did not involve a question of privilege.

The Speaker [3] said that, having read the report made in answer to the resolution calling on the Secretary of the Treasury, the Chair was constrained to decide that the resolution was not a question of privilege. The Chair did not intend to rule that the House could not call for the names at any time. All that the Chair decided was that this resolution was not, in the parliamentary sense, a question of privilege, because the Secretary did not seem to have acted in derogation of the order or dignity of the House.

[3] John W. Davis, of Indiana, Speaker.

Mr. Rathbun having appealed, the appeal was laid on the table.

1893. A proposition to investigate whether or not the head of an Executive Department had failed or declined to respond to an inquiry of the House was held not to be a matter of privilege.—On January 25, 1847,[1] Mr. Garrett Davis, of Kentucky, offered the following resolution as a question of privilege:

Resolved, That a select committee of five be raised to inquire whether the Secretary of the Treasury has failed or refused to furnish to this House any information called for by it of him; and also to inquire into the cause of such failure or refusal; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers, and report to this House.

The Speaker[2] decided that the subject-matter of the resolution did not involve the privilege of the House, and was not therefore a question of privilege.

Mr. Davis having appealed, the decision of the Chair was sustained.

1894. In 1886 the refusal of the Attorney-General to transmit certain papers called for by the Senate led to a discussion of prerogatives and a declaration by the Senate.—In 1886,[3] there was a prolonged consideration in the Senate of the relations of the Senate and the Executive, caused by the declination of the Attorney-General to transmit to the Senate certain documents concerning the administration of the office of the district attorney of the southern district of Alabama.

The Senate had called for "all documents and papers that have been filed in the Department of Justice since the 1st day of January, 1885, in relation to the management and conduct of the office of district attorney of the United States of the southern district of Alabama." The papers which the Attorney-General refused to transmit were those having "exclusive reference to the suspension by the President of George M. Duskin, the late incumbent," and he stated that "it was not considered that the public interest would be promoted by a compliance" with the request of the Senate.

On February 18 Mr. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, from the Committee on the Judiciary, made an exhaustive report on the obligations of the Executive to transmit to Congress documents called for, and concluding with a resolution condemnatory of the Executive for this refusal. The minority of the committee presented views in opposition to this proposed action.

The report included the following:

The important question, then, is whether it is within the constitutional competence of either House of Congress to have access to the official papers and documents in the various public offices of the United States created by laws enacted by themselves. It may be fully admitted that except in respect of the Department of the Treasury there is no statute which commands the head of any Department to transmit to either House of Congress on its demand any information whatever concerning the administration of his Department, but the committee believes it to be clear that from the very nature of the powers intrusted by the Constitution to the two Houses of Congress it is a necessary incident that either House must have at all times the right to know all that officially exists or takes place in any of the Departments of the Government.

So perfectly was this proposition understood before and at the time of the formation of the Constitution that the Continental Congress, before the adoption of the present Constitution, in establishing a department of foreign affairs and providing for a principal officer thereof, thought it fit to enact that all books, records, and other papers in that office should be open to the inspection of any Member of Congress, provided that no copy should be taken of matters of secret nature without special leave of Congress It was not thought necessary to enact that the Congress itself should be entitled to the production and inspection of such papers, for that right was supposed to exist in the very nature of things, and when, under the Constitution, the department came to be created, although the provision that each individual Member of Congress should have access to the papers was omitted (evidently for reasons that can now be quite well understood), it was not thought necessary that an affirmative provision should be inserted, giving to the Houses of Congress the right to know the contents of the public papers and records in the public offices of the country whose laws and whose offices they were to assist in creating.

It is believed that there is no instance of civilized governments having bodies representative of the people or of States in which the right and the power of those representative bodies to obtain in one form or another complete information as to every paper and transaction in any of the executive departments thereof does not exist, even though such papers might relate to what is ordinarily an executive function, if that function impinged upon any duty or function of the representative bodies.

A qualification of this general right may under our Constitution exist in case of calls by the House of Representatives for papers relating to treaties, etc., under consideration and not yet disposed of by the President and Senate.

The committee feels authorized to state, after a somewhat careful research, that within the foregoing limits there is scarcely in the history of this Government until now any instance of a refusal by a head of a Department, or even of the President himself, to communicate official facts and information, as distinguished from private and unofficial papers, motions, views, reasons, and opinions, to either House of Congress when unconditionally demanded. Indeed, the early Journals of the Senate show great numbers of instances of directions to the heads of Departments, as of course, to furnish papers and reports upon all sorts of affairs, both legislative and executive.

The instances of requests to the President and commands to the heads of Departments by each House of Congress from those days until now for papers and information on every conceivable subject of public affairs are almost innumerable, for it appears to have been thought by all the Presidents who have carried on the Government now for almost a century that, even in respect of requests to them, an independent and coordinate branch of the Government, they were under a constitutional duty and obligation to furnish to either House the papers called for, unless, as has happened in very rare instances, when the request was coupled with an appeal to the discretion of the President in respect of the danger of publicity, to send the papers if, in his judgment, it should not be incompatible with the public welfare.

Even in times of the highest party excitement and stress, as in 1826 and 1844, it did not seem to occur to the Chief Executive of the United States that it was possible that any official facts or information existing, either in the Departments created by law or within his own possession, could, save as before stated, be withheld from either of the Houses of Congress, although such facts or information sometimes involved very intricate and delicate matters of foreign affairs as well as sometimes the history and conduct of officers connected with the administration of affairs.

The Senate, on February 18, agreed to this resolution:

Resolved, That it is, under these circumstances, the duty of the Senate to refuse its advice and consent to proposed removals of officers the documents and papers in reference to the supposed official or personal misconduct of whom are withheld by the Executive or any head of a Department when deemed necessary by the Senate and called for in considering the matter.

The President,[1] on March 1, transmitted a message in which he said:

While, therefore, I am constrained to deny the right of the Senate to the papers and documents described, so far as the right to the same is based upon the claim that they are in any view of the subject official, I am also led unequivocally to dispute the right of the Senate, by the aid of any documents whatever, or in any way save through the judicial process of trial on impeachment, to review or reverse the acts of the Executive in the suspension, during the recess of the Senate, of Federal officials.

I believe the power to remove or suspend such officials is vested in the President alone by the Constitution, which in express terms provides that "the executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America," and that "he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed."

The Senate belongs to the legislative branch of the Government. When the Constitution by express provision superadded to its legislative duties the right to advise and consent to appointments to office and to sit as a court of impeachment, it conferred upon that body all the control and regulation of Executive action supposed to be necessary for the safety of the people; and this express and special grant of such extraordinary powers, not in any way related to or growing out of general Senatorial duty, and in itself a departure from the general plan of our Government, should be held, under a familiar maxim of construction, to exclude every other right of interference with Executive functions.

In the first Congress which assembled after the adoption of the Constitution, comprising many who aided in its preparation, a legislative construction was given to that instrument in which the independence of the Executive in the matter of removals from office was fully sustained.

As to the law of 1867, Mr. Cleveland said:

The first enactment of this description was passed under a stress of partisanship and political bitterness which culminated in the President's impeachment.

This law provided that the Federal officers to which it applied could only be suspended during the recess of the Senate when shown by evidence satisfactory to the President to be guilty of misconduct in office, or crime, or when incapable or disqualified to perform their duties, and that within twenty days after the next meeting of the Senate it should be the duty of the President "to report to the Senate such suspension, with the evidence and reasons for his action in the case."

This statute, passed in 1867, when Congress was overwhelmingly and bitterly opposed politically to the President, may be regarded as an indication that even then it was thought necessary by a Congress determined upon the subjugation of the Executive to legislative will to furnish itself a law for that purpose, instead of attempting to reach the object intended by an invocation of any pretended constitutional right.

* * * * * * *

The requests and demands which by the score have for nearly three months been presented to the different Departments of the Government, whatever may be their form, have but one complexion. They assume the right of the Senate to sit in judgment upon the exercise of my exclusive discretion and executive function, for which I am solely responsible to the people from whom I have so lately received the sacred trust of office. My oath to support and defend the Constitution, my duty to the people who have chosen me to execute the powers of their great office and not to relinquish them, and my duty to the Chief Magistracy, which I must preserve unimpaired in all its dignity and vigor, compel me to refuse compliance with these demands.

From March 9 to March 26 the Senate debated the issue involved, and concluded with a condemnation of the action of the Attorney-General as—in violation of his official duty and subversive of the fundamental principles of the Government and of a good administration thereof.

1895. It has been considered proper to use the word "request" in asking for information from the President and "direct" in addressing the heads of Departments.—On January 21, 1837,[2] the select committee appointed to investigate the Executive Departments of the Government, was considering a resolution calling for information, in terms as follows:

[1] Grover Cleveland, President.

[2] House Report No. 194, second session, Twenty-fourth Congress, journal of the committee, pp. 4, 6, 7.

Resolved, That the President of the United States and the heads of the several Executive Departments be required to furnish this committee with a list or lists of all officers, etc.

Mr. Dutee J. Pearce, of Rhode Island, moved to amend the resolution so that it would read "requested" as to the call upon the President and "directed" as to the call upon heads of departments.

This amendment was agreed to, yeas 7, nays 1.

1896. Resolutions of inquiry addressed to the President have usually contained the clause " if not incompatible with the public interest," especially when on the subject of diplomatic affairs.

In some instances the House has made its inquiries of the President without condition, and has even made the inquiry imperative.

On January 16, 1807,[1] Mr John Randolph, of Virginia, offered this resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, requested to lay before this House any information in possession of the Executive, except such as he may deem the public welfare to require not to be disclosed, touching any illegal combination of private individuals against the peace and safety of the Union, or any military expedition planned by such individuals against the territories of any power in amity with the United States; together with the measures which the Executive has pursued for suppressing or defeating the same.

Question arose as to the propriety of the resolution, and reference was made to similar resolutions passed in 1797 [2] and 1798. [3]

The resolution was agreed to, yeas 109, nays 14, and yeas 67, nays 52, a separate vote having been taken on the latter portion of the resolution, "together with the measures which the Executive has pursued" etc., the words "and proposes to take" having been stricken out on motion of Mr. Randolph.

Mr. John Randolph and Mr. Lloyd were appointed a committee to present the resolution to the President, and on January 19 Mr. Randolph reported that the President signified that he would cause the information requested to be laid before the House.

On January 22, the President [4] communicated the information to the House.

1897. On February 27, 1856,[5] the House agreed to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House so much of the correspondence between the Government of the United States and that of Great Britain touching the Clayton-Bulwer convention, not heretofore communicated, as he shall deem not incompatible with the public interest.

On April 9, President Pierce transmitted the information called for.

1898. On March 30, 1798,[1] Mr. John Allen, of Connecticut, proposed this resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House the dispatches from the envoys extraordinary from the United States to the French Republic, mentioned in his message of the 19 instant, or such parts thereof as consideration of public safety and interest, in his opinion, may permit.

Discussion arose as to the last clause of the resolution, objection being made that it proposed to transfer to the President a right which the House itself should exercise of determining what it was proper to publish in consideration of the public interest. This case differed from that when papers relating to the British treaty were called for, since this was a subject within the constitutional authority of the House. The House, without division, struck out the objectionable clause, and the resolution was agreed to in this form, yeas 65, nays 27:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House the instructions to, and dispatches from, the envoys extraordinary from the United States to the French Republic, mentioned in his message of the 19th ultimo.

Ordered, That Mr. Allen and Mr. Hanna be appointed a committee to present the foregoing resolution to the President of the United States.

The same day Mr. Allen reported that the committee had performed that service, and that the President signified to them that he would take the subject into his consideration, and do thereon what it should appear to him the public safety required.

On April 3[2] the President[3] transmitted, "in compliance with the request of the House of Representatives," the papers mentioned in the resolution, "omitting only some names and a few expressions descriptive of the persons." The President then said:

I request that they may be considered in confidence until the members of Congress are fully possessed of their contents, and shall have had opportunity to deliberate on the consequences of their publication; after which time I submit them to your wisdom.

The House then proceeded to consider the papers in secret session.

1899. On June 1, 1868,[4] the House agreed to a resolution "directing" the President to send to the House certain information in regard to the return of John C. Breckinridge to the United States. Mr. James G. Blaine, of Maine, called attention to the fact that the usual word was "requested," but the resolution was passed in the original form.

1900. On December 17, 1821,[5] Mr. Ezekiel Whitman, of Maine, proposed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House such information as he may think proper to communicate in relation to any misunderstanding which may have existed between Andrew Jackson, as governor of the Floridas, and Elijius Fromentin, as judge of the court therein; and also in relation to any delay or omission on the part of the officers under his Catholic majesty to surrender to the officers and commissioners of the United States, duly authorized to receive the same, any of the archives and documents which relate directly to the property and sovereignty in and over the said Floridas, etc.

On motion of Mr. Lewis Williams, of North Carolina, the words "think proper to communicate" were stricken out and in their place was inserted the word "possess."

Also, on January 2, this amendment was added at the end of the resolution:

And also such part of the correspondence as it may be consistent with the public interest to disclose, and which has not heretofore been communicated, which may have taken place between the Executive and the said Andrew Jackson touching the proceedings of the latter during his continuance as governor of said Territory.

Considerable debate was occasioned as to the propriety of the resolution, but it was agreed to.

On January 29 President Monroe responded to the request, saying in his message:

Being always desirous to communicate to Congress or to either House all the information in the possession of the Executive respecting any important interest of our Union which may be communicated without real injury to our constituents, and which can rarely happen except in negotiations pending with foreign powers, and deeming it more consistent with the principles of our Government in cases submitted to my discretion, as in the present instance, to hazard error by the freedom of the communication rather than by withholding any portion of information belonging to the subject, I have thought proper to communicate every document comprised within this call.

1901. On December 31, 1849,[1] Mr. Abraham W. Venable, of North Carolina, offered the following:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House, as early as he conveniently can whether, since the last session of Congress, any person has been by him appointed either a civil or military governor of California or New Mexico. If any military or civil governor has been appointed, their names and their compensation. If a military and civil governor has been united in one person, whether any additional compensation has been given for said duties, and the amount of the same, etc. (The resolution continues in other paragraphs relating to the same subject.)

A suggestion was made by Mr. Henry W. Hilliard, of Alabama, that the words "if not incompatible with the public interest," be inserted after the word "House," where it first occurs.

Mr. Venable declined to accept the modification. He said he believed that this clause was usually inserted in resolutions calling for information relating to foreign relations, and not necessarily in other calls. He intended no discourtesy to the President, but wanted the information.

Mr. Hilliard then moved to insert the clause, but the House decided the motion in the negative without division.

The resolution was then agreed to.

On January 21, 1850, the President transmitted the information called for.

1902. A discussion in the Senate as to its powers in calling for papers from the President.

The clause, "if not, in his judgment, incompatible with the public interest," is generally used by the Senate in resolutions of inquiry directed to the President.

On January 28, 1904,[1] in the Senate, in open session, Mr. Charles A. Culberson, of Texas, called up for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be requested to inform the Senate whether all the correspondence and notes between the Department of State and the legation of the United States at Bogota, and between either of these and the Government of Colombia for the construction of an isthmian canal since June twenty-eighth, nineteen hundred and two, and all the correspondence and notes between the United States and any of its officials or representatives or the Government of Panama concerning the separation of Panama from Colombia, have been sent to the Senate, and, if not, that he be requested to send the remaining correspondence and notes to the Senate in executive session.

To this Mr. Shelby M. Cullom, of Illinois, proposed to add the following amendment:

if not, in his judgment, incompatible with the public interest.

An extended debate arose as to the powers of the Senate to call on the Executive for papers, with an abundant citation of precedents. Mr. Cullom said that so far as he had examined the qualifying clause which he had proposed was first inserted in a resolution of inquiry by Mr. Daniel Webster, when a Senator.

After debate it was agreed that a vote should be taken on the resolution on the next day.

On January 29, 1904,[2] the debate was concluded, and the question being taken on the amendment proposed by Mr. Cullom, there were yeas 39, nays 20; so the amendment was agreed to.

Then, after certain other amendments verbal in nature had been agreed to, the resolution was agreed to by the Senate.

1903. On March 17, 1905,[3] in the Senate, the following resolution, offered by Mr. Henry M. Teller, of Colorado, was considered:

Resolved, That the President is hereby requested, if, in his opinion, not incompatible with the public interest, to send to the Senate, for use in executive sessions, copies of the instructions given to Commodore Dillingham and Minister Dawson, or either of them, regarding Dominican affairs, and copies of all correspondence and telegrams relating to Dominican affairs, or relating to any proposed agreement, protocol, or treaty between the United States and Santo Domingo, from July 1, 1904, to the 1st of March, 1905.

The consideration of this resolution caused a debate of some length, which extended into the next day's session, as to its propriety, with a review of precedents.

The resolution was finally referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

1904. Discussion in the Senate as to the practice of requiring information from the heads of Departments and requesting it of the President.—On December 6, 1906,[4] the Senate was considering this resolution:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interests, full information bearing upon the recent order dismissing from the military service of the United States three companies of the Twenty-fifth Regiment of Infantry, United States troops (colored).

when Mr. John C. Spooner, of Wisconsin, said:

Mr. President, I am opposed to the resolution offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania. My opposition to it is based entirely upon the form of it. This resolution does not, so far as the subject-matter goes, fall within the class of inquiries which the Senate has ever been accustomed to address to the President. It implies on its face, Mr. President, a doubt here which I think does not exist; as to whether the Senate is of right entitled to all the facts relating to the discharge of the three named companies or not. Always the Senate, in passing resolutions of inquiry addressed to Cabinet officers, except the Secretary of State, make them in form of direction, not request. It rarely has happened that a request has been addressed to any Cabinet officer where foreign relations were involved. Where such a resolution has been adopted it has been addressed to the President, with the qualification that he is requested to furnish the information only so far as, in his judgment, the transmission of it is compatible with the public interest.

There are reasons for that, Mr. President. The State Department stands upon an entirely different basis as to the Congress from the other Departments. The conduct of our foreign relations is vested by the Constitution in the President. It would not be admissible at all that either House should have the power to force from the Secretary of State information connected with the negotiation of treaties, communications from foreign governments, and a variety of matters which, if made public, would result in very great harm in our foreign relations—matters so far within the control of the President that it has always been the practice, and it always will be the practice, to recognize the fact that there is of necessity information which it may not be compatible with the public interest should be transmitted to Congress—to the Senate or to the House.

There are other cases, not especially confined, Mr. President, to the State Department, or to foreign relations, where the President would be at liberty obviously to decline to transmit information to Congress or to either House of Congress. Of course, in time of war, the President being Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, could not, and the War Department or the Navy Department could not, be required by either House to transmit plans of campaign or orders issued as to the destination of ships, or anything relating to the strategy of war, the public knowledge of which getting to the enemy would defeat the Government and its plans and enure to the benefit of an enemy.

There are still other cases. The Department of Justice would not be expected to transmit to either House the result of its investigations upon which some one had been indicted, and lay bare to the defendant the case of the Government. The confidential investigations in various departments of the Government should be, and have always been, treated by both Houses as confidential, and the President is entirely at liberty to permit by the Cabinet officer to whom the inquiry is addressed as much or as little information regarding them as he might see fit. I have no doubt the President would transmit everything upon this subject. My objection is to the form of the resolution. I think we ought to maintain the uniform practice upon the subject. I do not think, as to a matter upon which the Senate clearly has a right to be fully advised, it should depart from the usual form of directing the transmission by the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy or the Secretary of the Interior, to adopt a resolution of request of the President, bearing upon its face a recognition of the fact that he is at liberty to withhold the information or to transmit such part of it as he shall see fit.

Mr. President, in time of peace as to matters relating to the organization and the administration of the Army there can be no secrecy. It is purely domestic public business, as to which the Congress has a right to know. I should be very much disappointed if in a matter of this kind the Senate should address the inquiry to the President, coupled, as it must be, with the suggestion that we doubt our right to the information. I think it is a bad precedent to establish. In such matters I think we ought to maintain the practice which, so far as I remember, hitherto has been unbroken. Therefore I am opposed to the form of the resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania. I am in favor of the form of the resolution of the Senator from Ohio.

On the other hand, various Senators expressed the opinion that, in accordance with the precedents of the Senate, it would be perfectly proper to ask the information of the President. Mr. Henry M. Teller, of Colorado, said:

I had occasion some time ago to consult the precedents running back forty or fifty years, and I have a very distinct recollection of a number of cases where Presidents have declined to communicate information both to the House and to the Senate.

I do not think there is any impropriety in our asking the President in a courteous, proper manner to communicate information to the Senate. I am under the impression, Mr. President, that the better practice would be to ask the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Treasury, or the Secretary of the Navy, whoever it might be that had the matter under control, without annoying the President and adding to his work. But, so far as I am concerned, I am willing to vote for a resolution asking the President for information, or I am willing to vote for a resolution asking the Secretary of War for information; but I do not think we ought to ask them both. It seems to me we ought to confine ourselves to one or the other. I simply express my preference for the method of asking the Secretary of War, instead of asking the President.

The Senate agreed to the resolution without changing it in respect to suggestions of Mr. Spooner.

1905. Discussion of the status of the Department of State in relation to resolutions of inquiry.—On January 23, 1906,[1] in the Senate, Mr. John C. Spooner, of Wisconsin, said in the course of a speech on the prerogatives of the President in relation to foreign affairs:

The act creating the Department of State, in 1789, was an exception to the acts creating the other Departments of the Government. I will not stop to refer to the language of it or to any of the discussions in regard to it, but it is a Department that is not required to make any reports to Congress. It is a Department which from the beginning the Senate has never assumed the right to direct or control, except as to clearly define matters relating to duty imposed by statute and not connected with the conduct of our foreign relations.

We direct all the other heads of Departments to transmit to the Senate designated papers or information. We do not address directions to the Secretary of State, nor do we direct requests, even, to the Secretary of State. We direct requests to the real head of that Department, the President of the United States, and, as a matter of courtesy, we add the qualifying words, "if in his judgment not incompatible with the public interest."[2]

1906. The Postmaster-General having responded to an inquiry in a manner considered disrespectful, the Senate referred the matter to the President, whereat an explanation was forthcoming.—On March 1, 1839,[3] the Senate agreed to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the letter of the Postmaster-General to the President of the Senate, stating that the only reason why he had not sent an answer to a previous resolution was because it was not ready is considered by the Senate as disrespectful to this body.

Resolved, That said letter, with the resolution to which it purported to be an answer, be laid before the President of the United States for such action as he may deem proper.

The same day a message from the President transmitted a letter of explanation from the Postmaster-General.

1907. The Senate returned to the Secretary of the Navy an impertinent document transmitted in response to an inquiry.—On March 3, 1865,[4] the Senate considered and examined, as a question of privilege, the act of the Secretary of the Navy in sending to the Senate, in answer to an inquiry, a document

S., sec. 413), the Secretary of the Navy (R. S., sec. 429), the Secretary of the Interior (R. which did not relate to the inquiry, but which embodied a reply by the Assistant Secretary to some remarks made in relation to him by a Senator. After investigation by the Judiciary Committee, the Senate decided that the document should not have been communicated, and directed that it be returned to the Secretary of the Navy.

1908. A subordinate officer of the Government, to whom the House has directed a resolution of inquiry, may respond directly or through his superior.—On January 5, 1863,[1] the House by resolution asked of the Secretary of State certain information relating to the relations of the United States with the Government in New Granada. On January 16 a response was received, not from the Secretary of State, but from the President.

1909. On January 30, 1863,[2] the House "directed" the General in Chief of the Army to inform the House as to paroles of certain confederate officers. On February 9 the inquiry was responded to by the Secretary of War.

1910. In 1868[3] frequent instances occurred wherein the House called directly on the General of the Army for information, and in turn the General of the Army transmitted his communications directly to the House.

PROCEDURE OF THE ELECTORAL COUNT.

1. Provisions of the Constitution for election of President and Vice-President. Sections 1911–1913.
2. Statutes governing the casting and transmittal of electoral votes. Sections 1914–1917.
3. Statutes governing the two Houses in the electoral count. Sections 1918–1922.
4. Practice as to the count. Sections 1923–1927. [1]

1911. The provisions of the Constitution relating to the appointment of presidential electors.

No Senator or Representative or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States may be appointed an elector.

The Constitution, in section 1 of Article II, provides:

Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress:[2] but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.

* See Volume VI, Chapter CXC.

[2] The Revised Statutes provide as follows:

"SEC. 131. Except in case of a presidential election prior to the ordinary period, as specified in sections one hundred and forty-seven to one hundred and forty-nine, inclusive, when the offices of President and Vice-President both become vacant, the electors of President and Vice-President shall be appointed, in each State, on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November, in every fourth year succeeding every election of a President and Vice-President.

"SEC. 132. The number of electors shall be equal to the number of Senators and Representatives to which the several States are by law entitled at the time when the President and Vice-President to be chosen come into office; except, that where no apportionment of Representatives has been made after any enumeration, at the time of choosing electors, the number of electors shall be according to the then existing apportionment of Senators and Representatives.

"SEC. 133. Each State may, by law, provide for the filling of any vacancies which may occur in its college of electors when such college meets to give its electoral vote.

"SEC. 134. Whenever any State has held an election for the purpose of choosing electors, and has failed to make a choice on the day prescribed by law, the electors may be appointed on a subsequent day in such a manner as the legislature of such State may direct."

1912. Section 1 of Article II of the Constitution provides:

The Congress may determine the time of chusing the electors, and the day on which they shall give their votes; which day shall be the same throughout the United States.[1]

1913. Provisions of the Constitution for the choice of President and Vice-President by the electors; for the electoral count, and for elections in House and Senate in default of choice by the electors.—The twelfth amendment to the Constitution, proclaimed as ratified September 25, 1804, provides:

The electors shall meet in their respective States, and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President, one of whom, at least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves; they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice-President, and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each, which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted. The person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest numbers, not exceeding three, on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President. But in choosing the President the votes shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote; a quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the States, and a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice. And if the House of Representatives shall not choose a President whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them before the fourth day of March next following, then the Vice-President shall act as President, as in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the President. The person having the greatest number of votes as Vice-President shall be the Vice-President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed, and if no person have a majority, then from the two highest numbers on the list the Senate shall choose the Vice-President; a quorum for the purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of Senators, and a majority of the whole number shall be necessary to a choice. But no person constitutionally ineligible to the office of President shall be eligible to that of Vice-President of the United States.[2]

[1] The Revised Statutes provide:

"SEC. 135. The electors for each State shall meet and give their votes upon the first Wednesday in December in the year in which they are appointed, at such place, in each State, as the legislature of such State shall direct."

[2] Originally the Constitution provided as follows:

"The electors shall meet in their respective States, and vote by ballot for two persons, of whom one at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves. And they shall make a list of all the persons voted for, and of the number of votes for each, which list they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted. The person having the greatest number of votes shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if there be more than one who have such majority, and have an equal number of votes, then the House of Representatives shall immediately chuse by ballot one of them for President; and if no person have a majority, then from the five highest on the list the said House shall in like manner chuse the President. But in chusing the President, the votes shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote. A quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the States, and a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice. In every case, after the choice of the President, the person having the greatest number of votes of the electors shall be the Vice-President. But if there should remain two or more who have equal votes, the Senate shall chuse from them by ballot the Vice-President."

This paragraph was superseded in 1804 by the twelfth amendment.

1914. The statutes designate the time for the choice of electors of President and Vice-President, and the time for their meeting to give in their votes.

A controversy in any State over the appointment of Presidential electors settled in accordance with a law of that State six days before the time for the meeting of the electors shall not be a cause of question in the counting of the electoral vote by Congress.

The act[1] approved February 3, 1887,[2] provides:

That the electors of each State shall meet and give their votes on the second Monday in January next following their appointment,[3] at such place in each State as the legislature of such State shall direct.

SEC. 2. That if any State shall have provided, by laws enacted prior to the day fixed for the appointment of the electors, for its final determination of any controversy or contest concerning the appointment of all or any of the electors of such State, by judicial or other methods or procedures, and such determination shall have been made at least six days before the time fixed for the meeting of the electors, such determination made pursuant to such law so existing on said day, and made at least six days prior to the said time of meeting of the electors, shall be conclusive, and shall govern in the counting of the electoral votes as provided in the Constitution, and as hereinafter regulated, so far as the ascertainment of the electors appointed by such State is concerned.

1915. The executive of each State is charged with the duty of transmitting to the Secretary of State of the United States a certificate of the appointment of electors and the names and votes; and of delivering a similar certificate to the electors.

It is the duty of the executive of any State wherein there may be a controversy as to the appointment of electors to transmit to the Secretary of State of the United States a certificate of the determination thereof.

The Secretary of State is required to transmit to Congress copies of certificates received from the State executives relating to the appointment of Presidential electors.

The act approved February 3, 1887[2] provides:

That it shall be the duty of the executive of each State, as soon as practicable after the conclusion of the appointment of electors[4] in such State, by the final ascertainment under and in pursuance of the

[2] 24 Stat. L., p. 373.

[3] The law of 1845 (5 Stat. L., p. 721) provided an uniform day of election for appointment of electors, "the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November, in every fourth year." An old law of 1792 (1 Stat. L., p. 240) provided for a special election in case of vacancies in both offices, but this was repealed by the act of 1886 (24 Stat. L., p. 1), which provided for succession down through the cabinet, and the calling of an extra session of Congress.

[4] "The number of electors shall be equal to the number of Senators and Representatives to which the several States are by law entitled at the time when the President and Vice-President to be chosen come into office; except that when no apportionment of Representatives has been made after any enumeration, at the time of choosing electors, the number of electors shall be according to the then existing apportionment of Senators and Representatives." (Sec. 132, R. S.) The States may provide by law for filling vacancies; and the electors for each State meet at such place as the legislature may direct and give their votes on the first Wednesday in December in the year in which they are appointed. (Secs. 133–135, R. S.)

laws of such State providing for such ascertainment, to communicate, under the seal of the State, to the Secretary of State of the United States, a certificate of such ascertainment of the electors appointed, setting forth the names of such electors and the canvass or other ascertainment under the laws of such State of the number of votes given or cast for each person for whose appointment any and all votes have been given or cast; and it shall also thereupon be the duty of the executive of each State to deliver to the electors of such State, on or before the day on which they are required by the preceding section to meet, the same certificate, in triplicate, under the seal of the State; and such certificate shall be inclosed and transmitted by the electors at the same time and in the same manner as is provided by law for transmitting by such electors to the seat of Government the lists of all persons voted for as President and of all persons voted for as Vice-President; and section one hundred and thirty-six of the Revised Statutes is hereby repealed; and if there shall have been any final determination in a State of a controversy or contest as provided for in section two of this act, it shall be the duty of the executive of such State, as soon as practicable after such determination, to communicate, under the seal of the State, to the Secretary of State of the United States, a certificate of such determination, in form and manner as the same shall have been made; and the Secretary of State of the United States, as soon as practicable after the receipt at the State Department of each of the certificates hereinbefore directed to be transmitted to the Secretary of State, shall publish, in such public newspaper as he shall designate, such certificates in full; and at the first meeting of Congress thereafter he shall transmit to the two Houses of Congress copies in full of each and every such certificate so received theretofore at the State Department.

1916. The statutes provide for transmitting the certificates of the action of the electors in each State to the President of the Senate.

Section 138 of the Revised Statutes provides:

The electors shall make and sign three certificates of all the votes given by them, each of which certificates shall contain two distinct lists, one of the votes for President and the other of the votes for Vice-President, and shall annex to each of the certificates one of the lists of the electors which shall have been furnished to them by direction of the executive of the State.

Sections 139 and 140 provide for the sealing, certifying, and transmitting of these certificates, two of the three copies being sent to the President of the Senate, one by messenger and the other by mail, while the third is delivered to the judge of the district in which the electors assemble.

1917. Certificates of the votes of the electors in the several States for President and Vice-President are transmitted to the President of the Senate, who may in case of delay send for them.—The act of October 19, 1888,[1] provides:

That the certificates and lists of votes for President and Vice-President of the United States, mentioned in chapter one of title three of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and in the act to which this is a supplement,[2] shall be forwarded, in the manner therein provided, to the President of the Senate forthwith after the second Monday in January, on which the electors shall give their votes.

SEC. 2. That section one hundred and forty-one of the Revised Statutes of the United States is hereby so amended as to read as follows:

"SEC. 141. Whenever a certificate of votes from any State has not been received at the seat of Government on the fourth Monday of the month of January in which their meeting shall have been held the Secretary of State shall send a special messenger to the district judge in whose custody one certificate of the votes from that State has been lodged, and such judge shall forthwith transmit that list to the seat of Government."

1918. The electoral count occurs in the Hall of the House at 1 p. m. on the second Wednesday of February succeeding every meeting of electors.

[2] See section 1916 of this volume.

The President of the Senate is the presiding officer of the joint meeting for the count of the electoral votes.

Two tellers are appointed on the part of each House to tabulate the votes in the electoral count.

At the conclusion of the electoral count the President of the Senate merely announces the state of the vote, which, with the list of the votes, is entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

The certificates of electoral votes are presented to the joint meeting in alphabetical order of States, and on being read are subject to objection in writing signed by at least one Member and one Senator.

In case of objection to an electoral certificate, or in case of conflicting certificates, the Senate retires and the two Houses consider the matter separately.

The act approved February 2, 1887,[1] provides:

SEC. 4. That Congress shall be in session on the second Wednesday in February succeeding every meeting of the electors.[2]

The Senate and House of Representatives shall meet in the Hall of the House of Representatives at the hour of 1 o'clock in the afternoon on that day, and the President of the Senate shall be their presiding officer.[3]

Two tellers[4] shall be previously appointed on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House of Representatives, to whom shall be handed, as they are opened by the President of the Senate, all the certificates and papers purporting to be certificates of the electoral votes, which certificates and papers shall be opened, presented, and acted upon in the alphabetical order of the States, beginning with the letter A; and said tellers, having then read the same in the presence and hearing of the two Houses, shall make a list of the votes as they shall appear from the said certificates; and the votes having been ascertained and counted in the manner and according to the rules in this act provided, the result of the same shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall thereupon announce the state of the vote,[5] which announcement shall be deemed a sufficient declaration of the persons, if any, elected President and Vice-President of the United States and, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

Upon such reading of any such certificate or paper, the President of the Senate shall call for objections, if any. Every objection shall be made in writing, and shall state clearly and concisely, and without argument, the ground thereof, and shall be signed by at least one Senator and one Member of the House of Representatives before the same shall be received. When all objections so made to any vote or paper from a State shall have been received and read, the Senate shall thereupon withdraw, and such objections shall be submitted to the Senate for its decision, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall, in like manner, submit such objections to the House of Representatives for its decision, and no electoral vote or votes from any State which shall have been regularly given by electors whose appointment has been lawfully certified to according to section 3 of this act from which but one return has been received shall be rejected, but the two Houses concurrently may reject the vote or votes when they agree that such vote or votes have not been so regularly given by electors whose appointment has been so certified.

If more than one return or paper purporting to be a return[1] from a State shall have been received by the President of the Senate, those votes, and those only, shall be counted which shall have been regularly gived by the electors who are shown by the determination mentioned in section 2[2] of this act to have been appointed, if the determination in said section provided for shall have been made, or by such successors or substitutes, in case of a vacancy in the board of electors so ascertained, as have been appointed to fill such vacancy in the mode provided by the laws of the State; but in case there shall arise the question which of two or more of such State authorities determining what electors have been appointed, as mentioned in section 2 of this act, is the lawful tribunal of such State, the votes regularly given of those electors, and those only, of such State shall be counted whose title as electors the two Houses, acting separately, shall concurrently decide is supported by the decision of such State so authorized by its laws, and in such case of more than one return or paper purporting to be a return from a State, if there shall have been no such determination of the question in the State aforesaid, then those votes, and those only, shall be counted which the two Houses shall concurrently decide were cast by lawful electors appointed in accordance with the laws of the State, unless the two Houses, acting separately, shall concurrently decide such votes not to be the lawful votes of the legally appointed electors of such State. But if the two Houses shall disagree in respect of the counting of such votes, then, and in that case, the votes of the electors whose appointment shall have been certified by the executive of the State, under the seal thereof, shall be counted. When the two Houses have voted, they shall immediately again meet, and the presiding officer shall then announce the decision of the questions submitted. No votes or papers from any other State shall be acted upon until the objections previously made to the votes or papers from any State shall have been finally disposed of.

1919. The statutes give directions for seating the officers and Members of the two Houses at the counting of the electoral vote.

The statutes prescribe directions as to recesses and adjournments of the joint meeting and the two Houses during the count of the electoral vote.

The act approved February 2, 1887,[3] providing the method of conducting the electoral count, prescribes:

That at such joint meeting of the two Houses seats shall be provided as follows: For the President of the Senate, the Speaker's chair; for the Speaker, immediately upon his left; the Senators, in the body of the Hall upon the right of the presiding officer; for the Representatives, in the body of the Hall not provided for the Senators; for the tellers, Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives, at the Clerk's desk; for the other officers of the two Houses, in front of the Clerk's desk and upon each side of the Speaker's platform.[4]

Such joint meeting shall not be dissolved until the count of electoral votes shall be completed and the result declared, and no recess shall be taken unless a question shall have arisen in regard to counting any such votes, or otherwise under this act, in which case it shall be competent for either House, acting separately, in the manner hereinbefore provided, to direct a recess of such House not beyond the next calendar day, Sunday excepted, at the hour of 10 o'clock in the forenoon. But if the counting of the electoral votes and the declaration of the result shall not have been completed before the fifth calendar day next after such first meeting of the two Houses, no further or other recess shall be taken by either House.[5]

[1] The act of 1877 provided the electorial commission for decision in such cases. (19 Stat. L., p. 228.) The joint rule of 1865 and prior joint rules had not made definite provision in this respect.

[4] This provision as to the seating of the two Houses is taken from the act of 1877 (19 Stat. L., p. 229) and the joint rule of 1865 (see sec. 1951, footnote, of this work), which in turn continued prior usage.

[5] The provision as to recesses is a more specific provision than that of the law of 1877 or the joint rule of 1865, from both of which it is adopted.

1920. The rule for the seating of officers and Members at a joint session of the two Houses for counting the electoral vote.—The former joint rule of the House and Senate No. 22,[1] dating from February 6, 1865, provided that at the joint session of the two Houses in the Hall of the House for counting the electoral vote seats should be provided as follows:

For the President of the Senate, the Speaker's chair; for the Speaker, a chair immediately upon his left; for the Senators, in the body of the Hall upon the right of the presiding officer; for the Representatives, in the body of the Hall not occupied by the Senators; for the tellers, Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives, at the Clerk's desk; for the other officers of the two Houses, in front of the Clerk's desk and upon either side of the Speaker's platform.

The electoral act of 1877[2] embodied the above provisions, as does also the existing electoral law in substantially identical language with the above.[3]

1921. The President of the Senate preserves order in the joint meeting for the count of the electoral vote.

In the joint meeting for the count of the electoral vote no debate is allowed, and no question is put by the presiding officer except to either House on a motion to withdraw.

The act approved February 2, 1887,[4] providing for the conduct of the electoral count, specifies:

SEC. 5. That while the two Houses shall be in meeting as provided in this act the President of the Senate shall have power to preserve order; and no debate shall be allowed and no question shall be put by the presiding officer except to either House on a motion to withdraw.[5]

1922. When the two Houses separate to pass on a question arising during the electoral count, there may be two hours of debate, each Member or Senator being confined to five minutes.—The act approved February 2, 1887,[3] establishing a rule for the electoral count, provides:

SEC. 6. That when the two Houses separate to decide upon an objection that may have been made to the counting of any electoral vote or votes from any State, or other question arising in the matter, each Senator and Representative may speak to such objection or question five minutes, and not more than once; but after such debate shall have lasted two hours it shall be the duty of the presiding officer of each House to put the main question without further debate.[6]

1923. When the two Houses separate to pass on an objection to counting an electoral vote, the message that the House is ready to receive the Senate again is sometimes sent by the Clerk without special direction.—On February 12, 1873,[7] during proceedings in the House incident to the determination of objections made in the joint convention to the electoral votes of the State of Texas, Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, moved that copies of the resolutions adopted by the House be communicated forthwith to the Senate.

[6] This provision is taken from the temporary law of 1877 (19 Stat. L., p. 229); but that act provided ten minutes as the limit of debate, instead of five. The joint rule of 1865, while providing for separate action, did not prescribe a rule as to the method of action. (See sec. 1951, footnote, of this work.)

And to this Mr. James A. Garfield, of Ohio, suggested the additional provision that the Senate be informed that the House was ready to receive them.

The Speaker[1] said:

The Clerk intimates that there is no necessity for the order suggested by the gentleman from Ohio. The Clerk makes that notification as a matter of course. * * * If the House has acted on all the business coming from the joint convention the presumption is that the House is ready to receive the Senate.[2]

1924. The House, by formal resolutions, declared that there was no power in Congress or elsewhere to revise or change the result arrived at in the joint meeting for counting the electoral vote of 1877.—On June 14, 1878,[3] Mr. Horatio C. Burchard, of Illinois, offered the following preamble and resolution, which were agreed to under suspension of the rules, there being yeas 216, nays 21:

Whereas, at the joint meeting of the two Houses of the Forty-fourth Congress, convened pursuant to law and the Constitution, for the purpose of ascertaining and counting the votes for President and Vice-President, for the term commencing March 4, 1877, upon counting the votes, Rutherford B. Hayes was declared to be elected President and William A. Wheeler was declared elected Vice-President for such term Therefore,

Resolved, That no subsequent Congress and neither House has jurisdiction to revise the action of such joint meeting, and any attempt by either House to annul or disregard such action, or the title to office arising therefrom, would be revolutionary, and is disapproved by this House.

1925. On June 14, 1878,[4] the House, by a vote of 235 yeas to 14 nays, agreed to the following resolution reported from the Committee on the Judiciary:[5]

Resolved, That the two Houses of the Forty-fourth Congress, having counted the votes cast for President and Vice-President of the United States, and having declared Rutherford B. Hayes to be elected President and William A. Wheeler to be elected Vice-President, there is no power in any subsequent Congress to reverse that declaration, nor can any such power be exercised by the courts of the United States or any other tribunal that Congress can create under the Constitution.

1926. The copies of the electoral votes transmitted to House and Senate in accordance with the law are not among the papers essential at the count.—On December 6, 1888,[6] the Senate discussed the disposition of the

[5] On June 14, 1878 (second session Forty-fifth Congress, Record, pp. 4618, 4619), the Judiciary Committee reported unanimously that, as the electoral vote had been counted by the two Houses of the Forty-fourth Congress, and had declared Hayes and Wheeler elected, "there is no power in any subsequent Congress to reverse that declaration, nor can any such power be exercised by the courts of the United States, or any other tribunal that Congress can create under the Constitution."

This was agreed to by the House, yeas 235, nays 14.

J. Proctor Knott, of Kentucky, dissented from the views of the Judiciary Committee, and submitted his views in the form of a long constitutional argument (second session Forty-fifth Congress, Record, p. 4682). B. F. Butler also dissented in a long argument (second session Forty-fifth Congress, Record, p. 4826).

copies of the official ascertainments of the electors of President and Vice-President, which in accordance with the law are transmitted to the Senate and House. The subject was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, which, on January 31, 1889, through Mr. William M. Evarts, of New York, reported that these certificates had been transmitted in accordance with the law, the requirements of which were completely satisfied by the proceeding. The documents—form no part of those that are by law provided for in respect of the transaction of the count of the votes.

The committee therefore recommended that the papers be deposited in the archives of the Senate.

1927. During the prolonged proceedings of the electoral count of 1877 the House and Senate caused each calendar day to be journalized as a legislative day.—On February 13, 1877,[1] the House and Senate agreed to the following:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That during the sessions of the Commission appointed under the act to provide for and regulate the casting of votes for President and Vice-President and the decision of questions arising therefon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877, each calendar day when legislative business shall have been transacted shall, by each House, when in session, be considered a day for legislative purposes, and the Journals of the two Houses shall be so kept and dated.

11. The count of 1873. Sections 1951, 1952.

1928. Proceedings of the electoral count of 1789. The tellers on the part of the House for this count were appointed by resolution.

At the first electoral count the Senate elected a President pro tempore solely for that occasion.

An instance wherein a Member of the House was intrusted with a message to the Senate.

On April 6, 1789,[1] a message was received from the Senate, brought by Mr. Oliver Ellsworth, a Senator from Connecticut, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I am charged by the Senate to inform this House that a quorum of the Senate is now formed; that a President is elected[2] for the sole purpose of opening the certificates and counting the votes of the electors of the several States in the choice of a President and Vice-President of the United States; and that the Senate is now ready in the Senate Chamber to proceed, in the presence of this House, to discharge that duty. I have also in further charge to inform this House that the Senate has appointed one of its members to sit at the clerk's table to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared, submitting it to the wisdom of this House to appoint one or more of its members for the like purpose.

Mr. Elias Boudinot, of New Jersey, on the part of the House, informed the Senate that the House would attend.[3]

[2] John Langdon, Senator from New Hampshire.

[3] Senate Journal, p. 8.

On motion it was

Resolved, That Mr. Speaker, attended by the House, do now withdraw to the Senate Chamber for the purpose expressed in the message from the Senate; and that Mr. Parker and Mr. Heister be appointed on the part of this House to sit at the Clerk's table with the member of the Senate, and make a list of the votes as the same shall be declared.

The Speaker accordingly left the chair, and, attended by the House, withdrew to the Senate Chamber.

The Senate Journal says:[1]

The Speaker and House of Representatives attended in the Senate Chamber, for the purpose expressed in the message delivered by Mr. Ellsworth, and after some time withdrew.

The Senate proceeded by ballot to the choice of a President of their body pro tempore. John Langdon, esq., was duly elected.

The President elected for the purpose of counting the votes declared to the Senate that the Senate and House of Representatives had met, and that he, in their presence, had opened and counted the votes of the electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, which were as follows: [Here followed tabulation.]

Whereby it appears that George Washington, esq., was unanimously elected President, and John Adams, esq., was duly elected Vice-President of the United States of America.

1929. Proceedings at the electoral count of 1793.

In a case where the Vice-President was also the Vice-President-elect the Senate announced the election of a President pro tempore for the sole purpose of opening the certificates and counting the votes; but it does not appear certain that he acted.

On February 5, 1793,[2] in the House, it was—

Resolved, That a committee be appointed, to join such committee as may be appointed by the Senate, to ascertain and report the mode of examining the votes for President and Vice-President, and of notifying the persons who shall be elected of their election, and to regulate the time, place, and manner of administering the oath of office to the President.

Messrs. William Smith, of South Carolina; James Madison, of Virginia, and John Laurance, of New York, were appointed this committee on the part of the House. On the part of the Senate Messrs. Rufus King, of New York; Ralph Izard, of South Carolina, and Caleb Strong, of Massachusetts, were appointed on this committee.[3]

On February 11[4] the committee reported in both House and Senate the following arrangement, which was agreed to by both Houses, the Senate form differing from the House form in providing for one Senate teller, while the House tellers were two:

That the two Houses shall assemble in the Senate Chamber on Wednesday next, at 12 o'clock. That two persons be appointed tellers on the part of this House, to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared. That the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote and the persons elected to both Houses, assembled as aforesaid, which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected President and Vice-President, and, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the Journal of the two Houses.

The House adopted an order naming the two tellers.[5]

On February 13[1] a message from the Senate by Mr. Otis, their Secretary, announced that a President of the Senate[2] was elected for the sole purpose of opening the certificates, and counting the votes of the several States, in the choice of a President and Vice-President of the United States; and that the Senate was ready, in the Senate Chamber, to attend with the House on that occasion.

The House resolved that Mr. Speaker, attended by the House, do now withdraw to the Senate Chamber, for the purpose expressed in the said message.

The votes having been counted, the Vice-President announced:

George Washington unanimously elected President of the United States for the period of four years, to commence with the 4th day of March next; and John Adams elected, by a plurality of votes, Vice-President of the United States for the same period, to commence the 4th day of March next.[3]

1930. Proceedings at the electoral count of 1797.

At the first electoral count, held in the Hall of the House, the President of the Senate sat at the right of the Speaker, and the Senators on the right of the Hall.

Instance wherein a Vice-President, who was also the President-elect, presided at the electoral count.

On January 31, 1797,[4] the Senate adopted a resolution agreeing to a resolution providing for a joint committee—to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice-President, and of notifying the persons elected of their election, and for regulating the time, place, and manner of administering the oath of office to the President.

The House concurred, and thereafter the resolutions were adopted in form like those agreed to in 1794, except that the Hall of the House of Representatives,[5] instead of the Senate Chamber, was designated as the place of meeting.[6]

The tellers were appointed by resolution of the House.[7]

[5] On February 2, 1881 (Third session Forty-sixth Congress, Record, pp. 1129–1141), during discussion of the resolution providing for the electoral count of 1881, a lengthy discussion was occasioned by a proposition made in the Senate by Mr. John J. Ingalls, of Kansas, that the count be held in the Senate Chamber. It was urged that the Senate Chamber was the rightful place for the count, that it was necessary in having the count in the Hall of the House to transport valuable records—a transportation reputed to have been attended with some peril in the stormy days of the count of 1876—from the Senate to the House, and that in reality the Hall of the Senate was large enough. But Allen G. Thurman, of Ohio, urged that the practice of seventy-odd years—during which no Senator had been maltreated or assaulted in going to and returning from the House—should not be changed. (Record, p. 1131.)

The Senate did not agree to the motion of Mr. Ingalls.

[7] Journal, p. 678.

On February 8 [1] the House directed the Clerk to inform the Senate that the House was ready to "attend them in opening the certificates," etc.

The Senate thereupon attended, the President of the Senate taking his seat on the right-hand of the Speaker, and the Senators seating themselves on the right-hand side of the Chamber.

The President of the Senate [2] addressed the "gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives," stating the purposes of the meeting, and stating that he had received packets containing the votes of all the States, and had received duplicate returns by post from all the States but Kentucky. It had been the practice heretofore, on similar occasions, to begin with the returns from the State at one end of the United States, and to proceed to the other. He should, therefore, do the same at this time. Mr. Adams then presented the packet from Tennessee.

The count having been completed the President of the Senate announced the State of the vote, giving the total votes for each candidate, and then declared:[3]

That John Adams, of Massachusetts, was duly elected President of the United States, for four years, to commence on the 4th of March next; and that Thomas Jefferson, of Virginia, was duly elected Vice-President of the United States for the like term of four years, to commence on the said 4th day of March next, concluding in the following words:

And may the Sovereign of the Universe, the ordainer of civil government on earth, for the preservation of liberty, justice, and peace among men, enable both to discharge the duties of their offices conformably to the Constitution of the United States, with conscientious diligence, punctuality, and perseverance.

The President of the Senate and Members of the Senate then retired.

1931. Proceedings of the electoral count of 1801.

In 1801 the electoral count took place in accordance with arrangements made separately by the two Houses, but identical in essential particulars.

On January 22, 1801,[4] the House appointed the usual committee to join such committee as the Senate might appoint for arranging the preliminaries of the electoral count. On January 27 [5] a message from the Senate announced that that body had agreed to the proposition of the House and had appointed their committee. On February 9 [6] Mr. John Rutledge, of South Carolina, from the committee on the part of the House reported that the committee of the two Houses had taken the subject under consideration, but had come to no conclusion. Very soon thereafter a message was received from the Senate announcing:

The Senate will be ready to receive the House of Representatives in the Senate Chamber, on Wednesday next, at 12 o'clock, for the purpose of being present at the opening and counting of the votes for President of the United States. The Senate have appointed a teller on their part, to make a list of the votes for President of the United States as they shall be declared.

This message was the announcement of the fact that on February 9 the Senate on motion, had agreed to this resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate will be ready to receive the House of Representatives in the Senate Chamber on Wednesday next, at 12 o'clock, for the purpose of being present at the opening and counting the votes for President of the United States. That one person be appointed a teller on the part of the Senate, to make a list of the votes for President of the United States as they shall be declared; that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote, which shall be entered on the journals, and if it shall appear that a choice has been made, agreeably to the Constitution, such entry on the journals shall be deemed a sufficient declaration thereof.

On February 10[1] the House agreed to a resolution of which the latter portion was identical with the latter portion of the Senate resolution, but with the first portion in the following terms:

Resolved, That the House will attend in the chamber of the Senate, on Wednesday next, at 12 o'clock, for the purpose of being present at the opening and counting of the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States; that Mr. Rutledge and Mr. Nicholas be appointed tellers, to act jointly with the teller on the part of the Senate to make a list of votes, etc.

On February 11,[1] at the hour named, Mr. Speaker, attended by the House, went to the Senate Chamber, and the President of the Senate, in the presence of the two Houses, proceeded to open the certificates of the electors of the several States, beginning with the State of New Hampshire. The votes having been read and tabulated, the President of the Senate announced the state of the votes to both Houses, and declared that Thomas Jefferson, of Virginia, and Aaron Burr, of New York, having the greatest number and a majority of the votes of all the electors appointed, and being equal, it remained for the House of Representatives to determine the choice.

The two Houses then separated; and the House of Representatives, being returned to their Chamber, proceeded in the manner prescribed by the Constitution to the choice of a President of the United States.

1932. Proceedings at the electoral count of 1805.—On February 12, 1805,[2] the House passed a resolution authorizing a committee to join such committee as should be appointed by the Senate to ascertain and report a mode of examining the electoral votes, etc. The Senate disagreed to that proposition, and adopted a resolution like that adopted by the Senate in 1801, when propositions for joint action had failed. The House being informed that the Senate declined to take joint action, adopted on their part, on February 13, a resolution like that adopted under similar circumstances by the House in 1801.

On February 13, the Speaker, attended by the House, proceeded to the Senate Chamber, having been informed previously by message that the Senate was ready to receive them.

The two Houses being assembled, the President of the Senate proceeded to open the certificates, and the votes were duly counted. Then the President of the Senate, in pursuance of the duty enjoined upon him, announced the state of the vote to both Houses, and declared that Thomas Jefferson, of Virginia, having the greatest number and a majority of the votes of all the electors appointed, was duly elected President of the United States, for the term commencing on the fourth day of March next; and then the same declaration as to George Clinton, of New York, who was elected Vice-President.

The two Houses then separated, the House of Representatives returning to their Chamber. The Speaker resumed the chair, and the list of votes of the electors as declared by the President of the Senate was read at the Clerk's table.

1933. Proceedings at the electoral count of 1809.

At the electoral count of 1809 an informality in a certificate from one of the States was noticed, but no action was taken in relation to it.

The electoral count of 1809[1] was arranged with the usual preliminaries and forms as seen in the counts of 1813 and 1817.

The House appointed the tellers by an order.[2]

During the count, a Senator noted that the returns from one of the States appeared to be defective, the governor's certificate not being attached to it. Nothing further was done about it, however.[3]

1934. Proceedings at the electoral count of 1813.—The electoral count of 1813[4] took place in accordance with the preliminaries to be noticed in 1817. The House and Senate adopted similar but not identical resolutions, like those of 1817, and the count occurred without unusual incident. Before the proceedings began a message was received from the Senate announcing that the Senate had appointed Mr. Franklin a teller, on their part, in place of Mr. Gaillard, who was indisposed.[5]

1935. Proceedings at the electoral count of 1817.

At the electoral count of 1817 objection was made by a Member of the House rising in his place to the counting of the vote of Indiana.

At the electoral count of 1817 the votes of Indiana were counted although given previous to the admission of the State to the Union.

In 1817 it was held that an objection to the electoral vote of a State might not be debated or considered in the joint meeting; and the two Houses separated for action.

While in joint meeting for counting the electoral vote the two Houses may consider no proposition and perform no business not prescribed by the Constitution.

In the electoral count of 1817 the Speaker presided with the President of the Senate and ruled on a proposition made by a Member of the House.

On February 10, 1817,[6] Mr. Nathaniel Macon, of North Carolina, and Mr. Charles Tait, of Georgia, were appointed members on the part of the Senate to join a committee from the House "to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States, and of notifying the persons elected of their election." In the House Messrs. John G. Jackson, of Virginia, William Irving, of New York, and Timothy Pitkin, of Connecticut, were joined to the committee.

On February 11[1] Mr. Jackson reported to the House this resolution:

Resolved, That the two Houses shall assemble in the chamber of the House of Representatives on Wednesday next at 12 o'clock; that two persons be appointed tellers on the part of this House to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; that the result shall be delivered by the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote and the persons elected to the two Houses assembled as aforesaid, which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected President and Vice-President, and together with a list of votes be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

The resolution reported in the Senate[2] by Mr. Macon and adopted there was in general terms the same as that of the House, but provided that "one person be appointed a teller on the part of the Senate," and made no provision for House tellers, which were provided for in the House resolution.

The manner of appointing the House tellers is not indicated.

It was,

Ordered, That when the Members of the Senate appear to-morrow in the chamber of this House the President of the Senate shall be conducted to the chair by the Speaker; and that the Clerk of the House inform the Senate of these proceedings.[3]

On February 12[4] the House announced by message to the Senate its readiness to receive them in order to proceed with the count, and the Senate attended and took seats in the House, the President of the Senate being received by the Speaker at the chair of the House, the Speaker taking a seat beside him.

The count having proceeded, and the certificates of all the States except Indiana having been opened and read, and the President of the Senate being about to open the votes of that State for the purpose of having them counted, Mr. John W. Taylor, one of the Representatives of the State of New York, rose and objected to the same, and stated that in his opinion the votes of the electors of the said State of Indiana for President and Vice-President of the United States ought not to be received.

The Annals state[5] that Mr. Taylor, in objecting, addressed himself to the Speaker of the House, and that, when he proposed to state his reasons, the Speaker[6] interrupted him and said that the two Houses had met for a specific constitutional duty, and while so acting in joint meeting could consider no proposition or perform any business not prescribed by the Constitution.

Senator Joseph B. Varnum,[7] of Massachusetts, addressing the President of the Senate, expressed his concurrence in the propriety of what had been stated by the Speaker, and, for the purpose of allowing the House of Representatives to deliberate on the question, he moved that the Senate withdraw to their Chamber.

This motion was agreed to, and the Senate withdrew.

In the Senate a proposition was made that the vote of Indiana ought to be counted; but the action of the House being announced before a conclusion was reached the Senate concluded that action on their part was unnecessary.[1]

In the House a resolution was submitted by Mr. Solomon P. Sharp, of Kentucky, in these terms:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the votes of the electors for the State of Indiana for a President and Vice-President of the United States were properly and legally given and ought to be counted.[2]

Mr. John W. Taylor, of New York, moved to substitute for the text of the above the following:

That the votes of the electors of the State of Indiana for President and Vice-President of the United States, having been given previous to the admission of that State into the Union, ought not to be received and counted.

After debate the resolution was postponed indefinitely.

The House then ordered that a message be sent to the Senate to inform them that the House was again ready to receive them and continue opening the certificates and counting the votes of the electors, etc.

The Senate having again attended, the Speaker informed them that the House had not seen it necessary to come to any resolution or take any order on the subject which had produced the separation of the two Houses.[3]

The President of the Senate then opened the certificate of the State of Indiana, and the votes were counted.

The tellers then reported, and the President of the Senate made report of the state of the vote and announced the election of James Monroe, of Virginia, as President, and Daniel D. Tompkins, of New York, as Vice-President.

1936. Proceedings at the electoral count of 1821.

At the electoral count of 1821 arrangement was made for an alternative announcement in case objection should be made to the electoral vote of Missouri, which would not change the result.

At the electoral count of 1821 the Members of the House arose and stood uncovered when the Senate entered the Hall.

At the electoral count of 1821 a committee was appointed to receive the President and Members of the Senate at the door and conduct them to their seats.

Committees of the two Houses acting jointly to devise a plan for the electoral count of 1821, reported different propositions, whereat misunderstandings arose.

The two Houses, by simple and separate resolutions, sometimes appoint committees to confer and report.

On February 6, 1821,[4] in the Senate, Mr. James Barbour, of Virginia, presented a resolution that a committee be appointed "to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives, to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States, and of notifying the persons elected of their election." This resolution was agreed to on February 7, and Messrs. Barbour and Nathaniel Macon, of North Carolina, were appointed the committee on the part of the Senate.

In the House, on February 8,[1] this resolution was agreed to, and Messrs. Henry Clay, of Kentucky; John Sergeant, of Pennsylvania, and Solomon Van Rensselaer, of New York, were appointed of the committee on the part of the House.

On February 13[2] Mr. Barbour reported in the Senate from the joint committee two resolutions, the first being as follows:

Resolved, That the two Houses shall assemble in the Chamber of the House of Representatives on Wednesday next, at 12 o'clock, and the President of the Senate shall be the presiding officer; that one person be appointed a teller on the part of the Senate to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared, that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote, and the persons elected, to the two Houses assembled as aforesaid; which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected President and Vice-President of the United States, and, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

This resolution was agreed to by the Senate and was transmitted to the House.[3] But in the House[4] the Senate text was not considered; but Mr. Clay, from the joint committee, reported a resolution similar in some respects, but differing very essentially in others:

Resolved, That the two Houses shall assemble in the Chamber of the House of Representatives, on Wednesday, the 14th of February, 1821, at 12 o'clock, and the President of the Senate shall be the presiding officer of the Senate, seated on the right of the Speaker of the House, who shall be the presiding officer of the House; that two persons be appointed tellers on the part of the House, to make a list of the votes, etc.

The remainder of the resolution follows verbatim the similar portion of the Senate resolution.

In the debate over the adoption of this resolution the features of allowing the Speaker a place as joint presiding officer and omitting to allow a teller to the Senate do not seem to have been noticed. Later, during the proceedings of the count, the feature relating to the Speaker was discussed, and the debates[5] have this explanation of the change made in the resolution from the form adopted by the Senate:

This alteration was made because it was known that the House of Representatives would not have agreed to the other course, and a collision might have arisen between the two Houses. It may be added that the Senate were not aware, when they came into the Hall, of the change of the arrangement, but supposed it to stand as they had voted it. Their retirement from the Chamber arose from the President of the Senate having learned these facts after he was seated in his place in the Hall. He would otherwise, it is supposed, have gone on to proclaim the result immediately after Mr. Livermore's objection, as prescribed in the resolution.

At the time he presented the resolution Mr. Clay explained[6] that—as convenience rendered it necessary for the Senate to meet this House here in its own Hall, it was due that body, by courtesy and propriety, that the President should be invited to preside, he being the officer designated by the Constitution to perform a certain duty appertaining to the occasion which called the two Houses together.

The resolution was agreed to by the House.

The second resolution was as follows in both the House and Senate forms:[1]

Resolved, That if any objection be made to the votes of Missouri, and the counting or omitting to count which shall not essentially change the result of the election, in that case they shall be reported by the President of the Senate in the following manner: Were the votes of Missouri to be counted the result would be, for AB, for President of the United States ——— votes. If not counted, for AB, for President of the United States ——— votes. But, in either event, AB is elected President of the United States; and in the same manner for Vice-President.

Missouri had not been formally admitted to the Union; and this resolution was debated at length in both Houses. It was finally agreed to in both Houses, the vote in the House being yeas 90, nays 67.

The records do not indicate by what method the tellers on the part of the House were appointed.[2]

On February 14[3] the usual message having been sent to the Senate to inform them of the readiness of the House to proceed with the count, Mr. Clay proposed informally[4] and the House, by general consent, determined that the Members should rise and stand uncovered to receive the Senate, and that seats on the right hand of the Chair should be set apart for the Senators.

Mr. Clay offered this resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to receive the President and Members of the Senate at the door of this House, and to conduct the President of the Senate to the Speaker's chair, and the Senators to the seats assigned for their use.

Objection being made on the ground that it had been usual for the Speaker to receive the President of the Senate and invite him to a seat beside him, Mr. Clay said it was true that the resolution proposed an innovation, but his experience in the chair had convinced him that the regulation would obviate embarrassments.

The resolution was then agreed to, and Mr. Clay and Mr. Mark L. Hill, of Massachusetts, were appointed the committee.

1937. Proceedings at the electoral count of 1821, continued.

In 1821 the electoral vote of Missouri was objected to on the ground that the State was not in the Union, but as the vote was not material to the result the objection was tabled.

In the electoral counts of 1817 and 1821, when a Member of the House objected to the electoral vote of a State, it appears that the House alone acted on the objection.

In the electoral count of 1821 all debate and proceedings not prescribed in the joint rule were held out of order in the joint meeting.

At the electoral count of 1821 the Speaker was made, so far as the action of the House could control, presiding officer of the House portion of the joint meeting, and he did in fact so preside.

The Senate having attended, the count proceeded with the usual forms until the votes of the electors of Missouri were announced by the President of the Senate and handed to the tellers.

Thereupon Mr. Arthur Livermore, of New Hampshire, a Representative, rose and—objected to the counting of any votes given by Missouri for President and Vice-President of the United States of America, because Missouri is not a State in this Union.

A motion was then made by a Member of the Senate that the Senate do now withdraw to its Chamber; and, the question having been put, was decided in the affirmative, and the Senate retired.

It does not appear that the Senate took any action on the objection.[1]

In the House Mr. John Floyd, of Virginia, submitted this resolution:

Resolved, That Missouri is one of the States of this Union, and her votes for President and Vice-President of the United States ought to be received and counted.

After lengthy debates[2] the resolution was, on motion of Mr. Clay, laid on the table.

Then a resolution was sent to the Senate informing them of the readiness of the House to continue the enumeration of the votes of the electors, etc.

The Senate having appeared and taken seats, the President of the Senate, in the presence of both Houses, proceeded to open the certificate of the electors of the State of Missouri, which he delivered to the tellers, by whom it was read and recorded.

And the votes of all the States having been thus counted, registered, and the lists thereof compared, they were delivered to the President of the Senate, by whom they were read.

The President of the Senate having announced the state of the vote, in accordance with the directions of the resolution, and being about to declare the persons elected, Mr. Floyd, of Virginia, addressed the Chair, and inquired whether the votes of Missouri were or were not counted.

Mr. John Randolph, of Virginia, also arose and was addressing the Chair, when the Speaker[3] pronounced Mr. Randolph to be out of order and invited him to take his seat.

There was a demand from the floor that Mr. Randolph be allowed to proceed, and Mr. Floyd asked of the Chair whether or not he was in order.

The Speaker determined that he was not in order at this time, the only business at the present time being that prescribed by the rules.

Order being restored, the President of the Senate proceeded to declare the persons elected President and Vice-President of the United States—James Monroe, of Virginia, and Daniel D. Tompkins, of New York.

As the President of the Senate concluded, Mr. Randolph addressed the Chair, but was required to take his seat.

On motion of a Member of the Senate, the Senate retired.

[3] John W. Taylor, of New York, Speaker.

The House being called to order,[1] Mr. Randolph offered these resolutions:

Resolved, That the electoral votes of the State of Missouri have this day been counted, and do constitute a part of the majority of 231 votes given for President and of 218 votes given for Vice-President,

Resolved, That the whole number of electors appointed and of votes given for President and Vice-President has not been announced by the presiding officer of the Senate and House of Representatives, agreeably to the provision of the Constitution of the United States, and that therefore the proceeding has been irregular and illegal.

The resolutions went over to the succeeding day, when the House declined to consider them.

1938. Proceedings at the electoral count of 1825.

The electoral college having failed to choose a President of the United States in 1825, the House proceeded to elect in accordance with the Constitution.

On February 8, 1825,[2] the report of the joint committee appointed "to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States, and of notifying the persons elected of their election," was made in the Senate in form of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the two Houses shall assemble in the Chamber of the House of Representatives on Wednesday, the 9th day of February, 1825, at 12 o'clock; that one person be appointed teller on the part of the Senate, and two persons be appointed tellers on the part of the House to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce to the two Houses, assembled as aforesaid, the state of the vote and the person or persons elected, if it shall appear that a choice hath been made agreeably to the Constitution of the United States; which annunciation shall be deemed a sufficient declaration of the election of the person or persons elected, and, together with a list of the votes, shall be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

It was stated in the course of the discussion that this was precisely the resolution agreed to on similar occasions from 1805 to 1817, inclusive. The committee on the part of the Senate would have preferred in some respects a different arrangement, but they were overruled by the committee on the part of the House.

Senator John H. Eaton, of Tennessee, proposed this amendment:

If any objection shall arise to the vote or votes of any State, it shall be filed in writing and entered on the Journals of the Senate and House of Representatives, but the two Houses shall not separate until the entire votes are counted and reported, which report shall be liable to be controlled and altered by the decision to be made by the two Houses, after their separation, relative to any objections that may be made and entered on the Journals; provided no objection taken shall be considered valid unless concurred in by the two Houses.

Senators Robert Y. Hayne, of South Carolina, and Martin Van Buren, of New York, opposed this proposition on the ground that the House had failed to act on the bill passed at the preceding session to arrange for all possible contingencies, and it was now too late to take action. So the amendment was disagreed to, and the resolution as reported was agreed to.

In the House[3] the same day the resolution was also agreed to.

On February 9,[4] after the message had been sent to inform the Senate of the readiness of the House to proceed with the count, the Senate appeared, and the President of the Senate "was invited to a seat on the right hand of the Speaker of the House." The Senators were assigned seats together in front of the Speaker's chair. The tellers took seats at the Clerk's table.

The President of the Senate having opened the packets, and the certificates having been read, the results were declared and tabulated.

The tellers then left the Clerk's table and presented themselves in front of the Speaker, and one of their number delivered the report of the votes given, which was then handed to the President of the Senate, who again read it to the two Houses.

This announcement of the state of the vote showed that Andrew Jackson, of Tennessee, had received 99 votes; John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts, 84; William H. Crawford, of Georgia, 41; and Henry Clay, of Kentucky, 37. The President of the Senate[1] then announced—that, neither of the said persons having received a majority of the votes of the electors appointed by the several States to vote for President of the United States, it therefore devolved upon the House of Representatives of the United States to choose a President of the United States, whose term of service is to commence on the 4th day of March next, from the three highest on the list of those voted for by the electors for President of the United States; which three he declared to be Andrew Jackson, of Tennessee, John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts, and William H. Crawford, of Georgia.

The vote for Vice-President was also announced, and John C. Calhoun, having "a majority of the whole number of the votes of the electors appointed in the several States," etc., was declared duly elected.

1939. Proceedings at the electoral count of 1829.—The electoral count of 1829 occurred in the usual way, the preliminaries[2] having been arranged by a joint committee. It does not appear how the tellers on the part of the House were appointed.[3]

On February 11[4] the usual message was sent to the Senate informing them that the House was ready to receive them and to proceed with the count. The Senate presently appeared, the Vice-President at their head, preceded by the Secretary and Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate. The Vice-President took his place at the right of the Speaker, the Senators being seated in the area before the desk. The tellers sat at the Clerk's desk.

The Vice-President presented first the returns from Maine. One package had come by mail and the other by express, and the packets had been certified by the delegation from Maine to contain the votes of that State for President and Vice-President.[5]

The votes having been tabulated the teller on the part of the Senate read the report, and thereupon the Vice-President announced the state of the vote and the persons elected: Andrew Jackson, of Tennessee, President, and John C. Calhoun, of South Carolina, Vice-President.

1940. Proceedings at the electoral count of 1833.—The electoral count of 1833[1] took place in accordance with a resolution in the phraseology[2] of the resolution used in 1825 and 1829, abandoned in 1837 and copied for the last time in 1845. The preliminaries of this count were arranged in the manner usual when no unusual questions were presented.

It does not appear whether or not the Speaker appointed the tellers.

1941. Proceedings at the electoral count of 1837.

In 1837 a joint committee of the two Houses found that several electors were disqualified by reason of holding offices of trust or profit under the United States at the time of their election.

In 1837 the votes of certain disqualified Presidential electors were counted, their number not being sufficient to affect the result and there being doubt as to what tribunal should pass on the qualifications.

At the electoral count of 1837 the vote of Michigan, which was not essential in the result, was given an alternative announcement, as the State had not been admitted to the Union at the time the vote was cast.

After the electoral count of 1837 had shown no choice for Vice-President, the Senate proceeded to elect, in accordance with the Constitutional requirement.

In the earlier practice the House, as the hour for the electoral count approached, sent a message to the Senate announcing readiness to receive the latter body.

On February 1, 1837,[3] the House received from the Senate the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed, to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives, to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States, and of notifying the persons elected of their election, and also to inquire into the expediency of ascertaining whether any votes were given at the recent election contrary to the prohibition contained in the second section of the second article of the Constitution; and, if any such votes were given, what ought to be done with them; and whether any, and what, provision ought to be made for securing the faithful observance in future of that section of the Constitution.

The House agreed to the resolution, and the joint committee was made up as follows: Senators Felix Grundy, of Tennessee; Henry Clay, of Kentucky; Silas Wright, jr., of New York; Representatives Francis Thomas, of Maryland; Churchill C. Cambreleng, of New York; John Reed, of Massachusetts; Henry W. Connor, of North Carolina, and Francis S. Lyon, of Alabama.

On February 4 Mr. Thomas, in the House, submitted a report[4] from the joint committee:

It appears [says the report] that Isaac Waldron, who was an elector in New Hampshire, was, at the time of his appointment as elector, president of a deposit bank at Portsmouth, and was appointed and acting as pension agent without compensation under the authority of the United States; that in two cases persons of the same names with the individuals who were appointed and acted as electors in the State of North Carolina held the offices of deputy postmasters under the General Government.

[4] House Report No. 191, second session Twenty-fourth Congress.

It also appears that in New Hampshire there is one case, in Connecticut there is one case, and in North Carolina there is one case, in which, from the report of the Postmaster-General, it is probable that at the time of the appointment of electors in these States, respectively, the electors or persons of the same names were deputy postmasters. The committee have not ascertained whether the electors are the same individuals who held, or are presumed to have held, the offices of deputy postmasters at the time when the appointment of the electors was made; and this is the less to be regretted, as it is confidently believed that no change in the result of the election of either the President or Vice-President would be affected by the ascertainment of the fact in either way, as five or six votes only would in any event be abstracted from the whole number; for the committee can not adopt the opinion entertained by some, that a single illegal vote would vitiate the whole electoral vote of the college of electors in which it was given, particularly in cases where the vote of the whole college has been given for the same persons.

The committee are of opinion that the second section of the second article of the Constitution, which declares that "no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector," ought to be carried in its whole spirit into rigid execution, in order to prevent officers of the General Government from bringing their official power to influence the elections of President and Vice-President of the United States. This provision of the Constitution, it is believed, excludes and disqualifies deputy postmasters from the appointment of electors, and the disqualification relates to the time of the appointment; and that a resignation of the office of deputy postmaster after his appointment as elector would not entitle him to vote as elector under the Constitution.

Should a case occur in which it became necessary to ascertain and determine upon the qualifications of electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, the important question would be presented, what tribunal would, under the Constitution, be competent to decide? Whether the respective colleges of electors in the different States should decide upon the qualifications of their own members, or Congress should exercise the power, is a question which the committee are of opinion ought to be settled by a permanent provision upon the subject.

The committee, at present and in part, report the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the two Houses shall assemble in the Chamber of the House of Representatives on Wednesday next at 12 o'clock; and the President of the Senate shall be the presiding officer; that one person be appointed a teller on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House of Representatives to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote, and the persons elected, to the two Houses assembled as aforesaid; which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected President and Vice-President of the United States; and, together with a list of votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

Resolved, That in relation to the votes of Michigan, if the counting or omitting to count them, shall not essentially change the result of the election, they shall be reported by the President of the Senate in the following manner: Were the votes of Michigan to be counted, the result would be, for A. B. for President of the United States, —— votes. If not counted for A. B. for President of the United States, —— votes. But in either event, A. B. is elected President of the United States. And in the same manner for Vice-President.

On February 4[1] the resolutions were considered and agreed to by the Senate. It appears from the debate that the act admitting Michigan to the Union had not been passed by Congress when she voted for President, but had been passed before the time for the electoral count. Mr. Clay said that the proceeding in this case was proposed on the same lines as the procedure in the case of Missouri, although the case of Michigan was not precisely that of Missouri or of Indiana.

On February 6[2] the resolutions were agreed to by the House.

On February 8[3] the count occurred. Question arising as to procedure, the Speaker[4] said that the usual course had heretofore been for the House, some short time before the arrival of the hour, to send a message to the Senate informing that body that the House was in readiness to receive them and count the votes. The Chair stated further that, so far as he had been informed, the mode of receiving the Senate by the House was for the Members to stand uncovered. Upon every occasion of this kind, with a single exception, the invariable course had been to send a message to the Senate by the Clerk. In one instance only the message had been transmitted by a committee of two Members of the House, who were also appointed to conduct the Senate into the Hall, but that was a departure from the former practice.

The message was sent to the Senate in the usual form.

The Chair announced that seats on the right of the Speaker's chair had been provided for the accommodation of the Senate.

Shortly after, the Senate entered the Hall, with the President of the Senate, the Hon. William R. King, of Alabama, at their head, preceded by the Secretary and Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, and were received at the door of the Hall and conducted to the seats assigned them by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives. The President of the Senate was seated at the right of the Speaker, and the tellers at the Clerk's desk.

The count proceeded in the usual manner, and the President of the Senate announced [1] the state of the vote for President in accordance with the directions of the resolution, and declared that Martin Van Buren, having received a majority of the whole number of the electoral votes, is duly elected President of the United States, etc.

Then, having announced the state of the vote for Vice-President, the President of the Senate said:

But, in either event, no person has a majority of the electoral votes as Vice-President of the United States, and I do, therefore, declare that, no person having a majority of the whole number of electoral votes as Vice-President of the United States, an election to that office has not been effected, that Richard M. Johnson, of Kentucky, and Francis Granger, of New York, are the two highest on the list of electoral votes, and that it now devolves on the Senate of the United States, as provided in the Constitution, from these persons to elect a Vice-President of the United States.

The Senate [2] having returned to their chamber, Mr. Felix Grundy, of Tennessee, presented the following:

Whereas upon counting the electoral votes, in the presence of both Houses of Congress, given at the late election for President and Vice-President of the United States, it appears that no person has received for the office of Vice-President of the United States a majority of the votes of the whole number of electors appointed, and it also appearing that Richard M. Johnson, of Kentucky, and Francis Granger, of New York, have the two highest numbers on the list of those voted for to fill the office of Vice-President; therefore,

Resolved, That the Senate do now proceed to choose a Vice-President from the said Richard M. Johnson and Francis Granger, they having the two highest numbers on the list, and the manner of voting shall be as follows: The Secretary of the Senate shall call the names of Senators in alphabetical order, and each Senator will, when his name is called, name the person for whom he votes, and if a majority of the whole number of Senators shall vote for either the said Richard M. Johnson or Francis Granger, he shall be declared by the presiding officer of the Senate constitutionally elected Vice-President of the United States for four years, commencing on the 4th day of March, 1837.

[2] Second session Twenty-fourth Congress, Senate Journal, pp. 229, 230; Globe, p. 172.

The Senate, having proceeded by unanimous consent to consider the resolution, concurred therein.

And the roll having been called, it appeared that the whole number of votes were 49, and that of these 33 votes were given in favor of Richard M. Johnson, of Kentucky, and 16 votes in favor of Francis Granger, of New York.

The President of the Senate thereupon declared Richard M. Johnson, of Kentucky, constitutionally elected Vice-President of the United States for four years, commencing on the 4th day of March, 1837.

Mr. Grundy then presented and the Senate agreed to a resolution providing for a committee to notify Mr. Johnson of his election.

1942. Proceedings at the electoral count of 1841.—The preliminaries[1] of the electoral count of 1841 were arranged in the usual way. The resolution[2] directing the mode of ascertaining the result was in the form used in 1837 and from 1849 to 1861, inclusive, and differed from the form of 1845 materially.[3]

The resolution having been adopted in the House; it was Ordered, That Mr. Cushing and Mr. John W. Jones be the said tellers on the part of the House.[4]

On February 10[5] the count took place without incident. The usual message was sent to the Senate informing that body that the House was ready to receive it and proceed in opening the certificates and counting the votes; the President of the Senate on arriving took his seat on the right of the Speaker, the tellers made out their tabulations in duplicate, and the announcement of the persons elected was made as usual.

1943. Proceedings at the electoral count of 1845.—In the electoral count of 1845 the preliminaries[6] were arranged in the usual form, the resolution showing for the last time, however, the following verbiage:[7]

Resolved, That the two Houses will assemble in the Chamber of the House of Representatives on Wednesday, the 12th day of February, 1845, at 12 o'clock; that one person be appointed teller on the part of the Senate, and two persons be appointed tellers on the part of the House, to make a list of the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States, as they shall be declared; that the result be delivered to the President of the Senate, who will announce to the two Houses assembled as aforesaid the state of the vote, and the person or persons elected, if it shall appear that a choice hath been made, agreeably to the Constitution of the United States; which annunciation shall be deemed a sufficient declaration of the person or persons elected; and that the said proceedings, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

The House on February 7,[8]

Ordered, That Mr Burke and Mr. Joseph R. Ingersoll be the said tellers on the part of the House.

The count took place on February 12 without incident.[9]

1944. Proceedings at the electoral count of 1849.

At the electoral count of 1849 the Vice-President ruled that in the joint meeting no other motion or proceeding than that prescribed by the Constitution was in order.

At the electoral count of 1849 the Speaker appointed the tellers on the part of the House without authority expressly given.

A teller appointed for the electoral count may be excused by authority of the House.

The preliminaries[1] of the electoral count of 1849 were arranged in the usual manner. The tellers were appointed on the part of the House, apparently without express permission given to the Speaker by the House.[2]

One of the tellers, Mr. Washington Hunt, of New York, at his request, was excused by the House, and Mr. Washington Barrow, of Tennessee, was appointed.[3]

On February 14,[4] after a message had been sent in the usual form by the House, the Senate appeared and the joint assembly was duly organized.

The returns of the State of Maine were first opened, read, and recorded.

Thereupon Mr. Alexander H. Stephens, of Georgia, a Member of the House, suggested that the reading at length of the returns from each State be dispensed with.

The Vice-President[5] stated that no motion was in order, and no other mode of proceeding could be adopted but that pointed out by the Constitution of the United States; but that the teller might abridge the reports so far as to give merely the results of the electoral ballotings of each State.

1945. Proceedings at the electoral count of 1853.

For the electoral count of 1853 the House authorized the Speaker to appoint the tellers.

At the electoral count of 1853 the Senators and officers participating were seated with especial care as to order.

On January 31, 1853,[6] steps were taken in the Senate which resulted in the appointment of a joint committee on the part of the House and Senate to "ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States, and of notifying the persons elected of their election." This committee later reported the usual resolution,[7] which was agreed to by the two Houses. The Speaker, on motion put and carried,[8] was authorized to appoint the tellers on the part of the House.

[1] The resolution was changed quite materially from the old form of the count four years previous and took the form which it retained until 1865. The committee this year were: Senators, John M. Clayton, of Delaware, Jefferson Davis, of Mississippi, and John Davis, of Massachusetts, and Representatives Hunt, Barrow, McClelland, Truman Smith, and Harmanson. The records do not indicate the reasons for the change. For the full form of this resolution, see the proceedings of the electoral count of 1861, section 1947 of this chapter.

On February 9,[1] the House voted that a message be sent to the Senate informing that body that it was ready to receive it for the purpose of the electoral count, and at 12.30 p. m. the Senate, preceded by Hon. D. R. Atchison, its President pro tempore, and its officers, entered the Hall of the House. The President pro tempore having been conducted to the Chair, the Speaker of the House took a seat on his left, and the Senators occupied the seats assigned them, in the area fronting the Clerk's desk. The Sergeants-at-Arms of the two Houses occupied seats on the platform, at the right and left of the Chair. The tellers took their seats at the Clerk's desk, and were assisted on the right by the Secretary of the Senate and on the left by the Clerk of the House. Subordinate clerks of the Senate and House were seated at a table in front of the Clerk's desk.[2]

The count proceeded without incident, and at the close, by direction of the President pro tempore, the Senate retired.

The Senate having returned to its Chamber, Mr. R. M. T. Hunter, of Virginia, teller on the part of the Senate, reported,[3] by instruction of the tellers, resolutions providing for notification of the candidates. In the House Mr. George W. Jones, of Tennessee, one of the House tellers, offered as "from the joint committee heretofore appointed on that subject" the resolutions of notification.[4]

1946. Proceedings of the electoral count of 1857.

A difficulty was caused during the electoral count of 1857 by the vote of Wisconsin, which was not cast on the day prescribed by law.

During the electoral count of 1857 the President pro tempore held that the joint meeting might not pass on the validity of the vote of a State.

During the electoral count of 1857 it was held that no vote could be taken in the joint meeting, and that no motion calling for a vote was in order.

During the electoral count of 1857, a question arising as to the electoral vote of Wisconsin, a Senator moved and the Senate voted to retire to its own Chamber, whence it did not return.

The joint committee which arranged for the electoral count of 1857 consisted of a larger number of Representatives than Senators, as had been the practice previously in reference to similar committees.

The House authorized the Speaker to appoint the tellers for the electoral count of 1857.

On February 2, 1857,[5] the House received notice that the Senate had appointed three members of a joint committee to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States, and of notifying the persons of their election. Thereupon it was ordered that the House agree to a committee of five members to join the Senate committee.

On February 4,[1] the resolution[2] was reported and adopted in the Senate, and on February 5[3] in the House. As soon as the resolution was agreed to, the Speaker was authorized, a motion being made and carried, to appoint the tellers on the part of the House.[4]

On February 11 the House informed the Senate that it was ready to receive that body for the purpose of making the count, and soon the Senate appeared. The President pro tempore took his seat on the right of the Speaker, and the members of the Senate "took seats provided for them in the area of the House."

The count proceeded, beginning with the State of Maine. When Wisconsin was reached the return showed that the electors of that State cast their votes on December 4 instead of the first Wednesday, which was the 3d, as prescribed by law.

The return of Wisconsin having been presented, Mr. John Letcher, of Virginia, announced his desire to object to counting the vote of Wisconsin.

The President pro tempore[5] held that debate was not in order until the tellers had reported to the convention, and that it would not be in order at the present time to move that the vote of Wisconsin be rejected.

The count being concluded, the tellers announced the state of the vote, counting the five votes of Wisconsin, which had no influence on the result.

Thereupon Mr. Letcher asked if it would be in order to move to exclude the vote of Wisconsin; and Senator John J. Crittenden, of Kentucky, asked if Congress had no power to decide upon the validity or invalidity of a vote.

The President pro tempore said:

> The Chair considers that, under the law and the concurrent order of the two Houses, nothing can be done here but to count the vote by tellers, and to declare the vote thus counted to the Senate and House of Representatives sitting in this Chamber. What further action may be taken, if any further action should be taken, will devolve upon the properly constituted authorities of the country—the Senate or House of Representatives, as the case may be. * * * In pursuance of the order of the two Houses, the Presiding Officer will now announce the vote which has been delivered to him by tellers.

The President pro tempore then announced the state of the vote as reported by the tellers, and declared James Buchanan elected President, and John C. Breckinridge, Vice-President.

Thereupon the point was raised by Mr. Humphrey Marshall, of Kentucky, a Representative, that the President pro tempore had announced and therefore counted the vote of Wisconsin.

Mr. William Bigler, of Pennsylvania, teller on the part of the Senate, announced that he was instructed by the tellers to state to the President and the convention that they had not yet signed the certificate, and that they had determined to sign it only when it set forth all the facts. One of these facts was with reference to the vote of Wisconsin, the vote of that State not having been cast on the day prescribed by law. The certificate which they would sign would set forth that fact.

Protests against the action of the President pro tempore were made by Senators John J. Crittenden, of Kentucky, and Robert Toombs, of Georgia.

Mr. James L. Orr, of South Carolina, moved that the vote of Wisconsin be rejected, and that the tellers be directed not to include it in their report.

Senator Lewis Cass, of Michigan, made the point that no vote could be taken, since who should say whether they were to vote per capita or by States; as representatives of the people or of the States. If they could not vote they could not discuss. The only thing to do was for the two bodies to adjourn to their respective Chambers.

The President pro tempore held:

> It is the opinion of the Presiding Officer that no vote can be taken as a joint vote by the two Houses thus assembled, and that no motion calling for a vote is in order.

The President pro tempore was about to direct that the Senate return to its Chamber, and had so announced, when he reconsidered the order on representation that the tellers had not signed the certificate, and on protests by Senators Toombs, of Georgia, and Stephen A. Douglas, of Illinois, that the tellers must await the decision of the two Houses.

An attempt was made to appeal from the decision of the Chair in excluding the motion of Mr. Orr, but the Chair declined to entertain any motion that would involve a vote of the two Houses.

Senator Lyman Trumbull, of Illinois, submitted a motion that the Senate return to its own Chamber to consider the matter.

The President pro tempore, disregarding a suggestion that he put himself at the head of the Senate and retire without vote, put the question and the Senate agreed to the motion.[1]

Thereupon the Senate, preceded by its President and other officers, retired from the Hall of the House.

The Senate having reached its Hall and come to order, Mr. Bigler, teller on the part of the Senate, proceeded to refer to the events in the joint convention [2] and to present a written report signed by all the tellers and setting forth the state of the vote and the condition of the vote of Wisconsin. [3]

The Senate debated the question two days,[4] beginning with a proposition that there be a conference of the two Houses through the joint committee which reported the resolution governing the count. Then Senator Crittenden proposed a concurrent resolution declaring the vote of Wisconsin null and void. Finally the resolution was laid on the table without division, and the Senate concurred with the House in passing a resolution to constitute a committee to notify the President-elect and Vice-President-elect of their election.

The House, after two days' debate [1] and the presentation of various propositions, finally agreed to the resolution providing for a notification of the President-elect and Vice-President-elect of their election.

1947. Proceedings at the electoral count of 1861.

The House empowered the Speaker to appoint the tellers for the electoral count of 1861.

On February 2, 1861,[2] the House authorized the appointment of a committee of five Members to join a similar committee on the part of the Senate "to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States, and of notifying the persons chosen of their election."

On February 5 [3] Mr. Lyman Trumbull, of Illinois, from the joint committee, reported in the Senate the following resolution, with the statement that it was the usual form adopted "since the foundation of the Government:" [4]

Resolved, That the two Houses will assemble in the Chamber of the House of Representatives on Wednesday, the 13th day of February, 1861, at 12 o'clock, and the President of the Senate shall be the presiding officer; that one person be appointed a teller on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House of Representatives to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote and the persons elected to the two Houses assembled as aforesaid, which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected President and Vice-President of the United States, and, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

On February 5, 1861,[5] the resolution was agreed to by the House, and on motion made from the floor the Speaker was empowered to appoint the tellers.[6]

The count took place under this resolution without unusual incident.[7]

1948. Proceedings of the electoral count of 1865.

At the electoral count of 1865 the Vice-President, in deference to a provision of law, withheld from the joint meeting the returns from the States of Louisiana and Tennessee.

A motion was entertained in the joint meeting for the electoral count of 1865, but only for determination by the Houses separately.

It was held during the electoral count of 1865 that an objection to the vote of a State must be raised at the time of the reading of the certificate.

On February 6, 1865,[8] the House and Senate were in joint convention for counting the electoral vote under the terms of the recently framed Joint Rule 22.[9] The Vice-President[1] having concluded the opening and presentation of returns, announced in response to an inquiry by Senator Edgar Cowan, of Pennsylvania, that he had in his possession returns from the States of Louisiana and Tennessee, but in obedience to the law the Chair held it to be his duty not to submit them to the joint convention. This law[2] was in the form of a joint resolution, and, while the official communication of the President's approval had not been received, the Chair had been apprised of the fact.

Mr. George H. Yeaman, of Kentucky, moved that all the returns before the joint convention be opened and presented for its consideration.

The Chair held that the motion was in order, being pertinent to the object for which the convention had assembled. It came within the latter clause of the joint resolution, which related to "any other question pertinent to the object for which the two Houses are assembled may be submitted and determined in like manner." The Member would reduce his motion to writing, so that the precise question should be in possession of the Senate when it should retire for the determination of the question presented for the consideration of the convention. Each House must determine the question in its own Chamber.

Mr. Nathan A. Farwell, of Maine, a Senator, raised the question of order that the question had already been decided by the two Houses of Congress in passing the joint resolution, which had been approved by the President.

The Vice-President said:

> The fact of the approval of the President is within the knowledge of the Chair, and in consequence of that knowledge the Chair has seen fit to withhold the returns of the States in question. There has been no official promulgation of that approval of the President. Still, in the opinion of the Chair, if either branch of Congress shall be disposed to order the returns now upon the table to be read, it is within their power to do so. The reading of the returns would be one thing; then would arise another question, whether the vote in the return so read should be added to the count of the tellers. In the opinion of the Chair the motion of the Member from Kentucky is in order.

Mr. Yeaman withdrew his motion.

Mr. John V. L. Pruyn, of New York, proposed a motion that the tellers be instructed not to count the votes of the so-called State of West Virginia.

The Vice-President quoted the rule as follows:

> If upon the reading of any such certificate by the tellers, any question shall arise as to the counting of the votes therein certified, etc.,

said:

> The question must be raised when the vote is announced. * * * The Member from New York should have made his motion, in order to come within the rule, at the time the tellers announced the vote of the State of West Virginia.

1949. Proceedings of the electoral count of 1869.

The President pro tempore held, during the electoral count of 1869, that under the terms of the then existing joint rule an objection to the counting of an electoral vote should be in writing and specific.

During the electoral count of 1869 the President pro tempore used his discretion about entertaining points of order, but declined absolutely to entertain appeals.

---

[2] 13 Stat. L., pp. 567, 568.

During the electoral count of 1869 the President pro tempore declined to entertain a resolution offered by a Member of the House.

During the electoral count of 1869 the President pro tempore ruled out of order a motion that the joint meeting adjourn, and after the announcement of the vote the Senate retired without motion.

A provision providing for an alternative announcement of the electoral vote of Georgia caused much disagreement in the electoral count of 1869.

On February 10, 1869,[1] the House and Senate met in joint convention for counting the electoral vote under the terms of the joint rule of 1865 [2] and a special rule adopted for this count.[3] The count had proceeded as far as the State of Louisiana when Mr. James Mullins, of Tennessee, objected to counting the vote of that State.

Mr. George W. Woodward, of Pennsylvania, a Representative, made the point of order that under the joint rule specific objection was required.

The President pro tempore [4] of the Senate, who was the presiding officer, ruled that the objection should be in writing and should assign a reason therefor, in order to conform to the terms of the joint rule.

Mr. Charles A. Eldridge, of Wisconsin, a Representative, raised the question of order that the joint rule under which they were acting was in direct contravention of the terms of the Constitution.

The Presiding Officer declined to entertain the point of order.

The objection to the vote of Louisiana having been presented formally, the Senate retired. The two Houses having passed upon the objections the joint convention reassembled, and the Presiding Officer announced that the two Houses had acted concurrently and the vote of Louisiana would be counted.

[3] On February 8, 1869 (third session Fortieth Congress, Journal, pp. 303, 304; Globe, pp. 972, 976–978), the House and Senate agreed to the following concurrent resolution, based on the action taken in 1821, when there was doubt about the electoral vote of Missouri:

"Whereas the question whether the State of Georgia has become and is entitled to representation in the two Houses of Congress is now pending and undetermined; and whereas by the joint resolution of Congress, passed July 20, 1868, entitled 'A resolution excluding from the Electoral College votes of States lately in rebellion which shall not have been reorganized,' it was provided that no electoral votes from any of the States lately in rebellion should be received or counted for President or Vice-President of the United States until, among other things, such State should have become entitled to representation in Congress pursuant to acts of Congress in that behalf: Therefore,

"Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That on the assembling of the two Houses on the second Wednesday of February, 1869, for the counting of the electoral votes for President and Vice-President, as provided by law and the joint rules, if the counting or omitting to count the electoral votes, if any, which may be presented as of the State of Georgia shall not essentially change the result. In that case they shall be reported by the President of the Senate in the following manner: Were the votes presented as of the State of Georgia to be counted, the result would be, for ——— for President of the United States ——— votes; if not counted, for ——— for President of the United States, ——— votes; but in either case ——— is elected President of the United States. And in the same manner for Vice-President."

[4] Benjamin F. Wade, of Ohio, President pro tempore.

The count then proceeded until the State of Georgia was reached. The certificates having been read, Mr. Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts, a Representative, presented objections, in writing, to counting the vote of the State. These objections alleged that the vote was not cast on the day required by law, that the State had not been readmitted to representation, and that a fair election had not been held.

Mr. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, a Senator, raised the point of order that the objection was not in order, since by special rule for the occasion arrangement had been made for the vote of Georgia.

The Presiding Officer said:

> The Chair is very much disposed to hold the Senate and House of Representatives to their own concurrent resolution. * * * The resolution of the two Houses declared that the vote of Georgia should be announced by the President pro tempore in a certain special way, and stated how that announcement should be made. The Chair is very much disposed to obey the directions of both branches of Congress in this matter.

Mr. Butler proposed that this matter, being one of Constitutional law, should be considered, on appeal, to the House of Representatives.

The Presiding Officer announced that the Senate would retire. The Senate having been called to order,[1] there were presented propositions relating to the objections, one being that the vote should not be counted, another that it should be counted in accordance with the concurrent resolution of the 8th inst., etc. Finally, after discussion, the President pro tempore held that the Senate must proceed in accordance with the terms of the concurrent resolution. Thereupon Mr. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, offered the following resolution, which was agreed to—yeas 37, nays 32.

> Resolved, That under the special order of the two Houses respecting the electoral vote from the State of Georgia the objections made to the counting of the vote of the electors for the State of Georgia are not in order.

This resolution having been agreed to, the President pro tempore raised a question as to what announcement should be made to the joint convention, the two Houses not agreeing. Mr. Roscoe Conkling, of New York, having quoted these words of the Constitution—

> The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted—raised a question as to how the Chair could make the conditional announcement required by the terms of the concurrent resolution.

Thereupon Mr. Jacob M. Howard, of Michigan, offered this resolution:

> Resolved, That the electoral vote of Georgia ought not to be counted.

A point of order was made that under the recent ruling of the President pro tempore the resolution was not in order.

The President pro tempore held that the resolution was in order, it not being for the Chair to decide whether or not the proposition was in conflict with previous action. An appeal having been taken the decision of the Chair was sustained—yeas 28, nays 25.

---

[1] Globe, pp. 1050-1055.

The resolution offered by Mr. Howard was then rejected—yeas 25, nays 34.

In the House of Representatives[1] the Speaker, after having announced and had read the objection, put the question: "Shall the vote of Georgia be counted, notwithstanding the objection of the gentleman from Massachusetts?"

Mr. Charles A. Eldridge, of Wisconsin, raised the question of order that the Presiding Officer had ruled to hold the Joint Convention to the order made by concurrent action of the two Houses, and that the two bodies had separated on the point of order raised by the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. Jones.

The Speaker said:

The Chair overrules the point of order. Questions in regard to the decision of the President of the convention of the two Houses must be submitted to that officer when occupying the chair in that capacity. The point upon which the two Houses separated was the objection of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. John F. Farnsworth, of Illinois, made the point of order that the joint [concurrent] resolution of the two Houses was of higher authority and a later rule than the one ordering that question to be put.

The Speaker said:

The Chair overrules the point of order on the ground that the concurrent resolution devolves no duty on the Speaker of the House at all. It devolves a duty on the President of the Senate in presiding over the joint meeting of the two Houses. * * * It devolves no duty on the Speaker or upon the House of Representatives in its capacity as the House.

Mr. Michael C. Kerr, of Indiana, as a parliamentary inquiry, asked if the propositions submitted by the gentleman from Massachusetts as his objection were capable of division and separate votes.

The Speaker held that they were not.

The question being then taken, it was voted, yeas 41, nays 150, that the vote of Georgia should not be counted.

1950. Proceedings of the electoral count of 1869, continued.

The two Houses having separated for action on an objection during the electoral count of 1869, the House announced to the Senate, by message, its decision.

Disorder arising in the joint meeting during the electoral count of 1869, the Speaker called Members of the House to order and directed the Sergeant-at-Arms to assist.

Mr. Speaker Colfax presided with the President pro tempore at the electoral count of 1869, although he was ascertained by that count to be the Vice-President-elect.

Mr. Speaker Colfax left the chair to participate in debate on a question arising out of the electoral count of 1869.

A proposition in the Senate to censure a Member of the House for conduct in the joint meeting to count the electoral vote.

The Speaker announced that a message would be sent to the Senate informing that body of the action of the House.

[1] Journal, p. 315; Globe, pp. 1058, 1059.

When the joint convention reassembled [1] the President pro tempore, having resumed the chair, said:

The objections of the gentleman from Massachusetts are overruled by the Senate, and the result of the vote will be stated as it would stand were the vote of the State of Georgia counted, and as it would stand if the vote of that State were not counted, under the concurrent resolution of the two Houses.

Mr. Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts, proposed to submit a resolution.

The President pro tempore said:

The Chair declines to receive the resolution. The tellers will make out the statement of the vote as directed.

Mr. Butler appealed and the Chair declined to entertain the appeal. Mr. Butler, having, amid much confusion, insisted on his appeal, the Chair said:

The Chair has decided that an appeal can not be entertained in the joint convention.

Being questioned as to his authority for declining to entertain an appeal, the Chair said:

We are proceeding under a concurrent resolution of both bodies which has declared how the counting and announcement of the votes shall be proceeded with.

The President pro tempore proceeded to direct the tellers to report, after having ruled out of order a motion to adjourn, and having ignored a motion that the convention be dissolved. The confusion became so great that the Speaker of the House, from his place beside the President pro tempore, said:

The Speaker of the House appeals to Members of the House to preserve order. The Sergeant-at-Arms of the House will arrest any Member refusing to obey the order of the President of this convention.[2]

The state of the vote was then announced as provided by the terms of the concurrent resolution.[3]

The President pro tempore then announced that the Senate would retire.

As soon as the Senate had retired, Mr. Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts, rising to a question of privilege, offered a resolution which he subsequently modified to read as follows:

Resolved, That the House protests against the manner of procedure and the order of the President of the Senate pro tempore, in presence of the two Houses, in counting the vote of Georgia in obedience to the order of the Senate only, and against his acts dissolving the convention and the two Houses at his own will as an invasion of the rights and privileges of this House.

Resolved, That the above resolution be, and hereby is, referred to a select committee of five, with leave to report at any time, and report by bill or otherwise.

A long debate [4] arose, in the course of which the Speaker, who left the chair to participate, said: [5]

It is impossible in a joint convention that there should be an appeal from the ruling of the Chair, because it could not be entertained by the presiding officer. There never has been an appeal in any joint convention of Congress. It might have been provided for in the rules, but has been omitted.

* * * There can be no appeal on a point of order in a joint convention of the two Houses for the reason that the Senate, representing the States, and the House of Representatives representing the people of the United States, the convention is made up of different persons, each body representing the same number of people, but by different numbers and in different ways.

Finally, on February 12,[1] the subject was laid on the table, yeas 130, nays 55.

In the Senate, on February 11,[2] Mr. Garrett Davis, of Kentucky, proposed in the Senate a concurrent resolution censuring Mr. Butler, but it does not seem to have been acted on.

1951. Proceedings of the electoral count of 1873.

When an objection is raised to the counting of the electoral vote of a State in the joint meeting, two copies are made of the objection, one for use of the House and the other for the Senate.

During the electoral count of 1873 the joint meeting made, by unanimous consent, orders relating to the reading of the certificates and the consideration of objections.

During the electoral count of 1873 the objection to the vote of Georgia was, by unanimous consent, reserved until objection was made to the vote of Mississippi, when the Houses separated and considered the two.

When, during the electoral count of 1873, the two Houses separated to consider objections, the Vice-President, who had custody of the documents, left with the House duplicates of the electoral certificates.

The former joint rule providing for the electoral count. (Footnote.)

In a message in 1865 the President of the United States disclaimed all right of interfering with the canvassing or counting of the electoral votes. (Footnote.)

On February 12, 1873,[3] the House directed its Clerk to inform the Senate that it was ready to receive that body for the purpose of proceeding to open and count the electoral votes. This was the last count to take place under the twenty-second joint rule.[4] The formalities of assembling being over, by unanimous consent of [4] The twenty-second joint rule provided: "The two Houses shall assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives at the hour of 1 o'clock p. m., on the second Wednesday in February next succeeding the meeting of the electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, and the President of the Senate shall be the presiding officer; one teller shall be appointed on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House of Representatives, to whom shall be handed, as they are opened by the President of the Senate, the certificates of the electoral votes; and said tellers, having read the same in the presence and hearing of the two Houses thus assembled, shall make a list of the votes as they shall appear from the said certificates; and the votes having been counted the result of the same shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall thereupon announce the state of the vote and the names of the persons, if any, elected, which announcement shall be deemed a sufficient declaration of the persons elected President and Vice-President of the United States, and, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

"If, upon the reading of any such certificate by the tellers, any question shall arise in regard to counting the votes therein certified, the same having been stated by the presiding officer, the Senate shall thereupon withdraw, and said question shall be submitted to that body for its decision; and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall, in like manner, submit such question to the House of the joint convention, it was ordered that the reading of the certificates at length should be dispensed with, and that the tellers should make examination and announce whether or not in each case the certificate of the governor of the state accompanied the return.[1]

The count proceeded[2] until the State of Georgia was reached, when an objection was made by Mr. George F. Hoar, of Massachusetts, a Representative. By unanimous consent this objection was reserved and the count proceeded, until an objection was filed to the vote of the State of Mississippi.

The Vice-President[3] then announced that two copies would be made of the objections, one for the House and one for the Senate. The Vice-President also stated that a doubt had been suggested as to the authority of the President of the Senate to leave in the possession of the House any official document in his possession pertaining to the electoral vote. But as the tellers had reported, besides the documents delivered to the Vice-President by messenger, duplicates received by mail, he would, by unanimous consent, leave the duplicates in possession of the House. There being no objection this was done.

The objections having been formally presented, the Vice-President announced that the Senate would withdraw to their Chamber. The Senate accordingly withdrew.

Representatives for its decision. And no question shall be decided affirmatively, and no vote objected to shall be counted, except by the concurrent votes of the two Houses, which being obtained, the two Houses shall immediately reassemble, and the presiding officer shall then announce the decision of the question submitted, and upon any such question there shall be no debate in either House. And any other question pertinent to the object for which the two Houses are assembled may be submitted and determined in like manner."

The next paragraph provides for the seating of the officers and members of the joint convention. The present law embodies this paragraph. (See section 1919 of this work.) The joint rule then continues:

"Such joint meeting shall not be dissolved until the electoral votes are all counted and the result declared, and no recess shall be taken unless a question shall have arisen in regard to counting any of such votes, in which case it shall be competent for either House, acting separately in the manner hereinbefore provided, to direct a recess not beyond the next day at the hour of 1 o'clock p. m."

This joint rule dates from February 6, 1865, when, in the Senate, Mr. Lyman Trumbull, of Illinois, presented it as the report of a joint committee to whom was referred the subject. The first paragraph was similar to the resolution adopted in 1861, but in certain respects differed materially. (See Journal of February 5, 1861, second session Thirty-sixth Congress, p. 273.) The other paragraphs appear to be new. The debate indicates that the new joint rule was proposed to obviate difficulties occasioned by the status of some of the States recently in secession. (Second session Thirty-eighth Congress, Journal, p 200; Globe, pp. 608, 628.) At this time also the House and Senate passed a joint resolution "declaring certain States not entitled to representation in the electoral college." The President signed this joint resolution, but in a message disclaimed all right of the Executive to interfere in the canvassing or counting of the electoral vote. (Journal, p. 213; Globe, p. 711.)

On February 10, 1869, Mr. Speaker Colfax, speaking of Joint Rule 22, said it was adopted in 1865 because it was feared that in the troublous condition of the country there might be a disastrous repetition of the scenes of confusion witnessed during the electoral count of 1857. [3] Schuyler Colfax, of Indiana, Vice-President.

Under the former joint rule for counting the electoral vote the Vice-President held that objection to the vote of a State, even for a Constitutional reason, should be made at the time the vote was opened and counted.

After the two Houses had separately considered objections raised during the electoral count of 1873, they informed one another of their conclusions by message, and the House by message informed the Senate of its readiness to receive them in order to proceed with the count.

At the electoral count of 1873 the Vice-President, in accordance with the previous practice, not only announced the state of the vote, but declared those elected.

The Vice-President held, in 1873, that an appeal might not be taken in the joint meeting for counting the electoral vote.

Later, after the two Houses had acted individually on the objections, after they had transmitted to one another by message copies of the resolutions embodying their respective conclusions,[1] and after the House had further informed the Senate by message that it was ready to receive them "to proceed again with the counting of the electoral votes," the Senate appeared in the Hall of the House and the Vice-President resumed the chair, and after the actions of the two Houses had been reported, said:

Therefore, by the twenty-second joint rule, there being a nonconcurrence between the two Houses upon the three votes cast in the State of Georgia for Horace Greeley for President of the United States, they can not be counted; and in accordance with the same joint rule the vote of Mississippi will be counted.

The tellers having resumed the counting and having reached the State of Missouri, Mr. Oliver P. Morton, of Indiana, a Senator, called attention to the fact that the certificates of the State of Georgia showed that votes had been cast for citizens of that State for both President and Vice-President, in violation of the Constitution, and made the point that an objection on this account, although not made when the returns from Georgia were opened, was in order if made before the final announcement of the counting of all the votes.

The Vice-President held that the objection came too late,[2] under the terms of the joint rule which provided for the settlement of questions arising over the vote of any State.

Mr. Matthew H. Carpenter, of Wisconsin, a Senator, as a parliamentary inquiry, asked if it would be in order to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The Vice-President said:

The Senator himself will see that there could not be an appeal taken in a joint meeting of the two Houses; but if any point can be made on which the two Houses can be required to divide, the Chair will entertain it. The language of the joint rule is so emphatic that the Senator from Wisconsin will see that when a thing is directed to be done at a particular time, it must be done at that time.[3]

[2] Globe, p. 1300.

[3] The present law (24 Stat. L., p. 374; also section 1766 of this work) provides: "The President of the Senate shall have power to preserve order; and no debate shall be allowed and no question shall be put by the presiding officer except to either House on a motion to withdraw."

The count having proceeded, and objections having been made to the counting of the vote of Texas, the Senate withdrew; and, the two Houses having separately passed upon the objections, the joint convention reassembled. The conclusions of the two Houses having been announced, the Vice-President announced that under the rule, the two Houses concurring, the vote of Texas could be counted.

In a similar manner objections to the votes of the States of Arkansas and Louisiana were considered, and the votes of these States were excluded.

The Vice-President, at the conclusion of the count and after he had announced the result, said:

> Wherefore, I do declare that Ulysses S. Grant, of the State of Illinois, having received a majority of the whole number of electoral votes, is duly elected President of the United States for four years commencing, * * *.[1]

A similar declaration was then made as to the Vice-President.

Chapter LX.

THE ELECTORAL COUNTS, 1877 TO 1905.

1. Preliminary inquiry in 1877. Section 1953.
2. The count in 1877. Section 1954.
3. The count of 1881. Section 1957.
4. The count from 1885 to 1893. Sections 1958–1960.
5. The counts from 1897 to 1905. Sections 1961–1963.

1953. The proceedings preliminary to the electoral count of 1877.

In 1877, for the first time, the electoral count was made in accordance with an act passed by the two Houses and signed by the President.

In 1877 the privileges, powers, and duties of the two Houses, respectively, in connection with the electoral count were carefully examined.

A commission consisting of Members of the House and Senate and certain members of the judiciary was provided by law to settle disputed questions relating to the electoral count of 1877.

In 1877 the House and Senate appointed committees to act jointly to devise a method of counting the electoral vote.

An example of a joint report signed by Members of the two Houses.

On December 14, 1876,[1] Mr. J. Proctor Knott, of Kentucky, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported the following preamble and resolutions:[2]

Whereas there are differences of opinion as to the proper mode of counting the electoral votes for President and Vice-President, and as to the manner of determining questions that may arise as to the legality and validity of the returns made of such votes by the several States; and

Whereas it is of the utmost importance that all differences of opinion and all doubt and uncertainty upon these questions should be removed, to the end therefore that the votes may be counted and the result declared by a tribunal whose authority none can question and whose decision all will accept as final: Therefore

Resolved, That a committee of seven Members of this House be appointed by the Speaker, to act in conjunction with any similar committee that may be appointed by the Senate, to prepare and report without delay such a measure, either legislative or constitutional, as may in their judgment be best calculated to accomplish the desired end, and that said committee have leave to report at any time.

[1] Second session Forty-fourth Congress, Journal, pp. 78, 101, Record, p. 197.

[2] The foundation for this report was a resolution relating to the electoral votes, introduced by Mr. George W. McCrary, of Iowa, on December 7. Journal, p. 45; Record, p. 91.

Resolved, That a committee of seven Members be appointed by the Speaker of this House to ascertain and report what are the privileges, powers, and duties of the House of Representatives in counting the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States, and that said committee have leave to report at any time.

The resolutions and preamble were agreed to by the House.

On December 18 a message was received announcing that the Senate had agreed to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the message of the House of Representatives on the subject of the Presidential election be referred to a select committee of seven Senators, with power to prepare and report, without unnecessary delay, such a measure, either of legislative or other character, as may in their judgment be best calculated to accomplish the lawful count of the electoral vote, and best disposition of all questions connected therewith, and a due declaration of the result, and that said committee have power to confer and act with the committee of the House of Representatives named in said message, and report by bill or otherwise.

On December 22[1] the Speaker appointed as the committee to consult with the Senate committee and provide for counting the electoral vote: Messrs. Henry B. Payne, of Ohio; Eppa Hunton, of Virginia; Abram S. Hewitt, of New York; William M. Springer, of Illinois; George W. McCrary, of Iowa; George F. Hoar, of Massachusetts, and George Willard, of Michigan.

The following were appointed members of the Committee on the Powers, Privileges, and Duties of the House: Messrs. J. Proctor Knott, of Kentucky; William A. J. Sparks, of Illinois; J. Randolph Tucker, of Virginia; Levi Maish, of Pennsylvania; Horatio C. Burchard, of Illinois; Julius H. Seelye, of Massachusetts, and James Monroe, of Ohio. Later, on January 12, 1877,[2] Messrs. David Dudley Field, of New York, and William Lawrence, of Ohio, were added.[3]

On January 12,[4] Mr. Knott, from his committee, reporting in part, presented the following:

Resolved, First. That the Constitution of the United States does not confer upon the President of the Senate the power to examine and ascertain the votes to be counted as the electoral votes for President and Vice-President of the United States.

Second. The only power which the Constitution of the United States confers upon the President of the Senate in respect to the electoral votes for President and Vice-President of the United States is to receive the sealed lists transmitted to him by the several electoral colleges, to keep the same safely, and to open all the certificates or those purporting to be such in the presence of the Senate and the House of Representatives.

Third. That the Constitution of the United States does confer upon the Senate and the House of Representatives the power to examine and ascertain the votes to be counted as the electoral votes.

Fourth. That in execution of their power in respect to the counting of the electoral vote the House of Representatives is at least equal with the Senate.

Fifth. That in the counting of the electoral votes no vote can be counted against the judgment and determination of this House of Representatives.

Sixth. That the committee have leave to set again and report hereafter further matter for the consideration of the House.

[3] On January 8 and on January 16 resolutions were adopted enlarging the powers of the committee so as to investigate alleged disabilities of electors and to send for persons and papers. Journal, pp. 178, 240; Record, pp. 489, 666.

[4] Journal, p. 215; Record, p. 609. House Report No. 100.

In support of their resolutions the committee gave no reasons.[1] The minority,[2] after giving their views at length,[3] submitted the following propositions, as expressing more accurately the nature of the constitutional count, and privileges, powers, and duties of the House in relation to it:

1. That the count required to be made upon opening the certificates is a ministerial duty.

2. That the so-called twenty-second joint rule is not now in force, so as to require the proceedings at the count to be conducted under its provisions.

3. That it is the duty and privilege of the House to attend with the Senate at the opening of the certificates transmitted to the President of the Senate by the electors appointed by the several States and to appoint tellers to make lists of and register and compute the votes as declared.

4. That the House, conjointly with the Senate, has power to examine the votes upon opening the certificates and to agree with the Senate upon a mode of doing so.

5. That the privileges, the powers, and the duties of the House of Representatives, in the matter of the electoral votes for President and Vice-President, are no more and no less than those of the Senate.

The minority conclude by recommending these resolutions:

Resolved, First, That it is the power and duty of the House, conjointly with the Senate, to provide by law or other constitutional method a mode for fairly and truly ascertaining and properly counting the electoral vote of each State, so as to give effect to the choice of each State in the election of President and Vice-President.

Resolved, Second, That in the absence of legislative provision on the subject or authoritative direction from the Senate and House of Representatives, the President of the Senate, upon opening the certificates, declares and counts the electoral votes for President and Vice-President of the United States.

The minority gave, in support of their conclusions, a history of the proceedings in the various countings of electoral votes since the formation of the Government.

The report was debated on January 18, and thereafter until January 25, when the bill to regulate the count was taken up. On January 31 the report was postponed, the bill having meanwhile passed, and the questions involved being disposed of thereby.[4]

The committee appointed by the Speaker "to act in conjunction with any similar committee that may be appointed by the Senate," reported on January 18, 1877.[5] The report is in the form of a joint report, beginning "The committees of the Senate and House of Representatives, appointed under the following several resolutions, etc., beg leave to report to their respective Houses." At the conclusion the report is signed by Messrs. H. B. Payne, of Ohio; Eppa Hunton; of Virginia; Abram S. Hewitt, of New York; William M. Springer, of Illinois; George W.

The committee say that after "a full and free conference with each other thereon" they report an accompanying bill,[1] in substance providing:

1. Provisions for the meeting of the two Houses, as required by the Constitution and the general course of proceeding, and the declaration of the result.

2. Provisions for the disposition of questions arising in respect of States from which only one set of certificates has been received; that each House shall consider the question, and shall only decide against a vote by concurrent affirmative action.

3. Provisions for so-called double returns from a State; that such conflicting returns and papers shall be submitted to the consideration of a commission, composed of equal numbers of Members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives and of the Supreme Court of the United States; that this commission shall be organized and sworn, and have power to consider and decide according to the Constitution and law what is the constitutional vote of the State in question, and that such decision shall govern the disposition of the subject unless both Houses shall determine otherwise.

4. It is provided that the act shall not affect either way the question of the right of resort to the judicial courts of the United States by the persons concerned as claimants to the offices in question.

The bill[2] provided that the judges on the commission should be those then assigned to the first, third, eighth, and ninth circuits, and a fifth to be selected by those four. The Members from the House and Senate were to be elected in each body by viva voce vote. The bill also provided carefully for the meetings of the two Houses, the preserving of order, the seating of Members and officers of the joint convention, the conduct of debate, appointment of tellers, etc. Many of the details were arranged in accordance with the old custom of the two Houses as presented by the former joint rule No. 22.[3]

On January 25 the House received the bill from the Senate, debated it, passed it on the succeeding day, and on January 29 notice of its approval by the President was received.[4]

Proceedings under the terms of the bill began thereafter.

In 1877 objections to the counting of the electoral vote of a State were referred by law from the joint meeting to the Electoral Commission.

In 1877 the Speaker appointed the tellers for the electoral count without special authority from the House, and named them all from the majority party, a course which was followed by the President pro tempore.

The question of taking recesses arose under the law providing for a continuous legislative day during the electoral count of 1877.

On February 1, 1877,[1] the Speaker appointed Messrs. Philip Cook, of Georgia, and William H. Stone, of Missouri, tellers on the part of the House for the electoral count.

Mr. John A. Kasson, of Iowa, having made the point that the minority was not represented in this appointment, the Speaker said that he had made the appointment under the authority of the House, and had communicated with the President of the Senate, who would appoint the two tellers of that body from the majority. The proceedings of the Senate show that the President pro tempore[2] of that body had intended to appoint one Republican and one Democratic teller, but upon receiving the message announcing the appointment of two Democrats in the House. he appointed two Republicans.

Also on February 1,[3] by unanimous consent, the Speaker laid before the House a letter from the President of the Electoral Commission, stating that the members had met, taken the oath, and were ready for the performance of their duties.

Very soon thereafter the House passed a resolution directing the Clerk to inform the Senate that the House was ready to receive that body for the purpose of proceeding to open and count the votes of the electors of the several States for President and Vice-President.

The Senate having attended, the returns of the States were opened by the President of the Senate in alphabetical order, and read and counted by the tellers in accordance with the law, when the State of Florida was reached. There being more than one paper purporting to be a certificate of the vote of that State, these papers, together with objections presented to the counting of the vote of Florida, were referred to the Electoral Commission.

On February 10,[4] the Speaker laid before the House a communication from the President of the Electoral Commission announcing that it had considered the matters submitted, and had transmitted its decision to the Senate. The House, which under the terms of the act had not adjourned since February 1 (recesses having been taken), directed the Clerk to inform the Senate that the House would be prepared to receive them at 1 o'clock for the purpose of proceeding further with the count of the electoral vote.

Messrs. Eugene Hale, of Maine, and James Wilson, of Iowa, objected that under the terms of the law—"whereupon the two Houses shall again meet"—the meeting should be at once and should not be put off until 1 o'clock; but the motion for the recess was agreed to nevertheless.[5]

The Senate having attended, the President of the Senate, having taken the Speaker's chair, announced that the joint meeting had resumed its session, and presented the report of the Commission, which was signed by a majority, and it was read by the Secretary of the Senate.[1]

Thereupon, the Presiding Officer having asked for objections, Mr. David Dudley Field, of New York, presented objections, duly signed in accordance with the requirements of law, to the decision of the Commission.

The Presiding Officer having asked for further objections, and none being presented, the Senate thereupon withdrew to their Chamber, and the House resumed its session.

Then Mr. William P. Lynde, of Wisconsin, at 1.18 p. m. (Saturday, Feb. 10), moved that the House take a recess until 10 o'clock a. m., Monday morning, February 12.

Mr. Eugene Hale, of Maine, made the point of order that, under the provisions of the electoral law, a recess could not be taken.

After debate the Speaker overruled the point of order, saying:[2]

The gentleman from New York (Mr. George G. Hoskins) alluded to that portion of section 5, which reads: "Such joint meeting shall not be dissolved until the count of electoral votes shall be completed and the result declared."

The Chair thinks that portion of the act has no pertinency whatever to the question now before the House. The portion of the act to which the Chair desires first to direct the attention of the House is embraced in section 4, which reads as follows:

"That when the two Houses separate to decide upon the objection that may have been made to the counting of an electoral vote or votes from any State, or upon objection to a report of said Commission, or other question arising under this act, each Senator and Representative may speak to such objection or question ten minutes, and not oftener than once; but after such debate shall have lasted two hours it shall be the duty of each House to put the main question without further debate."[3]

Under that directory clause of the act, the Chair thinks that at no later time than the time when the motion was made would such motion to take a recess be in order. That is to say, if the debate had been entered upon, then the clause of the law last quoted is clear and distinct that a vote shall be taken.

The Chair would also direct attention to that portion of section 5 which reads as follows:

"And no recess shall be taken unless a question shall have arisen in regard to counting any such votes, or otherwise under this act, in which case it shall be competent for either House, acting separately, in the manner hereinbefore provided, to direct a recess of such House not beyond the next day, Sunday excepted, at the hour of 10 o'clock in the forenoon."[4]

It is the fact that this is the first time when a question has arisen such as is alluded to and spoken of in that clause of the act. The question having arisen now for the first time, the Chair thinks it is competent for this House, if in their judgment it shall be expedient, to now take a recess, but only until the next day at 10 o'clock in the forenoon, Sunday excepted.

Mr. Hale having appealed, the appeal was laid on the table—ayes 156, noes 76.

The motion to take a recess was then agreed to—yeas 162, nays 107.

[3] In all the respects affected by this ruling this section is the same as section 6 of the present law. Although differing in phraseology the two are substantially the same, except that debate is limited to five-minute speeches. See section 1922 of this work, and also 24 Stat. L., p. 375.

[4] This is identical with the present section of law, except that the word "calendar" has been inserted before "day."

1955. Proceedings of the electoral count of 1877, continued.

The electoral law of 1877 providing for putting "the main question without debate," the Speaker held that this admitted any motions pertaining to the main question.

During the electoral count of 1877 the Speaker held that the House alone might not refer a matter to the Electoral Commission.

During the electoral count of 1877 the President pro tempore declined to entertain a motion that the joint meeting take a recess.

During the electoral count of 1877, when the proceedings were prescribed by law, the Speaker ruled that a motion interfering with the promptness of those proceedings was dilatory.

On February 12,[1] after the recess, the House met and Mr. David Dudley Field, of New York, submitted the following:

Ordered, That the counting of the electoral votes from the State of Florida shall not proceed in conformity with the decision of the Electoral Commission, but that the votes of Wilkinson Call, James E. Yonge, Robert B. Hilton, and Robert Bullock be counted as the votes from the State of Florida for President and Vice-President of the United States.

Mr. Eugene Hale, of Maine, moved an amendment to provide that the counting of the votes should proceed in conformity with the report of the Commission.

Mr. J. Proctor Knott, of Kentucky, then offered an amendment in the nature of a substitute, providing, after reciting in a lengthy preamble certain alleged conditions, that "the decision of the said Commission, and the grounds thereof," be "remanded and recommitted to the same Commission with the request that the same be so corrected and explained to this House," etc.

Mr. Hale made the point of order that under the terms of the law the substitute was not in order, and Mr. James Wilson, of Iowa, the further point of order that nothing could be referred to the Commission without concurrent action of the two Houses.

After debate the Speaker said:[2]

The gentleman from Maine, in making his point of order, refers the Chair to two portions of the law—a part of the second section which he read—as follows:

"Whereupon the two Houses shall again meet, and such decision shall be read and entered in the Journal of each House, and the counting of the vote shall proceed in conformity therewith, unless, upon objection made thereto in writing by at least five Senators and five Members of the House of Representatives, the two Houses shall separately concur in ordering otherwise, in which case such concurrent order shall govern"

And the whole of the fourth section as follows:

"That when the two Houses separate to decide upon an objection that may have been made to the counting of any electoral vote or votes from any State, or upon objection to a report of said Commission, or other question arising under this act, each Senator and Representative may speak to such objection or question ten minutes, and not oftener than once; but after such debate shall have lasted two hours, it shall be the duty of each House to put the main question without further debate."[3]

That portion of the law read which really relates to the question of order raised by the gentleman from Maine, it occurs to the Chair, is embraced in the following clause:

"But after such debate shall have lasted two hours it shall be the duty of each House to put the main question without further debate."

[2] Journal, p. 422; Record, p. 1492.

[3] This clause is substantially the same as that of the present law, except that the time of debate is fixed at ten minutes instead of five. (See section 1922 of this work.)

Upon the question involved in that point of order the Chair will presently rule. But in stating that proposition another point of order has cropped out. In fact, the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. Wilson, indicates his purpose to raise the point of order whether it is competent for this House, either under the law or under the rules of the House, to commit to an outside commission which is embraced in the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky. The Chair therefore desires in a measure to consider this subject in its two aspects; because, of course, the gentleman from Iowa, as soon as the point of order of the gentleman from Maine shall have been decided, will be entitled to raise his point of order. The language of the law is:

"It shall be the duty of each House to put the main question without further debate."

The Chair thinks the amendment or substitute of the gentleman from Kentucky could not be excluded under that language. The main question, in law and parliamentary proceedings, embraces all questions upon which the previous question can be seconded[1] and the main question ordered; and in any proceeding in this House, therefore, it would be competent for the main question to embrace, first, the original proposition, next, an amendment to the original proposition to perfect the matter of it, and, third, a substitute for both. The Chair overrules the point of order. * * *

The Chair is unable to find anything in the law which permits a recommittal of the question back to the Commission. Nay, more; the Chair continues to hold, as it has been intimated he has heretofore ruled, that it is not competent for one House to refer a bill or any matter to an outside commission. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from Iowa.

After two hours of debate the question was put on Mr. Hale's amendment, which was disagreed to. The resolution of Mr. Field was then agreed to.

The House having ordered the Clerk to—inform the Senate of the action of the House and that the House is now ready to meet the Senate in this Hall to proceed with the counting of the electoral votes for President and Vice-President—the Senate, at 2 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m., attended in the Hall of the House.[2]

The President of the Senate, having taken the Speaker's chair and announced that the joint meeting of Congress for counting the electoral votes for President and Vice-President resumed its session, he further announced that the two Houses separately had considered and determined the objection submitted by Mr. Field to the decision of the Commission upon the certificates from the State of Florida.

The Secretary of the Senate thereupon read the decision of the Senate thereon, and the Clerk of the House read the decision of the House.

The Presiding Officer thereupon announced that, the two Houses not concurring in ordering otherwise, the decision of the Commission would stand unreversed and the counting of the electoral votes would now proceed, in conformity with the decision of the Commission.

The tellers thereupon announced that the State of Florida cast 4 votes for Rutherford B. Hayes, of Ohio, for President, and 4 votes for William A. Wheeler, of New York, for Vice-President.

Certificates of other States were then opened, and the votes counted without objection until the State of Louisiana was reached. Thereupon proceedings took place similar to those in the case of Florida, and the question was referred to the Commission, as in the case of Florida.

On Saturday, February 17, 1877,[3] a letter was received from the President of the Commission informing the House that it had reached a decision and had transmitted it to the President of the Senate.

Mr. L. Q. C. Lamar, of Mississippi, offered a resolution, which was agreed to—yeas 152, nays 111—directing the Clerk to notify the Senate that the House would receive the Senate at 11 a. m. Monday for the purpose of proceeding with the count. This resolution was adopted, after the point of order had been made that the Secretary of the Senate was at the door with a message relating to the subject under consideration.

Louisiana having been disposed of in accordance with the provisions of the law, the count proceeded until Michigan was reached. While the joint convention was sitting in the case of Michigan the subject of a recess was mentioned, whereat the Presiding Officer[1] said:[2]

The Chair can not entertain a motion to take a recess.

The case of Michigan was determined by the two Houses without reference to the Electoral Commission.

Michigan and Nevada having been counted, Oregon was reached, and on February 24, 1877, the House was considering the report of the Electoral Commission on the vote of that State. A motion for a recess until 10 o'clock on Monday morning having been voted down, Mr. Lafayette Lane, of Oregon, moved that a recess be taken until 9.30 o'clock Monday.

Mr. Eugene Hale, of Maine, made the point of order that the privilege of the House to take a recess had been exhausted by the first motion for a recess, and that the second motion was dilatory.

The Speaker sustained the point of order, saying:[3]

The Chair is unable to classify it in any other way. Therefore he rules that when the Constitution of the United States directs anything to be done, or when the law under the Constitution of the United States enacted in obedience thereto directs any act by this House, it is not in order to make any motion to obstruct or impede the execution of that injunction of the Constitution and the laws.

The Oregon case having been settled after reference to the Commission, and the Pennsylvania case by the two Houses, objection was made in the joint convention to the certificate from Rhode Island, and the two Houses, on February 26, separated to reach a determination.

The House having been called to order, a motion was made for a recess, and decided in the negative.

Mr. Fernando Wood, of New York, having moved to reconsider this vote and lay that motion on the table, and an inquiry having been made in relation thereto, the Speaker said:[4]

The Chair recognizes as in order the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to take a recess. The gentleman from New York makes that motion and then moves to lay it on the table, the evident object being to prevent a vote being taken on the motion to reconsider. It is well known in parliamentary practice as a clinching motion to prevent further delay.

1956. Proceedings of the electoral count of 1877, continued.

Construction of the law providing for putting the main question without debate during the electoral count.

In the joint meeting for the electoral count of 1877 a Member of the House raised a question as to the presence of a quorum of the Senate, but it was disregarded by the President pro tempore.

During the electoral count of 1877 a Member of the House was permitted, by unanimous consent, to make to the joint meeting a statement relating to an unofficial return.

In 1877 the President pro tempore declined to receive an unofficial certificate of the electoral vote of Vermont, presented in the joint meeting by a Member of the House.

In the joint meeting for the electoral count of 1877 the President pro tempore declined to entertain either a resolution or an appeal.

The two Houses having separated to pass on an objection raised during the electoral count of 1877, the Speaker decided that the right to prior recognition belonged to the Member who had raised the objection in the joint meeting.

The House having reached a determination as to the counting of the vote of the disputed elector in Rhode Island, Mr. James Wilson, of Iowa, moved that the Senate be notified of the action of the House, and that the House was ready to meet that body in joint session.[1]

Mr. J. Proctor Knott, of Kentucky, moved an amendment which provided that the time when the House should be ready to meet the Senate should be 10 a. m. the next day.

Mr. George W. McCrary, of Iowa, made the point of order that the law provided that the Houses should "immediately again meet."[2]

The Speaker said:

> The Chair thinks the law does bear the construction which the gentleman from Iowa puts upon it, that when the two Houses have voted they shall immediately again meet. The Senate has notified the House of its action in the case of the Rhode Island elector, and that it is ready to meet this House in joint meeting. The House has voted on the same question, and the only remaining duty under the law is for the two Houses to meet immediately. The amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky is therefore ruled out.

The question arising in relation to the Rhode Island elector having been decided without reference to the Commission, the count proceeded until South Carolina was reached. A question arising, it was referred to the Commission, whose report was before the joint convention on February 28, 1877.[3] During the proceedings of the joint convention while the actions of the two Houses separately were being announced, Mr. Thomas L. Jones, a Member of the House from Kentucky, raised a question as to whether or not a quorum of the Senate were present.

[2] These are the words of the present law. See section 1918 of this work.

[3] Journal, pp. 570, 571; Record, p. 2021.

Mr. N. P. Banks, of Massachusetts, made the point that this was a question not for the convention but for the Senate alone.

Although Mr. Jones protested against continuing without the ascertainment of the question raised by him, the Presiding Officer disregarded his protest and inquiry,[1] saying that debate was not in order.

The vote of South Carolina having been counted, and the count having proceeded, Vermont was reached, and the certificate from that State was read.

Pending the presentation of objections to the counting of this vote, Mr. Abram S. Hewitt, of New York, was permitted by unanimous consent to make a statement in relation to a package purporting to contain the electoral vote of Vermont, which had been sent to him and which he tendered to the Presiding Officer.

The Presiding Officer having stated that his duty was only to receive and open and have read certificates received up to and on the first Thursday of February, the package tendered by Mr. Hewitt was not received.[1]

Thereupon Mr. William M. Springer, of Illinois, proposed to offer a resolution in relation to "a question arising under this act," quoting the words of the electoral act.

The Presiding Officer stated that if the Member from Illinois submitted an objection to the certificate the Chair would entertain it, but could not entertain a resolution. The Chair further held that he could not permit anything to be read except a properly signed objection.[2]

Mr. Springer having appealed, the Presiding Officer declined to entertain the appeal.[3]

Objections having been offered and read, Mr. Springer, demanded the reading by the tellers of the return referred to by Mr. Hewitt, which had been presented with the objections.

The Presiding Officer declined to have the return read, or to consider it as a second return received by him within the meaning of the law relating to reference to the Electoral Commission.

The joint convention having dissolved, and the House on March 1[4] having reassembled, Mr. Earley F. Poppleton, of Ohio, claiming the floor as an objector in the joint convention, and being recognized, presented a preamble reciting the facts attending the presentation of the package by Mr. Hewitt in the joint convention, alleging that the package, although made a part of the objection, had not been opened by the Presiding Officer in the convention, but had been retained by him; and resolving as follows:

That the refusal of the President of the Senate to open, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, said sealed package purporting to be the electoral vote of the State of Vermont, was a violation of law and of the privileges of this House, and that until said package shall be opened pursuant to law in the presence of the two Houses of Congress, the counting of the votes can not further proceed,

[1] Record, p. 2021.

[2] The provisions of law in regard to objections were the same as at present. Compare sec. 1 of act of 1877 (19 Stat. L., p. 227) with present law. See section 1918 of this work.

according to the Constitution and law now in existence for the counting of said electoral votes for President and Vice-President of the United States.

Further, that the Clerk of this House inform the Senate of the adoption of the foregoing preamble and resolution, and request the Senate to meet this House in joint session, to the end that said package purporting to be a certificate of the electoral vote of Vermont be opened by the President of the Senate, and that the proceedings thereafter be held according to law.

Mr. Fernando Wood, of New York, made the point of order that under the provisions of the electoral law[1] no business of any kind was in order except to proceed to consider the objections made in the joint convention.

After the debate the Speaker said:[2]

The Chair desires to say that, with great respect for all the parties concerned, he considers that a grave mistake and wrong was committed yesterday in the joint meeting of the two Houses in this, that the presiding officer refused to receive, even for opening and reading for information, a package which had all the surroundings of an authentic and duly attested paper in relation to an electoral vote of the State of Vermont. The Chair, in one aspect of this case, thinks that he would be called upon to rule that the action of the presiding officer of the joint convention on yesterday was wrong. He does not think that he possesses that power; neither in a technical sense, as he understands it, does he believe that the action of the joint convention can be reviewed in this House in the manner proposed. And yet there is above all a fact upon which this matter rests, and that fact is, whether this House shall have possession of that paper; and to that extent, and that extent only, the resolution offered by the gentleman from Ohio, in so far as it requests the return of that paper from the Senate, which, as the allegation in the preamble stated, was taken away from here in an undue manner, that this proposition is in order.

Mr. Poppleton having modified his resolution in accordance with the decision of the Chair, Mr. Fernando Wood, of New York, submitted as an amendment, in the nature of a substitute, this proposition:

That the vote of Henry N. Sollace, claiming to be an elector from the State of Vermont, be not counted.

Mr. J. Proctor Knott, of Kentucky, offered as a further substitute, which was considered as pending, a resolution that the House require that the President of the Senate open the package in the presence of the two Houses; that the same, if found to be a certificate as purported, be submitted to the Electoral Commission, and that the House would not meet the Senate to proceed with the counting of the electoral vote until the Senate should join in this order.

After debate, interrupted by great confusion, had proceeded for a time Mr. Abram S. Hewitt, of New York, rising in his place, announced that a messenger had just approached him and tendered him the package in question. Mr. Hewitt said he did not know who the messenger was, but he was present, standing near the Speaker. As to the message, Mr. Hewitt said it was not his, and he had no custody of it.

The Speaker said that if there was no objection on the part of the House the Chair would receive the package.[3]

[1] The provisions of that law were identical with those of the present law, and are that when the objections are made the Senate shall withdraw, and the Speaker shall submit the objections to the House. See section 1918 of this work.

[2] Journal, p. 590; Record, p. 2032.

[3] Record, p. 2037

Objection being made, Mr. William D. Kelley, of Pennsylvania, asked that the messenger be interrogated as to whence the package came.

The Chair ruled that this would not be in order.

The question being taken on the resolution proposed by Mr. Knott, it was disagreed to, yeas 116, nays 148.[1] A resolution similar to Mr. Knott's, except as to the declaration that the House would not meet the Senate to proceed with the electoral count, was next presented and decided in the negative, yeas 115, nays 147, the previous question having been ordered.

Mr. Ansel T. Walling, of Ohio, moved that the pending resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. George W. McCrary, of Iowa, made the point of order that the motion was not in order under the electoral law.

The Speaker, after declaring that an order for the main question to be put did not preclude a motion to lay on the table,[2] said:

> The law[3] reads as follows:
> "But after such debate shall have lasted two hours, it shall be the duty of each House to put the main question without debate."
> Now, the Chair thinks that any motions which are allowed by the rules of the House, and which pertain to the main question, are allowable at any period of the progress of the main question.[4]

The motion to lay on the table being entertained and decided in the negative, a motion was made to reconsider the latter vote.

Mr. Fernando Wood having made the point of order that the motion was dilatory, the Speaker overruled the point of order, holding it to be a motion which, under the rules, pertained to the main question.[5]

The resolution offered by Mr. Fernando Wood as an amendment was then agreed to, yeas 208, nays 17; and then the resolution of Mr. Poppleton as thus amended was agreed to, after the Speaker had ruled out of order as dilatory both a motion to excuse a Member from voting and an appeal from that decision.[6]

At this point Mr. William J. O'Brien, of Maryland, claimed the floor to submit a resolution notifying the Senate of the action of the House.

The Speaker quoted the law—

> When the two Houses have voted, they shall immediately again meet, and the presiding officer shall then announce the decision of the question submitted.[7] and stated that as the House had been notified of the action of the Senate, he should consider the terms of the act mandatory and ministerial, and should direct the Clerk to notify the Senate that the House was now ready to meet the Senate.

The vote of Vermont was next counted in the joint convention under the provisions of the law, and the count proceeded until Wisconsin was reached. Objection being made to the vote of that State, the two Houses separated, and the House resumed its session.[1]

Question arising as to right to recognition, the Speaker said that he was bound in reality to recognize the gentleman who in the joint convention had presented the objection.

Mr. Roger Q. Mills, of Texas, having proposed as a question of privilege a preamble and resolution, reciting that through fraudulent returns Messrs. Tilden and Hendricks were not receiving by the electoral count the majority to which they were entitled, and providing that the House should proceed immediately, in obedience to the Constitution, to choose a President, the Speaker[2] held that the only way in which this proposition could be offered would be in the form of an amendment in the nature of an objection. In the first place, the Chair would have to recognize the gentleman making the objection in joint convention to offer the usual motion in relation to the objection.

The House acted on the objections to the vote of Wisconsin; and, the convention having reassembled, that vote was counted.[3]

The Presiding Officer thereupon announced the conclusion of the counting of the electoral votes of the thirty-eight States of the Union in conformity with the act entitled, "An act," etc., and directed the tellers to ascertain and report the result.

The Hon. William B. Allison, a Senator from the State of Iowa, one of the tellers, thereupon announced the result by States and the totals.

The Presiding Officer thereupon said:

The whole number of electors appointed to vote for President and Vice-President is..... 369
Of which a majority is..... 185

The state of the vote for President of the United States as delivered by the tellers, and as determined under the act of Congress approved January 29, 1877, is:

For Rutherford B. Hayes, of Ohio..... 185
For Samuel J. Tilden, of New York..... 184

The state of the vote for Vice-President of the United States as delivered by the tellers, etc., is:

For William A. Wheeler, of New York..... 185
For Thomas A. Hendricks, of Indiana..... 184

Wherefore I do declare:

That Rutherford B. Hayes, of Ohio, having received a majority of the whole number of electoral votes, is duly elected President of the United States for four years, commencing on the 4th day of March, 1877.

And that William A. Wheeler, of New York, having received a majority of the whole number of electoral votes, is duly elected Vice-President of the United States for four years, commencing on the 4th day of March, 1877.[4]

L., p. 373; also sec. 1918 of this work.) The former joint rule, which, however, was not in force in 1877, provided that the President of the Senate should "announce the state of the vote and the names of the persons, if any, elected, which announcement shall be deemed a sufficient declaration of the persons elected," etc. Journal second session Forty-fourth Congress, p. 723.

The Presiding Officer further stated that the count of the electoral vote for President and Vice-President of the United States being now completed, the joint meeting of the two Houses of Congress is now dissolved, and the Senate will accordingly return to their Chamber.

1957. Proceedings at the electoral count of 1881.

The State of Georgia having cast her vote on a day different from that prescribed by law, an alternative announcement was made at the counting of the electoral vote.

In 1881 the Senate determined that its President had no authority to decide on the reception or rejection of electoral votes.

In the Forty-sixth Congress, previous to and preparatory to the count of the electoral vote in 1881, the Senate passed and sent to the House a proposition for a joint rule to regulate fully and in detail the proceedings of the count.[1] The proposition was debated in the House[2] at considerable length, there being opposition because of a belief that a law would be better than a joint rule. Finally, on January 26, 1881,[3] it became evident from the obstructive tactics invoked in the House that the joint rule could not be agreed to. On February 2, 1881,[4] after full debate the Senate agreed to the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), 1. That the two Houses of Congress shall assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Wednesday, the 9th of February, 1881, at 12 o'clock meridian, pursuant to the requirement of the Constitution and laws relating to the election of President and Vice-President of the United States, and the President of the Senate shall be the presiding officer; that two persons be appointed tellers on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House of Representatives to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote and the persons elected to the two Houses assembled as aforesaid, which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected President and Vice-President of the United States, and, together with a list of votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

2. That if it shall appear that any votes of electors for President or Vice-President of the United States have been given on a day other than that fixed for casting such votes by act of Congress, in pursuance of the Constitution of the United States, if the counting or omitting to count such votes shall not essentially change the result of the election, they shall be reported by the President of the Senate in the following manner: Were the votes of electors cast on the —— day of——, 1880, to be counted, the result would be for A. B. for President of the United States – — votes, and for C. D. for President of the United States ——— votes; if not counted, the result would be for A. B. for President of the United States ——— votes, and for C. D. for President of the United States ——— votes; but in either event —— is elected President of the United States. And in the same manner for Vice-President.[5]

On February 5, 1881,[6] after debate, the resolution was agreed to by the House,

[1] The law governing the count in 1877 had applied only to that occasion. The debates in the Senate on this joint rule went quite fully into the legal questions involved. See Congressional Record, second session Forty-sixth Congress, pp. 3652–3662, 3682–3704, for Senate debate and form of rule.

the yeas and nays being taken on the second branch and resulting, yeas 160, nays 77.[1]

On February 9,[2] the two Houses met in joint convention, the Vice-President presiding, and the votes were opened and tabulated by the tellers. As Georgia had cast her vote on the second Wednesday of December, a day different from that prescribed by law, two tabulations were made, one including and the other not including Georgia's eleven votes. Then Mr. Allen G. Thurman, of Ohio, one of the tellers, made the announcement of the state of the votes, stating that in either event Messrs. Garfield and Arthur were elected.

The President of the Senate (the Vice-President) then announced the state of the votes, and declared the same to be as follows:

Wherefore I do declare that James A. Garfield, of the State of Ohio, having received a majority of the votes of the whole number of electors appointed, is duly elected President of the United States for four years, commencing on the 4th day of March, 1881.

"A similar declaration was made in regard to the Vice-President-elect.

1958. Proceedings at the electoral count of 1885.

At the electoral count of 1885 the President pro tempore, in announcing the result, disclaimed any authority in law to declare any legal conclusion whatever.

In 1885 there was no question as to the electoral count, and the two Houses adopted a concurrent resolution which was simply the first branch of the resolution of 1881. As the resolution originated in the House,[3] it provided for one teller on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House. The Senate amended so that there might be two Senate tellers.[4] The House agreed to this,[5] and so the resolution took on the exact form of the first portion of the resolution of 1881. When the electoral count occurred, on February 11, 1885,[6] the Presiding Officer,[7] after announcing the state of the vote, said:

Wherefore, I do declare that Grover Cleveland, of the State of New York, has received a majority of the votes of the whole number of electors appointed as they appear in the certificates read by the tellers, and so appears to have been elected President of the United States for four years, commencing on the 4th day of March, 1885; and that Thomas A. Hendricks, etc., * * * And the President of the Senate makes this declaration only as a public statement in the presence of the two Houses of Congress of the contents of the papers opened and read on this occasion, and not as possessing any authority in law to declare any legal conclusion whatever.

[1] Some of the opposition in the House arose from belief that the President of the Senate was the proper authority to make the count. On February 4, 1881, after extended debate, by vote of 42 to 1, the Senate agreed to a concurrent resolution stating that the "President of the Senate is not invested by the Constitution" with "the right to count the votes of electors" so as to determine what votes shall be received and counted or what votes shall be rejected. (Record, 3d sess. 46th Cong., pp. 1160–1174, 1205–1211.) This resolution was received in the House February 4, but does not seem to have been acted on. Journal, p. 330; Record, p. 1237.

1959. The electoral counts of 1889 and 1893.

In 1893 a question was raised as to the constitutional force of the electoral act of 1887.

For the electoral count of 1889,[1] provisions for which had been made in the general statute of February 3, 1887,[2] the House and Senate nevertheless adopted the usual concurrent resolution in the form used in 1885. The count was made without unusual incident.

1960. For the electoral count of 1893[3] the form of the concurrent resolution was continued the same. While it was being considered in the Senate, the point was made[4] that the language of the statute made all necessary provisions without the necessity of adopting the customary concurrent resolution. Mr. George F. Hoar, of Massachusetts, explained that this question had arisen four years before, not long after the passage of the law, and it had been decided best to pass the resolution in order to avoid a constitutional question which might arise. The provision of the Constitution that each House may prescribe the rules of its own proceedings had been sometimes thought to prevent Congress from enacting by law provisions for directing either House as to the time or mode of its proceeding without the special assent of the particular House in the particular Congress.

The count of 1893 proceeded without unusual incident.

1961. The electoral count of 1897.

The two Houses by concurrent resolution provide for the meeting to count the electoral vote, for the appointment of tellers, and for the declaration of the state of the vote.

The House by resolution makes a special disposition of the galleries for the electoral count.

While the Speaker has at times appointed the tellers for the electoral count as of his own authority, yet the best considered opinion is that the function belongs to the House itself. (Footnote.)

The usage as to preliminary messages between the two Houses when they are about to assemble in joint meeting for the count of the electoral vote. (Footnote.)

On February 2, 1897,[5] Mr. David B. Henderson, of Iowa, from the Committee on Rules, presented and the House agreed to this resolution:

Resolved, That on Wednesday, February 10, the whole of the gallery, except that which is designated as executive, diplomatic, and reporters' galleries, and two sections of the east end of the public gallery, shall be reserved for the use of the families of Senators, Members of the House of Representatives, Delegates, and their visitors.

The Doorkeeper shall strictly enforce this order.

The Speaker shall issue to each Senator, Member of the House of Representatives, and Delegate two cards of admission, and only persons holding these cards shall be admitted.

Then Mr. Henderson presented, also from the Committee on Rules,[1] the following resolution, which was agreed to by the House:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the two Houses of Congress shall assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Wednesday, the 10th day of February, 1897, at 1 o'clock in the afternoon, pursuant to the requirement of the Constitution and laws relating to the election of President and Vice-President of the United States, and the President of the Senate shall be the Presiding Officer; that two persons be appointed tellers on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House of Representatives to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote and the persons elected to the two Houses assembled as aforesaid,[2] which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected President and Vice-President of the United States, and, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.[3]

This resolution was agreed to in the Senate on February 3.[4]

On February 5, 1861, a motion was made that the Speaker be authorized to appoint the tellers on the part of the House.

On February 8,[5] in the House, the Speaker[6] said:

The Chair is not entirely certain that he has authority to appoint the tellers on the part of the House to count the electoral vote, but in accordance with what seems to be the custom he will make the appointment and submit it to the House. The appointments which the Chair will make, if the House does not object, will be the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. Grosvenor, and the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. Richardson. If there be no objection, these will be considered as the tellers to count the electoral vote.[7]

There was no objection.

Also on this day the Speaker laid before the House letters from the Secretary of State transmitting copies in full of the certificates of ascertainment of the electors

[1] The jurisdiction of this resolution belongs more properly to the Committee on Election of President, Vice-President, and Representatives in Congress. See section 1963 of this chapter.

[2] This form has since been changed to conform to the law, which provides that the Presiding Officer shall announce only the state of the vote.

[3] This is the form adopted for the two preceding counts. Its general terms are taken from former joint rule 22. See second session Forty-seventh Congress, Journal, pp. 678, 679.

[6] Thomas B. Reed, of Maine, Speaker.

[7] In 1879 Speaker Randall appointed tellers without consulting the House (second session Forty-fourth Congress, Journal, p. 352; Record, pp. 1189, 1194), even appointing the two of the same political party. On February 7, 1881, Mr. Speaker Randall again appointed tellers without asking the House for confirmation. The proceeding took place under a concurrent resolution embodying in this respect the same provision as the above resolution and the same as the present law. (Third session Forty-sixth Congress, Journal, p. 346; Record, p. 1315.) On February 10, 1885, Speaker pro tempore J. S. C. Blackburn again appointed tellers without question under similar terms of the concurrent resolution. (Second session Forty-eighth Congress, Journal, p. 509; Record, p. 1500.) On February 11, 1888, under terms of the concurrent resolution the same as in previous years, and the law existing as at present Mr. Speaker Carlisle expressed doubts as to his right to appoint and asked the approval of the House. (Second session Fiftieth Congress, Journal, p. 470; Record, p. 1751.) On February 1, 1893, Mr. Speaker Crisp expressed similar doubts and asked the approval of the House. (Second session Fifty-second Congress, Journal, p. 65; Record, p. 1059.)

On February 10, 1873, the Speaker appointed the tellers called for by the joint rule 22, without consulting the House, saying "It is the duty of the Speaker to nominate two Representatives." The joint rule provided that two tellers "shall be appointed * * * on the part of the House of Representatives." (Third session Forty-second Congress, Journal, p. 358; Globe, p. 1236. James G. Blaine, of Maine, Speaker.)

appointed in the different States. These documents were ordered to lie on the Speaker's table.[1]

On February 10, at three minutes before 1 o'clock, the Doorkeeper announced the Vice-President and the Senate of the United States.

The Senate entered the Hall, preceded by its Sergeant-at-Arms, and headed by the Vice-President of the United States and the Secretary of the Senate, the Members and officers of the House rising to receive them.[2]

The Vice-President took his seat as presiding officer of the joint convention of the two Houses, the Speaker of the House occupying the chair on his left.

Senators Blackburn and Lodge, the tellers appointed on the part of the Senate, and Representatives Grosvenor and Richardson, the tellers appointed on the part of the House, took their places at the Clerk's desk.

The Vice-President announced:

The Senate and House of Representatives are now in joint session, pursuant to law, for the purpose of opening and counting the votes of the electors for President and Vice-President of the United States. The certificate of the State of Alabama will be read by the tellers.

After the reading of the first certificate, on motion of Senator John Sherman, of Ohio, and by unanimous consent, the formal reading of the remaining certificates was omitted.

The tellers, having made up their report and officially certified it, delivered it to the Vice-President, who announced it, and said:

This announcement of the state of the vote by the President of the Senate is by law a sufficient declaration that William McKinley, of the State of Ohio, is elected President of the United States, and that Garret A. Hobart, of the State of New Jersey, is elected Vice-President of the United States, each for the term beginning March 4, 1897, and will be entered, together with a list of the votes, on the Journals of the Senate and House of Representatives.

The count of the electoral votes having been completed and the result declared, the joint meeting of the two Houses is dissolved, and the Senate will now return to its Chamber.

The Senate then retired from the Hall (at 1 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.), when the Speaker resumed the chair, and the House was again called to order.[3]

[1] Second session Fifty-fourth Congress, Record, p. 1643. These copies are transmitted to the House in accordance with the provisions of section 3 of the act of February 3, 1887. (24 Stat. L., p. 373)

[2] Previous to the arrival of the Senate a message was received from that body announcing that it had taken order to proceed to the House to take part in the count. (Second session Fifty-fourth Congress, Journal, p. 163; Record, p. 1711.) This order had been adopted in the Senate on the preceding day. (Record p. 1672.) The House sent no message to the Senate.

On February 8, 1893, the day of the count the Senate adopted an order that the Senate should attend in the Hall of the House. (Second session Fifty-second Congress, Record, p. 1314.) It does not appear that this order was sent to the House by message, or that the House sent any message to the Senate. (Journal, pp. 80, 81.)

On February 13, 1889, the question of adopting an order that the Senate proceed to the House to participate in the count caused debate over the fact that the House proposed to send to the Senate no notification of its readiness to receive the Senate. It was stated that the law governing the electoral count was for the first time in force, and therefore it did not seem necessary or proper for the Senate to await the usual invitation. So the Senate adopted the order that it attend in the Hall of the House, without awaiting a message from that body. (Second session Fiftieth Congress, Record, pp. 1816, 1817.)

1962. The electoral count of 1901.

In 1901 the concurrent resolution providing for the electoral count was changed in form to meet the requirements of the electoral law.

In 1901 the Speaker, with the assent of the House, appointed the tellers for the electoral count.

Form of the duplicate reports made by the tellers at the electoral count.

On January 22, 1901,[1] the following resolution, which had been received from the Senate, was, under the rule, referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the two Houses of Congress shall assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Wednesday, the 13th day of February, 1901, at 1 o'clock in the afternoon, pursuant to the requirement of the Constitution and laws relating to the election of President and Vice-President of the United States, and the President of the Senate shall be the presiding officer; that two persons be appointed tellers on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House of Representatives to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote and the persons elected to the two Houses assembled as aforesaid, which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected President and Vice-President of the United States, and, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

On January 31[2] Mr. John Dalzell, of Pennsylvania, reported the resolution back from the committee, with the recommendation that it be amended by striking out all after the resolving clause and inserting the following:

That the two Houses of Congress shall assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Wednesday, the 13th day of February, 1901, at 1 o'clock in the afternoon, pursuant to the requirement of the Constitution and laws relating to the election of President and Vice-President of the United States, and the President of the Senate shall be their presiding officer; that two tellers shall be previously appointed on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House of Representatives, to whom shall be handed, as they are opened by the President of the Senate, all the certificates and papers purporting to be certificates of the electoral votes, which certificates and papers shall be opened, presented, and acted upon in the alphabetical order of the States, beginning with the letter A; and said tellers, having then read the same in the presence and hearing of the two Houses, shall make a list of the votes as they shall appear from the said certificates; and the votes having been ascertained and counted in the manner and according to the rules by law provided, the result of the same shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall thereupon announce the state of the vote, which announcement shall be deemed a sufficient declaration of the persons, if any, elected President and Vice-President of the United States, and, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

Mr. Dalzell explained that the amendment was intended to conform to the provisions of the electoral law of 1887. The original resolution, sent from the Senate, was in the form used prior to the enactments of the law. By oversight it had been continued from count to count, although some of its provisions, notably that relating to the announcement of the result, were at variance with the provisions of the law.

The amendment was agreed to without division.

On February 1[3] the amendment was agreed to by the Senate.

On February 7, 1901,[4] the Speaker laid before the House duplicates of the certificates of the various States of their election of electors of President and Vice-President of the United States. They were, by unanimous consent, ordered to lie on the Speaker's table until after the electoral count, then to be delivered to the care of the file clerk of the House.

Also on February 7 the Speaker, asking the assent of the House, appointed Messrs. Charles H. Grosvenor, of Ohio, and James D. Richardson, of Tennessee, tellers on the part of the House for the proceedings of the electoral count.

On February 12[1] a message from the Senate announced that they had agreed to the following:

Ordered, That at ten minutes before 1 o'clock on Wednesday, February 13, 1901, the Senate proceed to the Hall of the House of Representatives to take part in the count of the electoral votes for President and Vice-President of the United States.

On February 13[2] at 1 o'clock the Doorkeeper announced the President pro tempore and the Senate of the United States.

The Senate entered the Hall, preceded by its Sergeant-at-Arms, and headed by its President pro tempore and the Secretary of the Senate, the members and officers of the House rising to receive them.

The President pro tempore of the Senate took his seat as Presiding Officer of the Joint Convention of the two Houses, the Speaker of the House occupying the chair on his left.

Senators Chandler and Caffery, the tellers appointed on the part of the Senate, and Representatives Grosvenor and Richardson, the tellers appointed on the part of the House, took their places at the Clerk's desk.

The President pro tempore[3] announced:

The two Houses of Congress are in joint convention, pursuant to the requirements of the Constitution and laws of the United States, to open the credentials and count the votes of the several States for President and Vice-President. Following precedents well established on former occasions, unless there shall be a demand for it in any case, the mere formal papers will not be read by the tellers. On ascertaining that the credentials are authentic and in correct form, they will simply give the lists of the votes of the several States.

If there be no objection to the counting of the electoral vote of the State of Alabama, the tellers will receive the credentials and make a list of the vote.

The President pro tempore thereupon opened the certificates of the various States in their alphabetical order, and passed them to the tellers,[4] who announced the result.

The President pro tempore then announced:

Gentlemen of the convention, the certificates having all been opened and read, the tellers will make ascertainment of the result and report the same to the President pro tempore of the Senate.

Thereupon Senator William E. Chandler, of New Hampshire, one of the tellers, announced:

Mr. President, the tellers report the following as the result of the ascertainment of the count of the electoral vote:

The whole number of the electors appointed to vote for President of the United States is 447, of which a majority is 224.

William McKinley, of the State of Ohio, has received for President of the United States 292 votes.

William Jennings Bryan, of the State of Nebraska, has received 155 votes.

The state of the vote for Vice-President of the United States, as delivered to the President of the Senate, is as follows:

The whole number of the electors appointed to vote for Vice-President of the United States is 447, of which a majority is 224.

Theodore Roosevelt, of the State of New York, has received 292 votes.

Adlai E. Stevenson, of the State of Illinois, has received 155 votes.

The report of the tellers [1] is as follows:

"The undersigned, William E. Chandler and Donelson Caffery, tellers on the part of the Senate, and Charles H. Grosvenor and James D. The President pro tempore then announced:

The state of the vote for President of the United States, as delivered to the President of the Senate, is as follows:

The whole number of the electors appointed to vote for President of the United States is 447, of which a majority is 224.

William McKinley, of the State of Ohio, has received for President of the United States 292 votes;

William Jennings Bryan, of the State of Nebraska, has received 155 votes.

The state of the vote for Vice-President of the United States, as delivered to the President of the Senate, is as follows:

The whole number of the electors appointed to vote for Vice-President of the United States is 447, of which a majority is 224.

Theodore Roosevelt, of the State of New York, has received 292 votes;

Adlai E. Stevenson, of the State of Illinois, has received 155 votes.

This announcement of the state of the vote by the President of the Senate shall be deemed a sufficient declaration of the persons elected President and Vice-President of the United States, each for the term beginning March 4, 1901, and shall be entered, together with a list of the votes, on the Journals of the Senate and House of Representatives.

Gentlemen, the purposes for which this joint convention was called having been accomplished, the Presiding Officer now declares it dissolved, and the Senate will return to its Chamber.

The Senate then retired from the Hall (at 2 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.), the Speaker resumed the chair, and the House was again called to order.

1963. Proceedings in relation to the electoral count of 1905.—On December 8, 1904,[1] in the Senate, Mr. Julius C. Burrows, of Michigan, submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the two Houses of Congress shall assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Wednesday, the 8th day of February, 1905, at 1 o'clock in the afternoon, pursuant to the requirements of the Constitution and laws relating to the election of President and Vice-President of the United States, and the President of the Senate shall be their presiding officer; that two tellers shall be previously appointed on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House of Representatives, to whom shall be handed, as they are opened by the President of the Senate, all the certificates and papers purporting to be certificates of the electoral votes, which certificates and papers shall be opened, presented, and acted upon in the alphabetical order of the States, beginning with the letter A; and said tellers, having then read the same in the presence and hearing of the two Houses, shall make a list of the votes as they shall appear from the said certificates; and the votes having been ascertained and counted in the manner and according to the rules by law provided, the result of the same shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall thereupon announce the state of the vote, which announcement shall be deemed a sufficient declaration of the persons, if any, elected President and Vice-President of the United States, and, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

On January 5, 1905,[2] Mr. Burrows reported the resolution from the committee, and it was agreed to by the Senate.

On January 9, 1905,[3] this resolution having been received in the House, was referred from the Speaker's table to the Committee on Election of President, Vice-President, and Representatives in Congress.

On January 16,[4] Mr. Joseph H. Gaines, of West Virginia, from that committee, reported the resolution and it was agreed to by the House.

Thereupon Mr. Gaines, from the same committee, reported the following resolutions, which were severally agreed to:

Resolved, That pursuant to Senate concurrent resolution No. 84, to which this House has agreed, the Speaker be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to appoint two tellers on the part of the House of Representatives to perform the duties devolving upon such tellers by the act of Congress of February 3, 1887, and said concurrent resolution of the Senate No. 84, upon the assembling of the two Houses of Congress to count the electoral votes, on February 8, 1905.

Resolved, That on Wednesday, February 8, the whole of the gallery, except that which is designated as executive, diplomatic, and reporters' galleries, and two sections of the east end of the public gallery, shall be reserved for the use of the families of Senators, Members of the House of Representatives, Delegates, and their visitors.

The Doorkeeper shall strictly enforce this order.

The Speaker shall issue to each Senator, Member of the House of Representatives, and Delegate two cards of admission, and only persons holding these cards shall be admitted.

On January 20[5] the Speaker laid before the House the following communication from the Senate; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
January 20, 1905.

The President pro tempore appointed Mr. Burrows and Mr. Bailey as the tellers on the part of the Senate to count the electoral votes for President and Vice-President of the United States.

Attest:

The Speaker [1] said:

In pursuance of the House resolution, the Chair appoints Mr. Gaines, of West Virginia, and Mr. Gordon Russell, of Texas, as the tellers of the House to count the electoral vote for President and Vice-President of the United States.

On February 7,[2] on motion of Mr. Gaines, of West Virginia, the House agreed to the following:

Resolved, That on Wednesday, February 8, the whole of the gallery, except that which is designated as executive, diplomatic, and reporters' galleries, shall be reserved for the use of the families of Senators, Members of the House of Representatives, Delegates, and their visitors.

The Doorkeeper shall strictly enforce this order.

On February 8,[3] in the House, seats were provided for the Senators at the right of the Presiding Officer; and then at 1 o'clock the Doorkeeper announced the President pro tempore and the Senate of the United States.

The Senate entered the Hall, preceded by their Sergeant-at-Arms, and headed by their President pro tempore and the Secretary of the Senate, the Members and officers of the House rising to receive them.

The President pro tempore of the Senate [4] took his seat as Presiding Officer of the joint convention of the two Houses, the Speaker of the House occupying the chair on his left.

The President pro tempore of the Senate said:

The two Houses of Congress, pursuant to the requirements of the Constitution and laws of the United States, are now in joint convention for the purpose of opening the certificates and counting the votes of the several States for President and Vice-President. Under well-established precedents, unless demand shall be made in any case, the reading of the formal portions of the certificates will be dispensed with. After ascertainment has been had that the certificates are authentic and correct in form, the tellers will count and make a list of the votes of the States. If there be no objection, the Presiding Officer will now open the certificate of the State of Alabama. Will the tellers please take their places at the desk?

Senators Burrows and Bailey, the tellers appointed on the part of the Senate, and Representatives Gaines, of West Virginia, and Russell, the tellers appointed on the part of the House, took their places at the Clerk's desk.

The President pro tempore of the Senate announced:

The tellers will count and make a list of the vote of the State of Alabama.

Mr. Burrows (one of the tellers) said:

Mr. President, the certificate of the electoral vote of the State of Alabama seems to be regular in form and authentic, and it appears therefrom that Alton B. Parker, of the State of New York, received 11 votes for President, and that Henry G. Davis, of West Virginia, received 11 votes for Vice-President

The President pro tempore of the Senate said:

If there be no objection, the Chair will now open and pass to the tellers the certificate showing the vote of the State of Arkansas, and the tellers will count and make a list of the votes of that State.

The tellers then proceeded to announce the electoral votes of the several States, in their alphabetical order.

The President pro tempore of the Senate said:

Gentlemen of the convention, the certificates of all the States have now been opened and read, and the tellers will make final ascertainment of the result and report the same to the President pro tempore of the Senate.

Mr. Burrows (one of the tellers) said:

Mr. President, the tellers report the result of the ascertainment of the count of the electoral vote as follows:

The whole number of the electors appointed to vote for President of the United States is 476, of which a majority is 239.

Theodore Roosevelt, of the State of New York, has received for President of the United States 336 votes.

Alton Brooks Parker, of the State of New York, has received 140 votes.

The state of the vote for Vice-President of the United States, as delivered to the President of the Senate, is as follows:

The whole number of the electors appointed to vote for Vice-President of the United States is 476, of which a majority is 239.

Charles Warren Fairbanks, of the State of Indiana, has received 336 votes.

Henry Gassaway Davis, of the State of West Virginia, has received 140 votes.

This announcement of the state of the vote by the President of the Senate shall be deemed a sufficient declaration of the persons elected President and Vice-President of the United States, each for the term beginning March 4, 1905, and shall be entered, together with a list of the votes, on the Journals of the Senate and House of Representatives.

The report of the tellers is as follows:

The undersigned, Julius C. Burrows and Joseph Weldon Bailey, tellers on the part of the Senate, and Joseph H. Gaines and Gordon Russell, tellers on the part of the House of Representatives, report the following as the result of the ascertainment and counting of the electoral vote for President and Vice-President of the United States for the term beginning March 4, 1905.

J. C. BURROWS,
J. W. BAILEY,
Tellers on the part of the Senate.
JOSEPH H. GAINES,
GORDON RUSSELL,
Tellers on the part of the House of Representatives.

The President pro tempore of the Senate said:

The report of the state of the vote for President of the United States, as delivered to the President of the Senate, is as follows:

The whole number of the electors appointed to vote for President of the United States is 476, of which a majority is 239.

Theodore Roosevelt, of the State of New York, has received for President of the United States 336 votes;

Alton Brooks Parker, of the State of New York, has received 140 votes.

The state of the vote for Vice-President of the United States, as delivered to the President of the Senate, is as follows:

The whole number of the electors appointed to vote for Vice-President of the United States is 476, of which a majority is 239.

Charles Warren Fairbanks, of the State of Indiana, has received 336 votes;

Henry Gassaway Davis, of the State of West Virginia, has received 140 votes.

This announcement of the state of the vote by the President of the Senate shall be deemed a sufficient declaration of the persons elected President and Vice-President of the United States, each for the term beginning March 4, 1905, and shall be entered, together with a list of the votes, on the Journals of the Senate and House of Representatives. [Applause.]

Gentlemen of the convention, the purposes for which this joint convention has been called having been accomplished, the Presiding Officer dissolves the joint convention, and the Senate will return to their Chamber.

The Senate retired from the Hall (at 1 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.), the Speaker resumed the chair, and the House was again called to order.

The Senate returned[1] to its Chamber at 1 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m., and the President pro tempore resumed the chair.

Mr. Burrows, one of the tellers appointed on behalf of the Senate in pursuance of the concurrent resolution of the two Houses to ascertain the result of the election for President and Vice-President of the United States, said:

Mr. President, the tellers on the part of the Senate report to the Senate the following as the result of the ascertainment and counting of the electoral vote for President and Vice-President of the United States for the term beginning March 4, 1905, in order that the report may be entered upon the Journal of the Senate.

The report was then submitted as given in the House, the same having been made and signed in duplicate.

Chapter LXI.

OBJECTIONS AT THE ELECTORAL COUNT.

1. Questions as to the votes of Georgia and Louisiana in 1869. Sections 1964, 1966.
2. Questions as to the votes of Georgia, Louisiana, and Arkansas in 1873. Sections 1967–1970.
3. Questions settled by the Electoral Commission in 1877. Sections 1971–1980.

1964. In the electoral count of 1869 objection was made that there had been no valid election in Louisiana, but the vote was counted.—On February 10, 1869,[1] during the count of the electoral vote, Mr. James Mullins, of Tennessee, offered this objection:

I object to any count of the votes certified from the State of Louisiana, and raise the question in regard to them that no valid election of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States has been held in said State.

The two Houses separated, and after considering the objection and acting, returned into joint convention, when the President pro tempore announced that the two Houses, by concurrent action, had decided that the vote of Louisiana should be counted.

1965. In 1869 the electoral vote of Georgia was announced in an alternative way, the objections to it being several in number.—On February 10, 1869,[2] during the count of the electoral vote, Mr. Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts, offered this objection:

I object, under the joint rule, that the vote of the State of Georgia for President and Vice-President ought not to be counted, and object to the counting thereof because, among other things, the vote of the electors in the Electoral College was not given on the first Wednesday of December, as required by law, and no excuse or justification for the omission of such legal duty is set forth in the certificate of the action of the electors.

Secondly, because at the date of the election of said electors the State of Georgia had not been admitted to representation as a State in Congress since the rebellion of her people, or become entitled thereto.

Thirdly, that at said date said State of Georgia had not fulfilled in due form all the requirements of the Constitution and laws of the United States, known as the reconstruction acts, so as to entitle said State of Georgia to be represented as a State in the Union in the electoral vote of the several States in the choice of President and Vice-President.

Fourthly, that the election pretended to have been held in the State of Georgia on the first Tuesday of November last past was not a free, just, equal, and fair election; but the people of the State were deprived of their just rights therein by force and fraud.

[2] Third session Fortieth Congress, Journal, p. 315; Globe, pp. 1050–1055, 1058, 1059, 1062.

The two Houses having separated, the House decided, yeas 41, nays 150, against counting the vote of Georgia.

The Senate decided that under the concurrent resolution governing the count, the objections should be overruled, and the whole vote should be stated as it would be, both with and without Georgia.[1]

1966. In 1873 there was objection to the electoral vote of Mississippi because of alleged informalities and deficiencies in the certificate, but the vote was counted.—On February 12, 1873,[2] during the session of the joint convention for the counting of the electoral vote, the State of Mississippi was reached, and Mr. Lyman Trumbull, of Illinois, a Senator, submitted this objection:

Mr. Trumbull objects to counting the votes cast for President and Vice-President by the electors in the State of Mississippi, for the reason it does not appear from the certificate of said electors that they voted by ballot.

Mr. Clarkson N. Potter, of New York, a Representative, also filed objections as follows:

Mr. Potter objects to one vote of the State of Mississippi, because the certificate declaring that J J. Spellman was appointed an elector in the stead of A. T. Morgan, absent, by the electoral college of that State, in accordance with the laws of that State, is not signed by the governor of that State.

And further that the certificate of the secretary of state read does not certify anything of his own knowledge, but only states he has been so notified as he certifies.

The Senate having retired, Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, submitted in the House the following resolution, which was agreed to by a vote of 101 ayes to 33 noes:

Resolved, That in the judgment of this House the eight votes reported by the tellers as cast by electors in and for the State of Mississippi ought to be counted as reported by them.

Mr. Potter then submitted a resolution providing that the vote cast by James J. Spellman be rejected, and that only 7 votes be counted for Mississippi. For that resolution Mr. Nathaniel P. Banks, of Massachusetts, offered the following substitute, which was agreed to, ayes 109, noes 33.

Resolved, That the electors of the State of Mississippi, having been appointed in the manner directed by the legislature of that State, and in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, were legally elected, and that the vote of the State as cast by them should be counted, and that the certificate of the governor of that State of the electoral vote cast, and the certificate of the secretary of state of that State in regard to the choice of electors is in compliance with the Constitution and laws of the United States.

This resolution was agreed to by the House.

In the Senate,[3] after consideration, the Senate agreed to the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the electoral vote of the State of Mississippi be counted.

Resolved, That the vote cast by James J. Spellman, one of the electors for the State of Mississippi, be counted.

The joint convention having reassembled, the votes of Mississippi were counted under the joint rule, the two Houses concurring.[4]

1967. In 1873 objection was made that the electoral vote of Georgia should not be counted, as it had been cast for Horace Greeley, who was dead; and the two Houses not agreeing, the vote was not counted.—On February 12, 1873,[1] during the session of the joint convention for the counting of the electoral vote, the State of Georgia was reached, and Mr. George F. Hoar, of Massachusetts, a Representative, filed the following objection:

Mr. Hoar objects, the votes reported by the tellers as having been cast by the electors of the State of Georgia for Horace Greeley, of New York, can not legally be counted, because said Horace Greeley, for whom they appear to have been cast, was dead at the time said electors assembled to cast their votes and was not a person within the meaning of the Constitution, this being a historical fact of which the two Houses may take notice.

The Senate having withdrawn, the House, without debate,[2] and by a vote of 102 yeas to 98 nays, agreed to this resolution:

Resolved, That the votes reported by the tellers as having been cast by the electors of the State of Georgia for Horace Greeley, of New York, for President of the United States, ought not to be counted, the said Horace Greeley having died before said votes were cast.[3]

In the Senate Mr. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, offered this resolution:

Resolved, That the electoral votes of Georgia cast for Horace Greeley be not counted.

On motion of Mr. Allen G. Thurman, of Ohio, the word "not" was stricken out, yeas 47, nays 18. Then the resolution as amended was agreed to, yeas 44, nays 19.[4]

The joint convention having assembled, the President of the Senate announced that as there was a nonconcurrence of the two Houses as to the votes in question, they could not be counted under the joint rule.[5]

1968. In 1873 the electoral vote of Louisiana was rejected, objections having been made because of conflicting certificates, and on other grounds.—On February 12, 1873,[6] during the session of the joint convention for the counting of the electoral vote, various objections were made to counting the electoral votes of the State of Louisiana. The Vice-President, in presenting the returns, stated that from Louisiana there had been received two returns sent by mail and two by messenger, each of the last having been received by the Secretary of State in the absence of the Vice-President and the President of the Senate pro tempore from the seat of Government. The first return, made by L. C. Roudanez, was received on the 31st of December, within the time required by the Constitution. The second return was received on the 2d of January, being one day within the time required by the Constitution. What appeared to be the duplicates were received by mail on the 10th and 14th of December.

The Chair first submitted those returns which reached the office of the Secretary of State, in accordance with law, on December 31.

These papers consisted of: The certificate, under seal, of "George Bovee, secretary of state," that the returning officers had returned to him as secretary of state, according to law, the following persons as duly elected electors of President and Vice-President of the United States for the State of Louisiana [names given]; a certificate signed by the electors, certifying that they had voted by ballot for Ulysses S. Grant for President of the United States and for Henry Wilson, of Massachusetts, for Vice-President; copies of minutes of the proceedings of these electors at their various meetings.

The Chair then laid before the convention the papers received by messenger on January 2. These papers consisted of: A certificate, under seal, signed by H. C. Warmouth and attested as follows: "By the governor, Y. A. Woodward, assistant secretary of state," which certified that T. C. Manning, A. S. Herron, and others were duly and legally elected Presidential electors, etc., and that the signature of B. P. Blanchard, State registrar of voters for the State of Louisiana, was genuine; a certificate signed by the electors, Manning, Herron, and others, giving the record of their proceedings, and that they had cast 8 blank ballots for President of the United States and 8 votes for B. Gratz Brown, of Missouri, for Vice-President.

The certificates having been read, and objections having been called for, objections against the Grant and Wilson electors were presented as follows:

By Senator Matthew H. Carpenter, of Wisconsin, because there was no proper return of votes cast by the electors; because there was in that State no State government republican in form, and because no canvass or counting of the votes cast for electors at the November election had been made prior to the meeting of the electors.

By Representative Clarkson N. Potter, of New York, that there was no certificate from the executive authority of that State, as required by the act of Congress of 1792, certifying that the persons who cast such votes were appointed electors of said State, but that, on the contrary, the certificate of the governor showed that the persons appointed electors were not those voting for Grant and Wilson.

By Senator Lyman Trumbull, of Illinois, that the election of the electors was not certified by the proper officers; that Bovee was not secretary of state and not in possession of either the office or the seal, and that Bovee had admitted before the committee of the Senate that the certificate was untrue in fact.

To the votes cast by Manning, Herron, and others, objections were offered as follows:

By Senator J. Rodman West, of Louisiana, on the ground that the certificate was not made in pursuance of law.

By Representative Lionel A. Sheldon, of Louisiana, on the ground that the certificate of the governor was not signed by the person who was at that time assistant secretary of state of Louisiana; that at the time the certificate was executed there had not been made any count, canvass, or return of the votes cast by the people of Louisiana for electors by any lawful authority, and that the testimony taken before the Senate committee showed that the certificate was made by the governor without any authentic knowledge of the result of the election by the people of the State.

Objections were also made to counting any of the votes from the State:

By Mr. Job E. Stevenson, of Ohio, on the ground that it did not appear sufficiently that the electors were elected according to law.

By Senator Arthur I. Boneman, of West Virginia, for the reasons set forth in the report of the Senate No. 417, Third session Forty-second Congress.

The Senate having withdrawn, the House proceeded to consider the objections, and Mr. James A. Garfield, of Ohio, offered this resolution:

Resolved, That, in the judgment of this House, none of the returns reported by the tellers as electoral votes of the State of Louisiana should be counted.

To this was offered an amendment that the votes certified by the secretary of state should be counted; and the amendment was not agreed to. Then another amendment providing for counting the votes certified by "H. C. Warmouth, governor," was negatived, yeas 59, nays 85.

The original resolution was then agreed to.

In the Senate[1] Mr. Matthew H. Carpenter, of Wisconsin, offered this resolution, which was agreed to, yeas 33, nays 16:

Resolved, That, all objections presented having been considered, no electoral vote purporting to be that of the State of Louisiana be counted.

The joint convention having reassembled, and the two Houses concurring in so ordering, the vote of Louisiana was not counted.

1969. In 1873 objection was made both to the substance and form of the electoral certificate of Arkansas; and, the two Houses disagreeing, the vote was not counted.—On February 12, 1873,[2] during the session of the joint convention for the counting of the electoral vote, Mr. Benjamin F. Rice, of Arkansas, a Senator, offered the following objection:

Mr. Rice objects to counting the vote of the State of Arkansas because the official returns of the election in said State, made according to the laws of said State, show that the persons certified to by the secretary of state as elected were not elected as electors for President and Vice-President at the election held November 5, 1872; second, because the returns read by the tellers are not certified according to law.

In presenting the vote of Arkansas the Vice-President had stated that the electoral vote of Arkansas was received by him by mail on December 11, 1872, and by messenger at the Department of State, and in the absence of the Vice-President by the President pro tempore of the Senate on December 28, 1872. On the 4th or 5th day of February a person claiming to be a messenger commissioned to bring the electoral votes of the State of Arkansas presented himself at the Vice-President's room with a paper not in the form of law, but addressed to him as President of the Senate. The Vice-President stated that he opened the paper, as it was addressed to him, but declined to receive it even informally. The papers received on the 11th and 28th of December were those now presented to the convention.

The Senate having withdrawn, and the House having proceeded to the consideration of the objections, Mr. Stephen W. Kellogg, of Connecticut, offered the following resolution, which was agreed to, yeas 103, nays 26:

Resolved, That the electoral vote of Arkansas be counted.

In the Senate Mr. Oliver P. Morton, of Indiana, offered this resolution:

Resolved, That the electoral vote of Arkansas should be counted.

The papers having been read, it was developed that there was a statement of the vote signed by the electors and a certificate of the secretary of state as to who were electors. But there was no certificate from the governor, and there was doubt about the seal attached being the great seal of the State.

Mr. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, moved to amend the resolution so as to read:

Resolved, That the electoral vote of Arkansas should not be counted.

The amendment was agreed to, yeas 28, nays 25, and then the resolution in the amended form was agreed to, yeas 28, nays 24.

The joint convention having reassembled, and the nonconcurrence of the two Houses having been reported, the vote of Arkansas was not counted, under the terms of the joint rule.

1970. In 1873 objections were made to the electoral vote of Texas on the ground of a defective certificate and because less than an assumed quorum of the electors had acted; but the vote was counted.—On February 12, 1873,[1] during the session of the joint convention for counting the electoral vote, the State of Texas was reached, and Mr. Lyman Trumbull, of Illinois, a Senator, offered the following objection:

Mr. Trumbull objects to the vote of Texas because there is no certificate by the executive authority of that State that the persons who voted for President and Vice-President were appointed as electors of that State, as required by the act of Congress.

Mr. Oliver J. Dickey, of Pennsylvania, a Representative, offered also the further objection:

Mr. Dickey objected to the counting of the electoral vote of the State of Texas because four electors, less than a majority of those elected, undertook to fill the places of other four electors who had been elected and were absent.

The Senate having withdrawn, the House considered the first objection, and on motion of Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, agreed to this resolution:

Resolved, That in the judgment of this House the vote of Texas should be counted as reported by the letters.

As to the second objection, Mr. Dickey offered a resolution that the votes of Texas should not be counted, for the reasons set forth in his objection. On motion of Mr. Nathaniel P. Banks, of Massachusetts, the resolution was amended and adopted in this form:

Resolved, That a quorum is an arbitrary number, which each State has the right to establish for itself, and as it does not appear that the choice of electors was in conflict with the law of Texas as to a quorum for the transaction of business, the vote of the electors for President and Vice-President be counted.

[1] Third session Forty-second Congress, Journal, pp. 378, 379; Globe, pp. 1300, 1301.

The Senate, after consideration,[1] agreed to this resolution:

Resolved, That the electoral vote of the State of Texas be counted, notwithstanding the objection raised by Mr. Trumbull.

Resolved, That the objection raised by Mr. Dickey to counting the electoral vote of the State of Texas be, and the same is, overruled.

So, the two Houses having concurred, the vote of Texas was counted under the joint rule.[2]

1971. Conflicting electoral certificates being presented from Florida in 1877, a decision was reached that the regularly signed certificate from the governor acting at the time the votes were cast should stand.

The allegation that a Florida elector was disqualified was disregarded by the Electoral Commission in 1877, in the absence of proof.

On February 1, 1877,[3] during the session of the joint convention of the two Houses for counting the electoral vote, the certificates from the State of Florida were opened by the Presiding Officer, and it appearing that more than one paper purporting to be a certificate of electoral votes cast for President and Vice-President in the said State had been received by the President of the Senate, all of the certificates were handed to the tellers and were read.

Thereupon Mr. David Dudley Field, of New York, a Representative, presented objections in writing, duly signed, to the paper purporting to be a certificate of M. L. Stearns, as governor, that Charles H. Pearce, Frederick C. Humphries, William H. Holden, and Thomas W. Long were appointed electors, to the paper purporting to be a list of the votes cast by said electors for President and Vice-President, to the votes themselves, and to the counting of the votes. The reasons were (1.) that the electors were not appointed as the legislature directed, or in any matter whatever; (2) that Wilkinson Call, James E. Yonge, Robert B. Hilton, and Robert Bullock were appointed as the legislature directed; (3) the manner of appointing the electors was by the votes of the qualified electors, which gave to Messrs. Call, Yonge, Hilton, and Bullock an irrevocable title, which could not be set aside by any other person; (4) that the pretended certificate signed by M. L. Stearns, as governor, was untrue and obtained by fraud and conspiracy, and (5) was made out and executed in pursuance of the same fraudulent conspiracy; (6) that the Stearns certificate and lists, if they ever had any validity, were annulled by a subsequent lawful certificate of the governor of Florida (successor to Governor Stearns) by act of the legislature declaring the title of Messrs. Call, Yonge, Hilton, and Bullock valid, and by judgment of the circuit court of Florida which, in quo warranto proceedings, had, before the electors had cast their votes, decided that Messrs. Call, Yonge, Hilton, and Bullock were the lawful electors. The objections further alleged that the four electors last named constitutionally, on December 6, 1876, cast their votes for Tilden and Hendricks, and certified these votes to the President of the Senate; and also did everything required by Constitution and laws toward authentication of such votes, except section 136, Revised Statutes. And in conformity with the judgment of the Florida court the governor of Florida, who had been inducted into office subsequent to December 6, 1876, did, on January 26, 1877, give to the last-named electors the duplicate lists prescribed by section 136, Revised Statutes, which they forwarded as a supplement to their former certificate in that behalf.

A further objection, filed by Mr. Charles W. Jones, a Senator from Florida, alleged that Mr. Humphreys was disqualified because he held the office of United States shipping commissioner at Pensacola at the time of his alleged election as an elector and at the time of his casting of his vote as such elector and therefore could not be constitutionally appointed an elector.

On the other hand, objections were filed to the Call, Yonge, etc., certificates and papers by Mr. Aaron A. Sargent, of California, a Senator, on the grounds that they were not authenticated properly according to the Constitution and laws and therefore were not entitled to be received or read; that they were not accompanied by the certificate of the executive authority of the State, or by any valid or lawful certification, and that the properly authenticated certificate and papers showed that Messrs. Humphreys, Pearce, Holden, and Long were duly appointed electors and duly cast, certified, and transmitted their votes as such to the President of the Senate. A further objection was filed by Mr. John A. Kasson, of Iowa, a Representative, alleging (1) that the Call certificate was not legally certified, the certificate being by an officer not holding the office of governor or any other office in said State with authority in the premises either at the time when the electors were appointed or when their functions were exercised; (2) because the proceedings certifying the Call electors were ex post facto, and (3) retroactive.

The certificates and objections were referred to the electoral commission under the law,[1] and on February 10[2] its report was laid before the convention.

The decision of the Commission was that the votes certified by M. L. Stearns, governor, were the votes provided for by the Constitution, were lawfully to be counted, as therein certified, for Hayes and Wheeler, and that Messrs. Humphreys, Pearce, Holden, and Long were duly appointed electors. The report further says:

> That it is not competent, under the Constitution and the law as it existed at the date of the passage of said act, to go into evidence aliunde the papers opened by the President of the Senate in the presence of the two Houses to prove that other persons than those regularly certified to by the governor of the State of Florida on and according to the determination and declaration of their appointment by the board of State canvassers of said State, prior to the time required for the performance of their duties, had been appointed electors, or by counter proof to show that they had not, and that all proceedings of the courts or acts of the legislature or of the executive of Florida subsequent to the casting of the votes of the electors on the prescribed day are inadmissible for any such purpose.
> As to the objection made to the eligibility of Mr. Humphreys, the Commission is of opinion that, without reference to the question of the effect of the vote of an ineligible elector, the evidence does not show that he held the office of shipping commissioner on the day when the electors were appointed.

As a consequence of this the Commission decided that the other certificates and papers should not be counted.

The report was signed by the eight Commissioners concurring. The seven nonconcurring filed no minority views.

[1] 19 Stat. L., p. 229.

[2] Journal, pp. 417, 418; Record, p. 1481.

Mr. David Dudley Field, of New York, presented objections to the report on the ground that the Commissioners had made a wrong report, had refused to receive competent and material evidence in support of the allegation that the four electors headed by the name of Mr. Humphreys had been appointed fraudulently, had refused to recognize the action of the courts or other departments of government of the State of Florida tending to show that the Stearns certificates were fraudulent, and finally had violated the Constitution of the United States in counting the said certificates.

The two Houses separated to consider the objections, and having met again, on February 12,[1] it was announced that the Senate had sustained the decision of the Commission and the House had not. Therefore the presiding officer announced that, under the law, the two Houses not concurring in ordering otherwise, the decision of the Commission would stand unreversed.[2]

1972. In dealing with objections to the electoral vote of Louisiana in 1877, the Electoral Commission followed the rule laid down in the case of Florida.

It was held not to be competent to go behind the official certificates and papers to prove the alleged disqualifications of certain Louisiana members of the Electoral College of 1877.

On February 12, 1877,[3] during the joint convention of the two Houses for counting the electoral vote, the certificates of the State of Louisiana were opened by the presiding officer and it appeared that more than one paper purporting to be a certificate of the electoral votes had been received. All the papers having been read by the tellers, Mr. Joseph E. McDonald, of Indiana, a Senator, presented objections in writing to the certificate of electors and votes certified by William P. Kellogg, "claiming to be, but who was not, the lawful governor," for the reasons that (1) on November 7, 1876, there was no law of Louisiana directing the manner of appointment of electors; (2) if any law did exist it was an act of the legislature directing that electors should be appointed in their primary capacity, and the people of the State, in accordance with the legislative direction, did, on November 7, 1876, choose the electors certified by John McEnery, "who was then the rightful and lawful governor;" (3) the Kellogg electors were not duly appointed according to the laws and constitution of Louisiana and the United States, and that the lists of names certified by said Kellogg were false in fact and fraudulently made; (4) the pretended canvass of the returns of the election by J. Madison Wells and others as returning officers of said election was without jurisdiction and void because of invalidity of the statutes under which they claimed to act, because, if the statutes were valid, the board was improperly constituted, and because the board acted improperly and fraudulently in making the canvass and return; (5) A. B. Levissee, one of the electors, was, at the time of his appointment, disqualified by reason of holding the office of commissioner of the United States circuit court; (6) O. H.

Brewster was similarly disqualified by holding the office of surveyor-general of the United States Land Office; (7) by reason of these disqualifications the Kellogg certificate was void as to these two and their votes should not be counted; and the vote of William P. Kellogg as one of the electors should not be counted because his certificate, "executed by himself as governor" to "himself as elector," was void, and also because under the constitution of Louisiana he was not entitled to hold both offices; and (8) the Kellogg certificates were fraudulently issued in pursuance of a conspiracy to pervert the will of the people of Louisiana.

Mr. Randall L. Gibson, of Louisiana, a Representative, offered further objections, that (1) the government of Louisiana as administered at and prior to November 7, 1876, was not Republican in form; (2) there was no canvass of votes made on which the Kellogg certificates were issued; (3) any alleged canvass was an act of usurpation, fraudulent and void; (4) the votes of Messrs. Kellogg, Burch, Marks, and Jeffrion were invalid, because the said alleged electors, on November 7, 1876, held other State offices—of governor, senator, district attorney, and supervisor of registration, respectively—although the constitution of Louisiana prohibited such holding of plural offices; (5) and the said Jeffrion, by reason of being supervisor of registration, was disqualified by statute of Louisiana from being eligible for election to any office at that time when he officiated as such supervisor.

Mr. Fernando Wood, of New York, a Representative, filed an objection that the Kellogg electors were not appointed in the manner directed by the legislature of Louisiana.

Mr. Timothy O. Howe, of Wisconsin, a Senator, filed objection to the certificate of electors certified by John McEnery, as governor of Louisiana, for the reason that there was no evidence that said McEnery was at any time during 1876 governor, while conclusive evidence showed that William P. Kellogg was during that time recognized as governor by the judicial and legislative departments of the State and by every department of the United States Government; and objection was also made to the counting of the votes of John McEnery or R. C. Wickliffe for the reason that there was no evidence that either had been appointed as elector as directed by the legislature, but that there was evidence to the contrary.

On February 19, 1877,[1] the report of the Commission was laid before the joint convention of the two Houses. It was signed by the eight concurring Commissioners, and no minority views were filed by the seven nonconcurring. The report declares the decision of the Commission that the votes of the Kellogg electors were the votes provided for by the Constitution and were lawfully to be counted for Hayes and Wheeler; that the above-mentioned electors appeared to have been lawfully appointed and that they voted in the time and manner provided by the Constitution of the United States and the law. The report continues:

> And the Commission has by a majority of votes decided, and does hereby decide, that it is not competent under the Constitution and the law as it existed at the date of the passage of said act to go into evidence aliunde the papers opened by the President of the Senate in the presence of the two Houses to prove that other persons than those regularly certified to by the governor of the State of Louisiana on and according to the determination and declaration of their appointment by the returning officers for elections in the said State prior to the time required for the performance of their duties had been appointed electors, or by counter proof to show that they had not; or that the determination of the said returning officers was not in accordance with the truth and the fact; the Commission by a majority of votes being of opinion that it is not within the jurisdiction of the two Houses of Congress assembled to count the votes for President and Vice-President to enter upon a trial of such questions.

The Commission by a majority of votes is also of opinion that it is not competent to prove that any of said persons so appointed as electors aforesaid held an office of trust or profit under the United States at the time when they were appointed, or that they were ineligible under the laws of the State, or any other matter offered to be produced aliunde the said certificates and papers.

The Commission is also of opinion by a majority of votes that the returning officers of elections who canvassed the votes at the election for electors in Louisiana were a legally constituted body, by virtue of a constitutional law, and that a vacancy in said body did not vitiate its proceedings.

The Presiding Officer having asked for objections to this decision, Mr. Randall L. Gibson, of Louisiana, submitted objections[1] to the action taken by the Commission in excluding evidence offered in support of the original objections to the counting of the votes of the Kellogg electors. Objections of a similar tenor were also offered by Mr. William A. Wallace, of Pennsylvania, a Senator, and Mr. Alexander G. Cochrane, of Pennsylvania, a Representative.

The two Houses separated to consider and determine the objections to the report of the Commission; and the two Houses not concurring, the Presiding Officer announced that the decision of the Electoral Commission would stand unreversed, when the joint convention reassembled on February 20.[2] The decision of the House was that the votes of the Kellogg electors be not counted.

1973. In 1877 an objection was made to one elector of Michigan on the ground that he had been improperly chosen in place of an elector alleged to be disqualified; but the two Houses decided to count the vote.— On February 20, 1877,[3] during the session of the joint convention of the two Houses for the counting of the electoral vote, the certificate from the State of Michigan was opened and read, and the presiding officer, having asked for objection thereto, Mr. J. Randolph Tucker, of Virginia, a Representative, filed objections to the vote of Daniel L. Crossman as an elector on the ground that: (1) A certain Benton Hanchett was voted for and certified to have been elected and appointed an elector of Michigan, and that on November 7, 1876, the day of the Presidential election, was and for a long period prior thereto had been, and up to and after December 6, 1876, when the electors voted according to law, continued to be a United States commissioner, and therefore could not be appointed an elector under the Constitution of the United States; (2) that the laws of Michigan give power to fill vacancies occasioned only "by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend," and therefore that the choice of Crossman in place of Hanchett was not legal. Evidence accompanying the objections showed that Mr. Hanchett neglected to attend the meeting of the electors, because of his disqualification.

There being no further objections to the vote of Michigan, the Senate withdrew in order that the two Houses might consider the objections separately.

On the same day[1] the House considered the objections; and Mr. Tucker submitted the following resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That Daniel L. Crossman was not appointed an elector by the State of Michigan as its legislature directed, and that the vote of said Daniel L. Crossman as an elector of said State be not counted.

After debate Mr. George A. Jenks, of Pennsylvania, offered the following substitute, which was agreed to:

Whereas, the fact being established that it is about twelve years since the alleged ineligible elector exercised any of the functions of a United States Commissioner, it is not sufficiently proven that at the time of his appointment he was an officer of the United States; therefore,

Resolved, That the vote objected to be counted.

When the two Houses reassembled in joint convention, the Secretary read the determination of the Senate:

Resolved, That the objection made to the vote of Daniel L. Crossman, one of the electors of Michigan is not good in law and is not sustained by any lawful evidence.

Resolved, That said vote be counted with the other votes of the electors of said States, notwithstanding the objections made thereto.

The determination of the House having been read, the Presiding Officer announced that, the two Houses not concurring in ordering otherwise, the full electoral vote of Michigan would be cast for Hayes and Wheeler.[2]

1974. In 1877 an elector of Nevada was objected to as disqualified, but because of an error in the objection it was not pressed, and the vote was counted.—On February 20, 1877,[3] the certificates from the State of Nevada were opened in the joint convention for counting the electoral vote, and objections having been called for, Mr. William M. Springer, of Illinois, filed objections to the vote of R. M. Daggett, an elector, on the ground that on the 7th of November, 1876, and for a long period prior thereto, as well as after that date, the said Daggett was a United States commissioner and, therefore, might not under the Constitution of the United States be appointed an elector. As a part of the objection was filed evidence tending to show that Daggett was clerk of the district and circuit courts of Nevada, and not a commissioner. He had resigned by telegraph just preceding election.

The two Houses having separated to consider the objections, on February 21,[4] in the House, Mr. Springer announced that there was an error in the objection in stating the office held by the elector. Therefore, as the Senate had acted on the objection, and as the House could not amend it, he offered this resolution:

Resolved, That the vote of R. M. Daggett, one of the electors of the State of Nevada, be counted, the objections to the contrary notwithstanding.

The joint convention having reassembled,[5] and the action of the Senate having been reported in identical terms with that of the House, the presiding officer announced that the full vote of Nevada would be counted for Hayes and Wheeler.[6]

1975. There being conflicting electoral certificates from Oregon in 1877, the Electoral Commission decided in favor of the electors whom the Secretary of State legally certified as having the highest number of votes, although the governor had issued a certificate to others.

An elector disqualified by reason of holding another office, resigned both offices, whereupon he was made eligible to fill the vacancy thus caused among the electors.

On February 21, 1877,[1] during the session of the two Houses in joint convention for the counting of the electoral vote, the certificates from the State of Oregon were presented. From these certificates and accompanying papers the following facts appeared:

That at the election on November 7, 1876, J. C. Cartwright, W. H. Odell, and J. W. Watts had received, respectively, 15,214 and 15,206 and 15,206 votes as electors, and that E. A. Cronin received 14,157 votes, W. B. Laswell 14,149 votes, and Henry Kippel 14,136 votes.

That J. W. Watts, by reason of being postmaster at the time of his election, did on the day of the assembling of the electors to cast their votes, December 6, 1876, resign as an elector, and was by the votes of the other electors chosen to fill the vacancy caused by his own resignation. It also appears by other testimony [2] that said Watts had, previous to December 6, 1876, resigned as postmaster.

That both the governor and secretary of state of Oregon refused, upon demand, to deliver to said Cartwright, Odell, and Watts certified lists of electors, but that he did deliver such lists to E. A. Cronin.

That the governor delivered a duly executed certificate of the election of Odell, Cartwright, and Cronin, giving the votes for each, which, he certified, were "the highest number cast at said election for persons eligible." That is, he had declined a certificate to Watts on account of his alleged disqualification, and had certified the opponent having the highest number of votes, namely, Cronin.

That when the electors met Cartwright and Odell refused to act with Cronin, whereupon the latter appointed J. N. T. Miller and John Parker to fill the vacancies.

That Odell, Cartwright, and Watts certified their votes for Hayes and Wheeler, accompanying it by a tabulated vote of the vote of Oregon for electors, certified by the secretary of state.

That Cronin, Miller, and Parker certified that they cast two votes for Hayes and Wheeler and one vote for Tilden and Hendricks, and their certificate accompanied the duly executed certificate of the governor, setting forth that Odell, Cartwright, and Cronin had been elected.

The certificates having been read by the tellers, and objections having been called for, Mr. John H. Mitchell, of Oregon, a Senator, offered objections that: (1) Neither Cronin, Miller, nor Parker were appointed electors in the manner directed by the legislature of Oregon or in any other manner; (2) Odell, Cartwright, and Watts were duly and legally appointed electors, as appeared from the certificates; (3) it did not appear from the face of the governor's certificate that it was issued to the three persons having the highest number of votes, and duly and legally chosen, but was issued by the governor to the persons deemed eligible, although one of such persons was not appointed according to the laws of the State; (4) it appeared from the certificate of the secretary of state, attached to and made a part of the returns of Odell, Cartwright, and Watts, that these received the highest number of votes, and the same also appeared from the official declaration of the secretary of state on December 4, following the election, and, therefore, the certificate of the governor in certifying Cronin, instead of Watts, failed to conform to the laws of Congress and of Oregon;

(5) Odell and Cartwright, a majority of the electoral college and duly appointed, filled the vacancy, as shown by the record, by the election of Watts.

Mr. William Lawrence, of Ohio, a Representative, filed further objections, that: (1) Messrs. Cronin, Miller, and Parker, or any one of them, were not appointed electors; (2) Odell, Cartwright, and Watts were duly appointed, cast their votes legally for Hayes and Wheeler, and their certificates were the only true and lawful lists; (3) these latter received the highest number of votes cast in Oregon for electors, and such fact was duly canvassed and certified by the secretary of state.

Mr. James K. Kelly, of Oregon, a Senator, filed objections to the Odell, Cartwright, and Watts certificates for reason that: (1) No certificate of the governor was annexed as required by sections 136 and 138, Revised Statutes; (2) they had not annexed to them a list of names of the said persons as electors with the seal of Oregon affixed by the secretary of state and signed by the governor and secretary as required by section 60, chapter 14, title 9, of the general laws of Oregon; (3) Watts was ineligible as an elector because he was a postmaster on the date of the election, November 7, 1876; (4) when the governor caused the lists of names of electors to be certified the name of Watts was not included; (5) it was the right and duty of the governor to certify as he did "the three persons capable of being appointed Presidential electors who received the highest number of votes; (6) Cartwright and Odell had no right to appoint Watts an elector on December 6, 1876, as there was no vacancy on that date; and (7) as they did not compose any part of the electoral college of Oregon as on that day constituted; and also (8) because Watts was still a postmaster.

On February 24, 1877,[1] the Presiding Officer laid before the joint convention the report of the Electoral Commission signed by the eight concurring Commissioners. They found that the votes of Odell, Cartwright, and Watts were those provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and as therein certified were to be counted for Hayes and Wheeler; and that the three persons above named were duly appointed electors in Oregon. The report continues:

> The brief ground of this decision is that it appears, upon such evidence as by the Constitution and the law named in said act of Congress is competent and pertinent to the consideration of the subject, that the before-mentioned electors appear to have been lawfully appointed such electors of President and Vice-President of the United States for the term beginning March 4, A. D. 1877, of the State of Oregon, and that they voted as such at the time and in the manner provided for by the Constitution of the United States and the law.
> And we are further of opinion that by the laws of the State of Oregon the duty of canvassing the returns of all the votes given at an election for electors of President and Vice-President was imposed upon the secretary of state and upon no one else; that the secretary of state did canvass the returns in the case before us and thereby ascertained that J. C. Cartwright, W. H. Odell, and J. W. Watts had a majority of all the votes given for electors and had the highest number of votes for that office, and by the express language of the statute those persons are deemed elected; that in obedience to his duty the secretary made a canvass and a tabulated statement of the votes, showing this result, which, according to law, he placed on file in his office on the 4th day of December, A. D. 1876. All this appears by an official certificate under the seal of the State and signed by him and delivered by him to the electors and forwarded by them to the President of the Senate with their vote.

[1] Journal, pp. 527, 528; Record, p. 1887.

That the refusal or failure of the governor of Oregon to sign the certificate of the election of the persons so elected does not have the effect of defeating their appointment of such electors; that the act of the governor of Oregon in giving to E. A. Cronin a certificate of his election, though he received a thousand votes less than Watts, on the ground that the latter was ineligible was without authority of law and is therefore void.

That although the evidence shows that Watts was a postmaster at the time of his election, that fact is rendered immaterial by his resignation both as postmaster and elector and his subsequent appointment to fill the vacancy so made by the electoral college.

Mr. James K. Kelly, of Oregon, a Senator, having filed objections to this decision, the Senate withdrew to their Chamber that the two Houses might separately consider and determine the said objections.

The joint convention having reassembled,[1] the Presiding Officer announced that as the two Houses did not concur otherwise the decision would stand unreversed. The Senate had determined that the decision should stand and the House that the vote given by J. W. Watts should not be counted.[2]

1976. In 1877 an objection was made that one of the electors of Pennsylvania was illegally appointed; but the vote was counted.—On February 24, 1877,[3] during the session of the joint convention for counting the electoral vote, the certificates from the State of Pennsylvania were read, when Mr. William S. Stenger, of that State, a Representative, submitted objections to the counting of the vote of Henry A. Boggs as an elector on the grounds that: (1) A certain Daniel J. Morrill was a candidate for elector and was declared by the governor to have been duly elected; (2) said Morrill was not duly elected because for a long time before, and on November 7, 1876, and for a long period subsequent thereto, he held the office of Centennial Commissioner under the act of March 3, 1871; (3) said Morrill could not be constitutionally appointed an elector; (4) he did not attend the meeting of the electors and had no right to attend; (5) the law of Pennsylvania provides in regard to filling vacances: "If any such elector shall die, or from any cause fail to attend at the seat of government at the time appointed by law, the electors present shall proceed to choose viva voce a person to fill the vacancy occasioned thereby, and immediately after such choice the name of the person so chosen shall be transmitted by the presiding officer of the college to the governor, whose duty it shall be forthwith to cause notice in writing to be given to such person of his election, and the person so elected [and not the person in whose place he shall have been chosen] shall be an elector, and shall, with the other electors, perform the duties enjoined on them as aforesaid;" (6) the electors present had no authority to appoint the said Boggs, and such action was without authority of law, null and void; (7) and said Broggs was therefore not appointed in the manner directed by the legislature, and his vote as such elector could not constitutionally be counted.

With the objection, and as a part of it, certain testimony was filed.

On February 26,[4] the House and Senate having separated to consider the objections, they were considered in the House, and Mr. William D. Kelley, of Pennsylvania, submitted the following:

Resolved, That the vote of Henry A. Boggs be counted as an elector for the State of Pennsylvania, the objections to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. William S. Stenger, of Pennsylvania, submitted the following as a substitute therefor:

Resolved, That the vote of Henry A. Boggs as an elector for the State of Pennsylvania should not be counted, because the said Boggs was not appointed an elector for said State in such manner as the legislature directed.

After debate the substitute was agreed to, yeas 135, nays 119, and the original resolution as amended by the substitute was then agreed to.

The same day [1] the joint convention reconvened, and the action of the Senate was reported as follows:

Resolved, That the vote of Henry A. Boggs be counted with the other votes of the electors of Pennsylvania, notwithstanding the objection thereto.

The action of the House having been reported, the Presiding Officer announced that as the two Houses did not concur in ordering otherwise, the full electoral vote of the State of Pennsylvania would be cast for Hayes and Wheeler.[2]

1977. In 1877 objection was made to one of the conflicting electoral certificates from South Carolina on the ground that the election was not legal for want of proper law, that there was no republican form of government in the State, etc.; but the certificate was admitted.

The Houses of Congress do not have, in counting the electoral vote, the power to inquire into the circumstances under which the primary vote for Presidential electors is given.

On February 26, 1877,[3] during the joint convention for the counting of the electoral vote the certificates from the State of South Carolina were read. There were found to be two sets of certificates. Mr. Alexander G. Cochrane, of Pennsylvania, a Representative, submitted objections to the certificates of the electoral votes of C. C. Bowen, John Winsmith, T. B. Johnson, Timothy Hurley, W. B. Nash, Wilson Cook, and W. B. Meyers on the grounds that: (1) No legal election was held in the State, no registration law having been provided by the legislature, as required by the constitution of the State; (2) a republican form of government did not exist in the State on January 1, 1876, nor at any time thereafter up to and including December 10, 1876; (3) a legal and free election was prevented by the presence of soldiers of the United States near the polling places; (4) deputy marshals of the United States, acting under illegal instructions, prevented a fair election; (5) there was from January 1, 1876, to December 10, 1876, at no time a State government, except a pretended government set up in violation of law and the Constitution of the United States, and sustained by Federal troops.

These objections having been presented, Mr. John J. Patterson, of South Carolina, a Senator, submitted objections to the electoral votes cast by Theodore

G. Barker, Samuel McGowan, John W. Harrington, John I. Ingram, William Wallace, John B. Erwin, and Robert Aldrich, on the grounds that: (1) They were not appointed electors; (2) the papers have not annexed to them a certificate of the governor of South Carolina as required by sections 136 and 138 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; (3) the papers have not annexed to them a list of the names of the said alleged electors, to which the seal of the State was affixed by the secretary of state, and signed by the governor and secretary as required by the State laws; (4) C. C. Bowen, John Winsmith, and their associates were appointed electors at the time and place prescribed by law, cast their votes for Hayes and Wheeler, and the lists of votes signed, certified, and transmitted by such electors are the only true and lawful lists of votes for President and Vice-President; (5) C. C. Bowen, John Winsmith, and their associates received the highest number of all the votes cast for electors on November 7, 1876; the proper State officers duly canvassed the votes, made and certified under seal and delivered to the said Bowen, Winsmith, etc., lists of the electors, showing that they had the highest number of votes and were elected; (6) the lists of votes cast by Bowen, Winsmith, and their associates have annexed the certificate of the governor of the State as required by sections 136 and 138 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; and (7) the said lists of votes have a list of the names of the said electors, to which the seal of the State of South Carolina was affixed by the secretary of state and signed by the governor and secretary as required by the laws of the State.

The certificates and objections were referred to the Electoral Commission, and the Senate withdrew.

On February 28, 1877,[1] the report of the Commission was received in the joint convention. It was signed by the eight concurring commissioners, and found that the votes of Bowen, Winsmith, and their associates, named in the certificate of D. H. Chamberlain, governor, were the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States and were lawfully to be counted, as certified, for Hayes and Wheeler; and that the seven persons above named, Messrs. Bowen, Winsmith, and their associates, were duly appointed electors in and by the State of South Carolina. The report continues:

> The brief ground of this decision is that it appears, upon such evidence as by the Constitution and the law named in said act of Congress is competent and pertinent to the consideration of the subject, that the before-mentioned electors appear to have been lawfully appointed such electors of President and Vice-President of the United States for the term beginning March 4, A. D. 1877, of the State of South Carolina, and that they voted as such at the time and in the manner provided for by the Constitution of the United States and the law.
> And the Commission, as further ground for their decision, are of the opinion that the failure of the legislature to provide a system for the registration of persons entitled to vote does not render nugatory all elections held under laws otherwise sufficient, though it may be the duty of the legislature to enact such a law. If it were otherwise, all government in that State is a usurpation, its officers without authority, and the social compact in that State is at an end.
> That this Commission must take notice that there is a government in South Carolina republican in form, since its constitution provides for such a government, and it is and was on the day of appointing electors so recognized by the Executive and by both branches of the legislative department of the Government of the United States.

[1] Journal, pp. 570–573; Record, p. 2006.

That so far as this Commission can take notice of the presence of the soldiers of the United States in the State of South Carolina during the election, it appears that they were placed there by the President of the United States to suppress insurrection, at the request of the proper authorities of the State.

And we are also of the opinion that, from the papers before us, it appears that the governor and secretary of state have certified under the seal of the State that the electors whose vote we have decided to be the lawful electoral vote of the State were duly appointed electors, which certificate, both by presumption by law and by the certificate of the rival claimants of the electoral office, was based upon the action of the State canvassers. There exists no power in this Commission, and there exists none in the two Houses of Congress in counting the electoral vote, to inquire into the circumstances under which the primary vote for electors was given. The power of the Congress of the United States in its legislative capacity to inquire into the matters alleged, and to act upon the information so obtained, is a very different one from its power in the matter of counting the electoral vote. The votes to be counted are those presented by the State, and when ascertained and presented by the proper authorities of the State they must be counted.

The Presiding Officer having asked for objections to the decision, Mr. John F. Philips, of Missouri, a Representative, presented objections, as did also Mr. Milton I. Southard, of Ohio, a Representative. The objections, besides restating some of the original objections to counting the vote, alleged that the Electoral Commission had neglected or refused to inquire into facts and allegations presented to it, and that certificate number 1 was void because of irregularity in the swearing of the electors, because it did not state that the electors voted by ballot, and because the certificate was not that required by the laws of the United States.

The Senate then withdrew, and the House and Senate proceeded to consideration of the objections to the report of the Commission. The Senate, after debate, decided that the decision of the Commission should stand as the judgment of the Senate, while the House decided that the objections to the decision be sustained by the House.

These decisions being reported in the joint convention,[1] the Presiding Officer, under the law,[2] announced that the two Houses not concurring otherwise, the decision of the Commission would stand unreversed.[3]

1978. Objection was made to the manner of appointment of one of the electors of Rhode Island in 1877, but the two Houses decided to count the vote.—On February 26, 1877,[4] during the session of the joint convention for the counting of the electoral vote, the certificates from the State of Rhode Island had been read, when Mr. William J. O'Brien, of Maryland, a Representative, presented objections to counting the vote of William S. Slater as an elector for the reasons that (1) the said Slater was not duly appointed an elector at the election on November 7, 1876; (2) George H. Corliss, according to the decision of the Electoral Commission rendered in the counting of the vote of John W. Watts, as elector of the State of Oregon, if said decision be law, was duly appointed elector by the State of Rhode Island, and the substitution for him of the said Slater was illegal and unconstitutional; (3) if in any event it was competent to complete the electoral college of Rhode Island by adding another elector thereto, it could only have been done under the law as announced by the said Electoral Commission, and pursuant to the laws of said State by act of the majority of the members of said college, and not by the legislature of said State.

The Senate having withdrawn and the House having proceeded to the consideration of the objections, Mr. O'Brien offered this resolution:

Resolved, That the vote of William S. Slater, as elector for the State of Rhode Island should not be counted because said Slater was not appointed or elected elector for said State in such manner as its legislature had directed.

Mr. Benjamin T. Eames, of Rhode Island, offered as a substitute therefor the following:

Resolved, That the vote of William S. Slater as an elector for the State of Rhode Island be counted, the objections thereto to the contrary notwithstanding.

After debate, Mr. Eames's substitute was agreed to.

The two Houses having reassembled[1] in joint convention, and the action of the Senate, which was the same as that of the House, was reported; then the action of the House. The Presiding Officer then announced that the two Houses concurred in ordering the full electoral vote of the State of Rhode Island to be cast for Hayes and Wheeler.[2]

1979. In 1877 objection was made that a Wisconsin elector was disqualified by reason of holding another office; but the vote was counted.—On March 1, 1877,[3] during the session of the joint convention for counting the electoral vote, the Presiding Officer opened the certificates from the State of Wisconsin, and the same having been read Mr. William P. Lynde, of Wisconsin, a Representative, presented objections upon the grounds that (1) Daniel L. Downs, who had voted as an elector, held the office of pension examining surgeon prior to November 7, 1876, the date of the Presidential election, and upon said day, and upon December 6, 1876, at the time he assumed to cast his vote as an elector. An abstract of testimony accompanied this objection.

The Senate withdrew, and the two Houses considered the objections separately. In the House Mr. Lynde offered this resolution:

Resolved, That the vote of Daniel L. Downs as an elector of the State of Wisconsin should not be counted, because he held an office of trust and profit under the United States, and therefore was not constitutionally appointed an elector by the said State of Wisconsin.

Mr. Lucien B. Caswell, of Wisconsin, offered the following as a substitute:

Resolved, That the vote of D. L. Downs be counted with the other votes of the electors of the State of Wisconsin, the objections thereto notwithstanding.

After debate, the substitute was rejected, yeas 77, nays 136. The original resolution of Mr. Lynde was then agreed to.[4]

The joint convention having reassembled,[5] the action of the Senate was read in the form of a resolution declaring that the vote of Daniel L. Downs should be counted.

The Presiding Officer then announced that, the two Houses not concurring otherwise, the full electoral vote of Wisconsin would be cast for Hayes and Wheeler.[1]

1980. Objection was made to the manner of appointment of one of the electors of Vermont in 1877; but the vote was counted.—On February 28, 1877,[2] during the joint convention for counting the electoral vote, the Presiding Officer opened the certificate from the State of Vermont, and the same having been read Mr. William M. Springer, of Illinois, a Representative, presented objections to the counting of the vote for the reason that two returns, or papers purporting to be returns, of the electoral vote were forwarded to the President of the Senate and that only one of said returns had been laid before the two Houses, the President of the Senate having stated that but one return had been received by him from said State. As a part of this objection a duplicate copy of one of said returns was submitted for the consideration of the Senate and House.[3]

Further objections were presented by Mr. Earley F. Poppleton, of Ohio, a Representative, on the grounds that (1) Henry S. Sollace, certified to have been elected November 7, 1876, was on that day and for a long time before had been a postmaster; (2) the law of Vermont did not authorize the election of said Sollace to fill the vacancy alleged to have been the result of the absence of said Sollace from the college of electors; (3) it did not appear that said Sollace had resigned the office of postmaster at the date of his appointment to the college of electors, which fact was proper to be inquired of by the Commission; (4) it was proper for the Commission to inquire whether Amos Aldrcih, who received the highest number of votes next to those cast for Sollace, and who was certified as an elector by certificate No. 2, was not duly appointed an elector.

The Presiding Officer did not recognize the existence of double returns from Vermont [4] and accordingly did not submit the case to the Electoral Commission.

The Senate then withdrew and the House proceeded to the consideration of the objections. After debate, on March 1,[5] by a vote of 207 yeas to 26 nays, the House decided that—the vote of Henry S. Sollace, claiming to be an elector from the State of Vermont, be not counted,

The joint convention having reassembled[6] the action of the Senate was announced as favorable to counting the vote of Henry S. Sollace. Thereupon the Presiding Officer announced that, as the two Houses did not concur in ordering otherwise, the whole vote of Vermont would be counted.[1]

5. Former practice as to notifying President of his election. Section 2000.

1981. When the House elects a President of the United States a quorum consists of a Member, or Members, from two-thirds of the States.

Provisions of the Constitution governing proceedings of the House in electing a President.

The Constitution of the United States, in article 12, provides for the election of a President by the House in case no person have a majority of the Electoral College. The Constitution says:

If no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest numbers not exceeding three on the list of those voted for as President the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President. But in choosing the President the votes shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote.[1] A quorum for this purpose shall consist of a Member or Members from two-thirds of the States, and a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice.

1982. Rules adopted in 1801 for the election of a President of the United States by the House of Representatives.—On February 2, 1801,[2] the House adopted this resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare and report such rules as, in their opinion, are proper to be adopted by this House, to be observed in the choice of a President of the United States, whose term is to commence on the 4th day of March next, if, when the votes which have been given by the electors appointed under the authority of the States shall have been counted, as prescribed by the Constitution, it shall appear that no person for whom the electors shall have voted has a majority, or that more than one person, having such majority, have an equal number of votes.

---

* See Volume VI, Chapter CXCII.

[1] Previous to 1804 the Constitution had provision as follows on this subject:

"The person having the greatest number of votes shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if there be more than one who have such majority, and have an equal number of votes, then the House of Representatives shall immediately chuse by ballot one of them for President; and if no person have a majority, then from the five highest on the list the said House shall in like manner chuse the President. But in chusing the President, the votes shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote; a quorum for this purpose shall consist of a Member or Members from two-thirds of the States, and a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice. In every case, after the choice of the President, the person having the greatest number of votes of the electors shall be the Vice-President. But if there should remain two or more who have equal votes, the Senate shall chuse from them by ballot the Vice-President.

[2] Second session Sixth Congress, Journal, pp. 782, 787, 789–792 (Gales & Seaton ed.); Annals, pp. 990, 1007–1011.

It was then ordered that the following constitute a committee pursuant to the resolution: John Rutledge, of South Carolina; John Nicholas, of Virginia; Roger Griswold, of Connecticut; Nathaniel Macon, of North Carolina; James A. Bayard, of Delaware; Benjamin Taliaferro, of Georgia; Abiel Foster, of New Hampshire; William C. C. Claiborne, of Tennessee; Harrison G. Otis, of Massachusetts; Thomas T. Davis, of Kentucky; Lewis R. Morris, of Vermont; Christopher G. Champlin, of Rhode Island; George Baer, of Maryland; William Cooper, of New York; James Linn, of New Jersey; and Henry Woods, of Pennsylvania.

This committee was thus composed of one Member from each State.

On February 6 the committee reported, and on February 9 the report was considered in Committee of the Whole and in the House. Two features of the report caused discussion and division. The rule that forbade adjournment until a choice should be made was sustained by 53 yeas to 47 nays, and the rule that the doors should be closed during the balloting was sustained by 54 yeas to 45 nays. The rules as agreed to were as follows:

1. In the event of its appearing, upon the counting and ascertaining of the votes given for President and Vice-President, according to the mode prescribed by the Constitution, that no person has a constitutional majority, and the same shall have been duly declared and entered on the journals of this House, the Speaker, accompanied by the Members of the House, shall return to their Chamber.

2. Seats shall be provided in this House for the President and members of the Senate,[1] and notification of the same shall be made to the Senate.

3. The House, on their return from the Senate Chamber, it being ascertained that the constitutional number of States are present, shall immediately proceed to choose one of the persons from whom the choice is to be made for President; and in case upon the first ballot there shall not appear to be a majority of the States in favor of one of them, in such case the House shall continue to ballot for a President, without interruption by other business, until it shall appear that a President is duly chosen.

4. After commencing the balloting for President, the House shall not adjourn until a choice be made.

5. The doors of the House shall be closed during the balloting, except against the officers of the House.

6. In balloting, the following mode shall be observed, to wit: The Representatives of the respective States shall be so seated that the delegation of each State shall be together. The Representatives of each State shall, in the first instance, ballot among themselves, in order to ascertain the votes of the State, and it shall be allowed, where deemed necessary by the delegation, to name one or more persons of the representation to be tellers of the ballots. After the vote of each State is ascertained, duplicates thereof shall be made; and in case the vote of the State be for one person, then the name of that person shall be written on each of the duplicates; and in case the ballots of the State be equally divided, then the word "divided" shall be written on each duplicate, and the said duplicates shall be deposited in manner hereafter prescribed, in boxes to be provided. That, for the conveniently taking the ballots of the several Representatives of the respective States, there be sixteen ballot boxes provided; and that there be additionally two boxes provided for the purpose of receiving the votes of the States; that after the delegation of each State shall have ascertained the vote of the State, the Sergeant-at-Arms shall carry to the respective delegations the two ballot boxes, and the delegation of each State, in the presence and subject to the examination of all the members of the delegation, shall deposit a duplicate of the vote of the State in each ballot box; and where there is more than one Representative of a State the duplicates shall not both be deposited by the same person. When the votes of the States are all thus taken in, the Sergeant-at-Arms shall carry one of the general ballot boxes to one table and the other to a second and separate table. Sixteen members shall then be appointed as tellers of the ballots, one of whom shall be taken from each State, and be nominated by the delegation of the State from which he was taken. The said tellers shall be divided into two equal sets, according to such agreement as shall be made among themselves, and one of the said sets of tellers shall proceed to count the votes in one of the said boxes and the other set the votes in the other box; and in the event of no appointment of teller by any delegation, the Speaker shall in such case appoint. When the votes of the States are counted by the respective sets of tellers, the result shall be reported to the House; and if the reports agree, the same shall be accepted as the true votes of the States; but if the reports disagree, the States shall immediately proceed to a new ballot in manner aforesaid.

7. If either of the persons voted for shall have a majority of the votes of all the States the Speaker shall declare the same, and official notice thereof shall be immediately given to the President of the United States and to the Senate.

8. All questions which shall arise after the balloting commences, and which shall be decided by the House voting per capita, to be incidental to the power of choosing the President, and which shall require the decision of the House, shall be decided by States, and without debate; and in case of an equal division of the votes of States, the question shall be lost.

1983. The election of a President of the United States by the House in 1801.

There being no choice in the electoral college in 1801, the House of Representatives proceeded to elect a President of the United States.

At the election of a President of the United States by the House in 1801 no adjournment was taken during the ballotings, which lasted, with postponements, for several days.

While the House was balloting for the election of a President of the United States, in 1801, the Speaker signed enrolled bills and messages were received but not acted on.

On February 11, 1801,[1] immediately after the electoral count[2] (which was held in the Senate chamber) had disclosed that there was no choice for President of the United States the two Houses separated, and the House of Representatives returned to their chamber, where they proceeded in the manner prescribed by the Constitution to choose a President of the United States. Members were appointed tellers of the respective States, to examine ballots of each State, pursuant to the sixth rule.

The Members of the respective States then proceeded to ballot in the manner prescribed by the rule,[3] and the tellers having put duplicates of their votes into the general ballot boxes prepared for the purpose, the votes contained therein were taken out and counted, and the result being reported to the Speaker, he declared to the House that the votes of eight States had been given to Thomas Jefferson, of Virginia; the votes of six States to Aaron Burr, of New York, and that the votes of two States were divided.

The Constitution of the United States requiring that the votes of nine States should be necessary to constitute a choice, a motion was made and seconded that the ballot for President be repeated in one hour. The question being taken by States, it passed in the negative.

The balloting then continued,[4] either continuously or at intervals, as directed

[4] During the ballotings sundry messages from the President of the United States, from the Senate, and communications from Departments were received, and reports from committees made; but it being contrary to the rules established for the House to take them into consideration at that time, they were received and acted on after the balloting was concluded. The Speaker also signed enrolled bills during the balloting. Journal, p. 800; Annals, p. 1029.

by order of the House, voting by States, until the morning of February 12th, when, after the twenty-eighth ballot, no change from the first ballot having taken place, it was Ordered, That the ballot be repeated to-morrow at 11 o'clock and not before.

On February 13 one ballot was taken, and then it was Ordered, That the ballot be repeated to-morrow at 12 o'clock and not before.

This postponement of the balloting took the place of motions to adjourn,[1] and thus the sessions were carried along until February 17th, when, on the thirty-sixth ballot, the tellers reported a result to the Speaker, who "declared to the House that the votes of ten States had been given for Thomas Jefferson, of Virginia; the votes of four States for Aaron Burr, of New York; and that the votes of two States had been given in blank; and that, consequently, Thomas Jefferson, of Virginia, had been, agreeably to the Constitution, elected President of the United States, for the term of four years, commencing on the 4th day of March next.[2]

It was then

Ordered, That Mr. Pinckney, Mr. Tazewell, and Mr. Bayard be appointed a committee to wait on the President of the United States and notify him that Thomas Jefferson is elected President of the United States for the term commencing on the 4th day of March next.

Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform them that Thomas Jefferson has been duly elected President of the United States for the term of four years, commencing on the 4th day of March next; and that the Clerk of this House do go with the said message.

The House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of an appropriation bill.

1984. The rules adopted by the House to govern the voting for a President of the United States when the election was thrown into the House by the failure of the Electoral College to make a choice in 1825.

In the election of President by the House in 1825 there was a strong but not prevailing sentiment that the galleries should not be closed.

In the election of President by the House in 1825 the prevailing sentiment favored a ballot box for each State.

Instance of the early practice of considering subjects in Committee of the Whole, irrespective of appropriations of money.

On February 7, 1825,[3] the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; and after some time spent therein, the Speaker resumed the chair, and Mr. John W. Taylor, of New York, reported that the committee had, according to order, again had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the report of the committee appointed to prepare and report rules to be observed by the House in the election of a President of the United States,[1] whose term of service was to commence on the 4th day of March, 1825, and had come to no decision thereon. It was then ordered that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the report and rules.

[1] The postponement of the balloting seems to have been a device to avoid the inconveniences of the rule prohibiting an adjournment until the election of a President.

[2] The Journal shows that in accordance with the rule the roll was called by States and those present were entered on the Journal (p. 796).

[3] Second session Eighteenth Congress, Journal, pp. 213, 215, 220, 222.

The House then adopted the following rules, which were substantially in the form agreed to in the committee:

1. In the event of its appearing, on opening all the certificates, and counting the votes given by the electors of the several States for President, that no person has a majority of the votes of the whole number of electors appointed, the same shall be entered on the Journals of this House.

2. The roll of the House shall then be called by States; and, on its appearing that a Member or Members from two-thirds of the States are present, the House shall immediately proceed, by ballot, to choose a President from the persons having the highest numbers, not exceeding three, on the list of those voted for as President; and, in case neither of those persons shall receive the votes of a majority of all the States on the first ballot, the House shall continue to ballot for a President, without interruption by other business, until a President be chosen.

3. The doors of the Hall shall be closed during the balloting, except against the Members of the Senate, stenographers, and the officers of the House.

4. From the commencement of the balloting until an election is made no proposition to adjourn shall be received, unless on the motion of one State, seconded by another State, and the question shall be decided by States. The same rule shall be observed in regard to any motion to change the usual hour for the meeting of the House.

5. In balloting the following mode shall be observed, to wit:

The Representatives of each State shall be arranged and seated together, beginning with the seats at the right hand of the Speaker's chair, with the Members from the State of Maine; thence, proceeding with the Members from the States, in the order the States are usually named for receiving petitions,[2] around the Hall of the House, until all are seated.

A ballot box shall be provided for each State.

The Representatives of each State shall, in the first instance, ballot among themselves, in order to ascertain the vote of their State; and they may, if necessary, appoint tellers of their ballots.

After the vote of each State is ascertained, duplicates thereof shall be made out; and in case any one of the persons from whom the choice is to be made shall receive a majority of the votes given, on any one balloting by the Representatives of a State, the name of that person shall be written on each of the duplicates; and in case the votes so given shall be divided so that neither of said persons shall have a majority of the whole number of votes given by such State, on any one balloting, then the word "divided" shall be written on each duplicate.

After the delegation from each State shall have ascertained the vote of their State, the Clerk shall name the States in the order they are usually named for receiving petitions; and as the name of each is called the Sergeant-at-Arms shall present to the delegation of each two ballot boxes, in each of which shall be deposited, by some Representative of the State, one of the duplicates made as aforesaid of the vote of said State, in the presence and subject to the examination of all the Members from said State then present; and where there is more than one Representative from a State, the duplicates shall not both be deposited by the same person.

When the votes of the States are thus all taken in, the Sergeant-at-Arms shall carry one of said ballot boxes to one table and the other to a separate and distinct table.

One person from each State represented in the balloting shall be appointed by the Representatives to tell off said ballots; but, in case the Representatives fail to appoint a teller, the Speaker shall appoint.

---

[1] Article XII of the Constitution provides that if no person have a majority of the Electoral College the House of Representatives, voting by States, shall choose by ballot from the three candidates having the highest number of votes.

[2] Petitions are no longer introduced in this way. This old order of calling the States began with Maine and proceeded through the original thirteen States and then through the remaining States in the order of their admission.

The said tellers shall divide themselves into two sets, as nearly equal in number as can be, and one of the said sets of tellers shall proceed to count the votes in one of said boxes, and the other set the votes in the other box.

When the votes are counted by the different sets of tellers, the result shall be reported to the House; and if the reports agree, the same shall be accepted as the true votes of the States; but if the reports disagree, the States shall proceed, in the same manner as before, to a new ballot.

6. All questions arising after the balloting commences, requiring the decision of the House, which shall be decided by the House, voting per capita, to be incidental to the power of choosing a President, shall be decided by States without debate; and in case of an equal division of the votes of States, the question shall be lost.

7. When either of the persons from whom the choice is to be made shall have received a majority of all the States, the Speaker shall declare the same, and that that person is elected President of the United States.

8. The result shall be immediately communicated to the Senate by message, and a committee of three persons shall be appointed to inform the President of the United States and the President-elect of said election.

On February 9, 1825, the election of John Quincy Adams took place in accordance with these rules.[1]

The record of debates[2] shows that in Committee of the Whole rules 1 and 2 were approved without objection. Over a paragraph reported in the third rule, that the galleries should be cleared on the demand of the delegation of any State, much debate arose, during which the precedent of the clearing of the galleries during the election of 1801 was referred to. Mr. Daniel Webster, of Massachusetts, thought it did not matter much anyway, but thought that the galleries should be cleared if any delegation wished. Mr. James Hamilton, of South Carolina, referred to the precedent of 1801 as the "celebrated, he could not say nefarious, contest between Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Burr." He believed that those who in that case closed the galleries to the people were the same who most strenuously supported the alien and sedition laws. Mr. Lewis McLane, of Delaware, argued strenuously that hereafter in time of great excitement the presence of the public in the gallery might be very prejudicial. That the Federal party had set the precedent was nothing against it, for the Federal party was the great constructive party. Disorder in the gallery of the New York legislature the year before was referred to. Mr. George McDuffie, of South Carolina, was for having the galleries open. To shut out the public might in future aid in corruption in the vote.

The next important debate arose over the section providing for the voting by ballot. Mr. Hamilton, of South Carolina, reenforced by Mr. McDuffie, from the same State, wanted an amendment whereby there should be a ballot box for each State, so the Journals might show how States voted. It was impossible to tell from the Journals of 1801 how the States voted. Such mystery should not prevail. Mr. Webster replied to this that some States had only one Member, and with the separate box for each State secrecy would be destroyed. Mr. Hamilton's amendment was also opposed, on the ground that it was not guarded on the subjects of blank ballots and plurality votes in the delegations.

Without debate on other amendments, the rules were adopted.

1985. The election of a President of the United States by the House in 1825.

The House having elected a President in 1825, ordered that the Senate be informed and appointed a committee to notify the President-elect.

The electoral count of 1825 having disclosed that there was no choice of a President of the United States, the two Houses then separated, and the Senate returned to their Chamber.

The House of Representatives[1] proceeded, in the manner prescribed by the Constitution, to the choice of a President of the United States, whose term of service was to commence on the 4th day of March, 1825, and the roll of the Members having been called by the Clerk, in pursuance of the second rule adopted by the House on the 7th instant, it appeared that every member was present except Robert S. Garnett, of Virginia (who was absent from indisposition).

The Members of the respective States having taken seats, as required in the fifth rule, adopted on the 7th instant, proceeded to ballot in the manner prescribed by the said rule, and the delegations of the respective States having placed duplicates of their votes in the two general ballot boxes, the said boxes were deposited on tables prepared for the purpose.

Whereupon the following men were appointed by the States, respectively, tellers to count the ballots, and report the result to the House, viz: [Here follow names of tellers.]

The tellers proceeded to examine and count the ballots, and having completed the same, and the votes in the two boxes agreeing, the tellers reported[2] that the votes of thirteen States had been given for John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts; that the votes of seven States had been given for Andrew Jackson, of Tennessee; and that the votes of four States had been given for William H. Crawford, of Georgia; whereupon,

The Speaker again announced the state of the votes to the House, and declared—

That John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts, having received a majority of the votes of all the States of this Union, was duly elected President of the United States for four years, to commence on the 4th of March, 1825.[3]

Ordered, That Mr. Webster, Mr. Vance, of Ohio, and Mr. Archer, of Virginia, be appointed a committee to wait on the President of the United States and inform him that John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts, has been duly chosen by the House of Representatives of the United States, according to the Constitution, President of the United States, for four years, commencing on the 4th day of March, 1825; as also to wait upon Mr. Adams, and notify him of his election as President.

Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate, notifying that body that this House has chosen John Quincy Adams, President of the United States, for the term of four years, commencing on the 4th day of March, 1825; and that the Clerk do go with the said message.

1986. Review of procedure at the several inaugurations of the Presidents, with record of the participation of the House therein.—The first inauguration of a President of the United States occurred on April 30, 1789.[4] Both Houses were in session, the condition in this respect differing from that usually existing at a regular inauguration, when the House of Representatives of one Congress has ceased to exist and the House of Representatives of the next Congress has usually not organized.

On April 9 the Senate had appointed a committee of three to confer with any committee of the House of Representatives in order to make arrangements for receiving the President.

On April 13[1] the House appointed a committee of three to consult with the committee of the Senate.

On April 30,[2] in accordance with the course agreed on by the committees of the two Houses, the House of Representatives were notified that the Senate were ready to receive them in the Senate Chamber, to attend the President of the United States while taking the oath required by the Constitution. Thereupon the House of Representatives, preceded by their Speaker, came into the Senate Chamber, and took the seats assigned them, and the joint committee, agreeably to order, introduced the President of the United States in the Senate Chamber, where he was received by the Vice-President, who conducted him to the chair. The Vice-President then informed him that—

> The Senate and House of Representatives of the United States were ready to attend him to take the oath required by the Constitution, and that it would be administered by the Chancellor of the State of New York.

The President having replied that he was ready, he was attended to the gallery in front of the Senate Chamber, where the oath was administered, after which the Chancellor proclaimed:

> Long live George Washington, President of the United States.

The President then returned to the Hall and addressed the Senators and Members.

1987. On March 2, 1793,[3] the President of the Senate notified the Senate that the President of the United States proposed to take the oath of office on March 4 next, at 12 o'clock m., in the Senate Chamber.

On March 4,[4] the Senate having assembled in special session in obedience to proclamation of the President of the United States, the President-elect attended and took his seat in the chair usually assigned the President of the Senate, the latter taking a seat to the right and a little in advance. A seat on the left was provided for Judge Cushing, who administered the oath. The doors being opened, the heads of Departments, foreign ministers, the late Speaker, such Members of the House as were in town, and other spectators attended.

Then the President-elect delivered his address and took the oath.

1988. On March 4, 1797,[5] the Senate repaired to the Hall of the House of Representatives "to attend the administration of the oath of office to John Adams, President of the United States." It does not appear from the Journals of the House or Senate that the President-elect communicated formally his desire as to the place for the taking of the oath. After the Senate were seated in the Hall of the House, the President-elect (attended by the heads of Departments, the marshal of the District and his officers) came into the Chamber and took his seat in the chair usually occupied by the Speaker. The Vice-President and Secretary of the Senate, the late Speaker of the House and the Clerk, and the Supreme Court were seated in front of the President-elect near the table of the Clerk. "The late President, the great and good Washington," says the Annals, "took a seat as a private citizen, a little in front of the seats assigned for the Senate." The foreign ministers and Members of the House took seats in the body of the Hall.

Having delivered his address and taken the oath, the President retired. Then the Senate returned to their Chamber, and the ceremonies were ended.

1989. On March 2, 1801,[1] a letter was presented in the Senate from the President-elect, announcing that he proposed to take the oath of office as President on the 4th instant, at 12 o'clock, in the Senate Chamber.

The Senate referred this letter to a committee, and later, on the same day, this order was agreed to:

> The President-elect of the United States having informed the Senate that he proposes to take the oath which the Constitution prescribes to the President of the United States before he enters on the execution of his office on Wednesday, the 4th instant, at 12 o'clock, in the Senate Chamber,
> Ordered, That the Secretary communicate that information to the House of Representatives; that seats be provided for such Members of the House of Representatives and such of the public officials as may think proper to attend; and that the gallery be opened to the citizens of the United States.

The ceremonies took place in the usual form in accordance with this order.

1990. On March 1, 1805,[2] the Speaker laid before the House a letter addressed to him, signed "Th. Jefferson," notifying that "he shall take the oath which the Constitution prescribes to the President of the United States before he enters on the execution of his office, on Monday, the 4th instant, at 12 o'clock, in the Senate Chamber."

The letter was read and ordered to lie on the table.

In 1805[3] the President-elect took the oath and delivered his inaugural in the Senate Chamber also, having by letter so announced his choice.

1991. On March 3, 1809,[4] a letter was laid before the Senate from the President-elect, stating that he proposed to take the oath of office in the Hall of the House of Representatives at 12 m. on March 4. The Senate appointed a committee of three to make arrangements, and on March 4 the Senate attended in the Hall of the House, and the President-elect took the oath and delivered his address.

Also on March 4, 1813,[5] the President-elect took the oath and delivered his address in the Hall of the House.

1992. On March 1, 1817,[1] in the Senate, it was—

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to make such arrangements as may be necessary for the reception of the President of the United States on the occasion of his inauguration.

On the same day the committee, having been appointed, reported this resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate inform the House of Representatives that the President-elect of the United States will, on Tuesday next, at 12 o'clock, take the oath of office required by the Constitution in the Chamber of the House of Representatives; and that he also inform the President-elect that the Senate will be in session at that time.

Nevertheless, on March 4,[2] the President came to the Senate Chamber and thence proceeded, not to the Hall of the House, but to the portico of the Capitol, where he took the oath and delivered his address. The report of the inauguration does not mention the House in the procession accompanying the President-elect to the portico.

Long after, in a debate which arose in the Senate on February 28, 1837,[3] Mr. Henry Clay, of Kentucky, recalled that he was presiding officer of the House at the time when preparations were made for the first inauguration of President Monroe, in 1817. The committee of the Senate applied to him as Speaker for the use of the Hall of the House for the inauguration, and he told them that he would have the Hall put in readiness for the occasion, but that he did not care to surrender control of it. The Senators also wished to bring into the Hall the fine red morocco chairs of the Senate Chamber, but Mr. Clay declined to permit this on the ground that the plain democratic chairs of the House were more becoming. The committee of the Senate retired somewhat offended,[4] and as a result the oath was administered to the President-elect on the portico.

The inaugurations of 1821[5] and 1825[6] occurred in the Hall of the House of Representatives, as they had at times previous to 1817.

On March 4, 1829,[7] the Vice-President laid before the Senate a letter from the President-elect, informing the Senate that he would take the oath prescribed by the Constitution on March 4, at 12 o'clock, "at such place as the Senate may think proper to designate." The Senate appointed a committee of three to make arrangements; and on March 4 the President-elect and the judges of the Supreme Court having entered the Senate Chamber, the Senate adjourned and the President-elect, attended by the Vice-President, the Supreme Court, the Senators, and the marshals of the day, proceeded to the eastern portico of the Capitol. Having delivered his address the President-elect took the oath.

The inaugurations for many years following 1829 followed that precedent, the President-elect going to the Senate Chamber, and the procession proceeding thence to the eastern portico.

1993. On February 28, 1837,[1] the President pro tempore of the Senate presented a letter from the President-elect of the United States, informing the Senate that he would be ready to take the usual oath of office on Saturday, March 4, at 12 o'clock, at such place and in such manner as the Senate might designate.

Mr. Felix Grundy, of Tennessee, thereupon offered a resolution for the appointment of a committee of arrangements to make the requisite preparations for administering the oath.

Mr. Henry Clay, of Kentucky, said he was aware that the Senate had always had a peculiar agency in this matter, but he was not aware why the House should not have a concern. He would inquire what the practice had been.

Mr. Grundy replied that the proposed action was in strict accordance with precedents of recent inaugurations. He did not remember any instance in which the House had participated. The term of the House always ended before the event.

The resolution was agreed to by the Senate

The House not only did not participate in the arrangements for inaugurations, but the reports in the Senate Journals and the records of debate do not mention Members of the House as accompanying the inaugural party to the portico, unless they be considered as included in the designation "other persons," who are mentioned as bringing up the rear of the processions as late as the inauguration of 1865.[2]

In the inauguration of March 4, 1869,[3] "ex-Members of the House of Representatives and Members-elect" are mentioned as having a place after the Senate and diplomatic corps in the procession to the portico. In the inauguration of 1873[4] they are again mentioned, coming after the Senate, diplomatic corps, and Cabinet.

As late as the inauguration of 1893[5] the House followed after all the other bodies, and after the General of the Army and Admiral of the Navy.

1994. On the calendar day of March 4, 1901[6] (the legislative day of March 2), at 11 o'clock and 55 minutes a. m., the Members of the House of Representatives, preceded by the Sergeant-at-Arms and Clerk, and headed by the Speaker and Chaplain, entered the Senate Chamber. The Speaker was escorted to a seat at the right of the President pro tempore of the Senate, the Clerk and Chaplain at the Secretary's desk, and the Members of the House were escorted to the seats on the floor provided for them.[7]

They were soon followed by the ambassadors and ministers of foreign countries, the Chief Justice, associate justices, and officers of the Supreme Court.

The heads of the Executive Departments, the Lieutenant-General commanding the Army and his aid, the Admiral of the Navy and his aid, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and other persons entitled to admission occupied the seats on the floor of the Senate that were assigned to them.

The Vice-President-elect (Theodore Roosevelt, of New York) entered the Chamber accompanied by members of the committee of arrangements for the inauguration, and was conducted to a seat at the right of the President pro tempore.

The President pro tempore administered the oath of office to the Vice-President-elect.

Then, at 12 m., the President pro tempore declared the Senate adjourned sine die.

Immediately thereafter[1] the Vice-President took the chair and called the Senate to order in the special session convened "at 12 o'clock on the 4th day of March" by proclamation of the President of the United States.

After prayer by the Chaplain of the Senate the Vice-President addressed the Senate.

Then the proclamation of the President convening the special session of the Senate was read, after which the oath was administered to the Senators-elect.

After the administration of the oath, the persons entitled to admission to the floor having been admitted to the places reserved for them, the President-elect, William McKinley, entered the Senate Chamber, accompanied by the committee of arrangements of the two Houses (three from each House), and was escorted to a seat in front of the Secretary's desk, and the members of the committee were seated on his right and left.

The Vice-President then directed the Sergeant-at-Arms to execute the order of the inauguration ceremonies.

The President-elect was conducted to the President's room by the committee of arrangements, while those in the Senate Chamber proceeded to the platform on the central portico of the Capitol, in the following order:

The marshal of the District of Columbia and the marshal of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The Supreme Court of the United States and the officers thereof.

The ambassadors and ministers of foreign countries.

The Vice-President and Secretary of the Senate.

The Senate of the United States and ex-Senators.

The Sergeant-at-Arms and Clerk of the House of Representatives.

The Speaker and Members of the House of Representatives.

The Cabinet.

The Admiral of the Navy and Lieutenant-General of the Army and their aids.

The governors of States and Territories.

All other persons admitted to the floor of the Senate.

The President-elect of the United States having arrived on the platform on the central portico, the Chief Justice of the United States administered to him the oath of office.

And then the President delivered his inaugural address.

At the conclusion of the address the President departed to the White House, the Senate returned to its Chamber, and the ceremonies were ended.

[1] First session Fifty-seventh Congress, Record, pp. 1-3.

The ceremonies at the inauguration of 1901 were similar to those of March 4, 1897,[1] except in the following respects:

In 1897 the President-elect, William McKinley, was accompanied on his entrance into the Senate Chamber by the retiring President, Grover Cleveland, and by a committee of three Members of the Senate. The propriety of a representation of the House on this committee had not at that time been asserted and recognized.

There were minor differences in the order of the procession to the portico, the President and President-elect coming after the Supreme Court and diplomatic corps, and being followed by the retiring Vice-President.

1995. The ceremonies of the inauguration in 1897 followed those of March 4, 1893,[2] except for certain differences in the order of the procession to the portico. The President and President-elect preceded the Senate and members of the diplomatic corps in 1893.

1996. When March 4 falls on Sunday the inauguration of the President of the United States occurs at noon March 5.

References to the early agitation in the House for a voice in making arrangements for the inauguration of President.

The inauguration of the President occurs on March 4, but when March 4 falls on a Sunday the ceremonies occur at noon of March 5.[3]

The House participates in these ceremonies, but did not have a large share in their arrangement until 1896. Questions in relation to the inauguration have frequently arisen in the House, but for a long time did not result in any increase of the authority of the body in this respect.[4]

1997. Ceremonies at the administration of the oath of office to Millard Fillmore, President of the United States.—On July 10, 1850,[5] immediately after the assembling of the House and the disposal of the Journal, a message was announced from the President of the United States. This message, which was signed by Millard Fillmore, lately Vice-President, announced that Zachary Taylor, late President, had died at 10.30 o'clock the preceding evening. In conclusion the message announced the proposal of the President to take the oath of office at 12 m. in the Hall of the House of Representatives, in the presence of both Houses.

The life of the House expired while the discussion was proceeding. On February 28, 1889 (second session Fiftieth Congress), the House, after first proposing a joint committee to make arrangements, decided to issue tickets to the ceremonies, but there was complaint that the tickets were not honored by the Senate. Also on the legislative day of March 2 the House adopted a resolution protesting against the arrangements made by the Senate whereby the House brought up the rear of the procession. (Record, second session Fiftieth Congress, pp. 667, 2720, 2721.) On March 2, 1897, there was some question in the House as to the arrangements. (Record, second session Fifty-fourth Congress, p. 2648.)

Mr. Robert C. Winthrop, of Massachusetts, thereupon presented the following resolution, which was unanimously agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee consisting of three Members of this House, with such committee as the Senate may join, be appointed to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that the Senate and House of Representatives will be in readiness to receive him in the Hall of the House of Representatives this day, at 12 o'clock m., for the purpose of witnessing the administration of the oath prescribed by the Constitution to enable him to enter upon the execution of his office.

The following gentlemen were thereupon appointed on the part of the House: Messrs. Robert C. Winthrop, of Massachusetts,[1] Isaac E. Morse, of Louisiana, and Charles S. Morehead, of Kentucky.

After a recess, and at 12 o'clock, a message from the Senate announced that they had adopted the following resolution, in which they asked the concurrence of the House:

Resolved, That the two Houses will assemble this day in the Hall of the House of Representatives at 12 o'clock m. to be present at the administration of the oath prescribed by the Constitution to the late Vice-President of the United States, to enable him to discharge the powers and duties of the office of the President of the United States, devolved on him by the death of Zachary Taylor, late President of the United States.

The message also announced that the Senate had concurred in the resolution of the House directing the appointment of a committee to wait on the President of the United States and had appointed a committee on their part.[2]

The resolution from the Senate was not acted on, it being the opinion of the Speaker[3] that the resolution passed by the House was sufficient.

Soon after the reception of the message from the Senate, Mr. Morse, of the committee on the part of the House, appeared at the bar, introducing the Hon. William Cranch, chief justice of the district and circuit court of the United States, who ascended the Clerk's platform and took a seat thereon, a little to the right of the Speaker.

At 4 minutes past 12 o'clock the Senate of the United States, preceded by their Sergeant-at-Arms and Secretary, entered the Hall (the Speaker and Members of the House rising to receive them) and took the places assigned to them in the area in front of the Speaker's chair.

The Speaker and Members of the House then resumed their seats.

Immediately afterwards His Excellency Millard Fillmore, President of the United States, appeared at the bar of the House, supported by Messrs. Soulé, of the Senate, and Winthrop, of the House of Representatives, and accompanied by the other members of the joint committee and by the Cabinet of the late President of the United States.

The Speaker and Members of the House rose to receive them.

[1] It will be observed that Mr. Winthrop was a Whig in politics, and a representative of the minority side of the House, but a member of the same party with the President.

[2] The House Journal indicates that the message did not, in accordance with the present practice, give the names of the committee, who were Pierre Soulé, of Louisiana (Democrat), John Davis, of Massachusetts (Whig), and Joseph R. Underwood, of Kentucky (Whig). The Senate majority was Democratic. The House committee was composed of two Whigs and one Democrat, although the House also was Democratic as to its majority.

[3] Howell Cobb, of Georgia, Speaker.

The President of the United States was conducted to a seat on the Clerk's platform immediately in front of the Speaker's chair.

The Speaker and Members of the House then resumed their seats.

The Speaker then rose and said: "The oath of office will now be administered to the President of the United States by Chief Justice Cranch."

The President and chief justice thereupon rose, and the President read the following oath:

I, Millard Fillmore, do solemnly swear that I will faithfully execute the office of President of the United States, and will, to the best of my ability, preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States.

Chief Justice Cranch then administered the oath, after which the President and chief justice resumed their seats.

After a brief pause the President arose and, accompanied by the committee, left the Hall, followed by the Cabinet and the Senate, the Speaker and Members of the House rising as they left.

Then, after a short interval, a message was received from the President of the United States recommending the two Houses to adopt proper measures for the funeral obsequies of the late President.

The Journal of the House has the following entry in regard to the ceremonies described above:

The President of the United States, the members of his Cabinet, the chief justice of the circuit court of the District of Columbia, and the Senate of the United States, having entered the Hall of the House of Representatives,

The oath of office was administered to the President by the chief judge of the circuit court of the District of Columbia.

The President, members of the Cabinet, chief judge, and Senate then retired from the Hall.

1998. Arrangements for the inauguration of the President of the United States (but not of the Vice-President) made by a joint committee of the two Houses.—On January 15, 1901,[1] Mr. Henry H. Bingham, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported back the following joint resolution of the Senate (No. 142):

Joint resolution to enable the Secretary of the Senate to pay the necessary expenses of the inaugural ceremonies of the President and Vice-President of the United States, March 4, 1901.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That to enable the Secretary of the Senate to pay the necessary expenses of the inaugural ceremonies of the President and Vice-President of the United States, March 4, 1901, in accordance with the programme adopted by the committee of arrangements appointed under resolution of the Senate on the 11th day of December, 1900, including the pay for extra police for three days, at $3 per day, there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, the same to be immediately available.

With the following amendment recommended by the committee:

In line 12, strike out the word "five" and insert "seven."

[1] Second session Fifty-sixth Congress, Journal, p. 118; Record, pp. 1031-1033.

After discussion as to the propriety of a participation by the House in the arrangements, the House, on motion of Mr. John Dalzell, of Pennsylvania, voted to recommit the resolution to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to report it in a form to provide for the inauguration of the President of the United States—but not the Vice-President—according to arrangements to be made by a joint committee of the House and Senate.

On January 16[1] Mr Bingham reported the resolution back to the House with the amendments called for by the instructions. The House disagreed to that amendment, which proposed to strike out the words "and Vice-President," but agreed to the amendment proposing, instead of the words "the programme adopted by the committee of arrangements appointed under resolution of the Senate of the 11th day of December, 1900," the following: "Such programme as may be adopted by a joint committee of the Senate and House of Representatives, to be appointed under a concurrent resolution of the two Houses." The amendment proposing the sum of $7,000 instead of $5,000 was agreed to, also an amendment, so that the title should read as follows:

Joint resolution to enable the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay the necessary expenses of the inaugural ceremonies of the President of the United States, March 4, 1901.

Mr. Bingham then stated that he would also submit from the committee a concurrent resolution. It had been contended, and the contention had been made both in the House and in the Senate, that the President had no right to participate in the organization of either House of Congress, and it was therefore improper to provide for a committee of either House, or the two Houses, other than in a resolution or a concurrent resolution, which did not go to the President for his sanction. For this reason he proposed the following, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to by the House:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That a joint committee consisting of three Senators and three Representatives, to be appointed by the President pro tempore of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives, respectively, is authorized to make the necessary arrangements for the inauguration of the President-elect and Vice-President of the United States on the 4th day of March, next.

On January 22[2] the joint resolution was returned from the Senate with the message that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House. The House, therefore, voted to insist on its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

On February 2, 1901,[3] the conferees reported, and the conference report was agreed to in both House and Senate. As agreed upon finally the joint resolution provided for the inaugural ceremonies exactly as proposed by the House, except in so far as they related to the Vice-President. The resolution as perfected had nothing to do with arrangements relating to inauguration of the Vice-President.

On February 4[4] the Senate took up and considered the concurrent resolution, and agreed to it with an amendment striking out the words "and Vice-President."

On February 5[1] the amendment of the Senate was considered and agreed to by the House, and the Speaker thereupon appointed the committee on the part of the House.

1999. On December 8, 1904,[2] in the Senate, Mr. John C. Spooner, of Wisconsin, offered the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That a joint committee consisting of three Senators and three Representatives, to be appointed by the President pro tempore of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives, respectively, is authorized to make the necessary arrangements for the inauguration of the President-elect of the United States on the 4th day of March next.

On December 16[3] Mr. Spooner reported the resolution from the Committee on Rules, and it was agreed to by the Senate.

On January 9, 1905,[4] in the House, the resolution was taken from the Speaker's table and agreed to.

2000. Precedents of House and Senate in relation to notifying the President-elect and Vice-President-elect of their elections.—On February 15, 1817, the committee of the House of Representatives, appointed, in pursuance of the joint resolution of the two Houses, "to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States, and of notifying the persons elected of their election," reported[5] that after the votes had been counted and the result declared they had been informed by the Senate committee that "if the House of Representatives at any time had a claim to participate in this act, they had surrendered it, and that the Senate had come to a resolution on the subject." The House committee go on to say:

Your committee found, on investigation, and so informed the committee of the Senate, that, with a single exception, in all cases where the President-elect was not the President of the Senate at the time of his election the House of Representatives had resolved either to send a committee to wait on the President and give him the notice or that the notice should be given in such manner as the Senate should prescribe; that in one case, where the election devolved on the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate was chosen, they had appointed a committee to inform him of his election, and that, in the excepted case, it seemed to be the result of inattention to the duty prescribed by the joint resolution, and passed sub silentio.

The committee went on to say that they did not propose to censure the Senate for lack of courtesy, but were of the opinion that in a matter so momentous forms should be respected, "for substance is intimately connected with forms in all matters of legislation." The committee pointed out that the Constitution provides that the votes should be opened "in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives," and that also the Constitution had otherwise on this subject manifested a peculiar confidence in the House of Representatives, who, in certain cases, are authorized to elect a President.

As, however—continues the report—

the Constitution and the laws are silent in regard to the legality of the electoral votes, neither House can properly claim the exclusive right of deciding who has a majority of them; in other words, what votes shall be counted. Nevertheless, the recent investigation of the votes shows the possibility, even the probability, of a contest upon this point, as it has been claimed by some to belong to the Senate to decide exclusively upon the admissibility of the votes in consequence of the duty imposed upon the President of the Senate by the Constitution of performing the manual labor of opening the certificates.

If the Senate should at any time hereafter assert this claim, and decide contrary to the judgment of the House of Representatives, it will follow that the exclusive right, assumed by their resolution, of notifying the persons elected of their appointment becomes a most important one. * * *

If the Senate had resolved that they would proceed to open and count the electoral votes on the day fixed by law and that their President should notify the result to the persons elected, and had ordered that the House of Representatives should be informed of their resolution and be required to attend them, the act would have been resisted by the House as an usurpation. * * *

It is, therefore, to resist the authority of a single innovation, resulting from accidental inattention, to reestablish the early and repeated precedents upon this subject, and to assert the just rights of the House of Representatives that your committee have considered it to be their duty to submit their report.

This report was read and ordered to lie on the table, and does not appear to have been considered.[1] But later independent action was taken.

The committee on the part of the House who made the above report were appointed February 10,[2] and consisted of Messrs. John G. Jackson, of Virginia; William Irving, of New York, and Timothy Pitkin, of Connecticut.

The action which the Senate had taken was embodied in a resolution adopted February 13, on motion of Mr. Nathaniel Macon, of North Carolina. This resolution provided that the President be requested to cause to be delivered to James Monroe, "now Secretary of State of the United States, a notification of his election to the office of President of the United States," and cause to be transmitted to the Vice-President a similar notification. The resolution also directed the President of the Senate to make out a certificate of election, which should be laid before the President of the United States.[3]

The House Journal of February 26 has this entry:

Mr. Jackson, from the committee appointed by this House to wait upon the Hon. James Monroe, and inform him of his election to the office of President of the United States, reported that the committee had performed that service.[4]

This committee had consisted of Messrs. Jackson and Pitkin, and had been appointed in accordance with a resolution adopted February 21.[5] This resolution was offered by Mr. Jackson, who stated that it grew out of the report made February 15. It simply provided for notifying the President and Vice-President of their election.

Four years later, in 1821, the House and Senate united in appointing a joint committee to notify the President and Vice-President elect. Apparently there was no opposition to this procedure.[1]

This practice continued without interruption until 1877, when the disputed election occurred, and the result of the vote was not announced until March 1, two days before the Congress expired.[2] No suggestion seems to have been made in regard to notifying the President and Vice-President-elect.

At the next occasion, in 1881, the notification does not seem to have been suggested.[3] The following resolution, concurrent in form, was at that time agreed to separately by both House and Senate:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the two Houses are of opinion that the Constitution and laws have been duly executed, and that no further declaration of these facts is necessary.

In 1885,[4] after the electoral vote had been counted, Mr. J. Warren Keifer, of Ohio, offered a resolution and preamble, reciting the counting of the vote and the results thereof as to majority, and resolving that it was the sense of the House that the Constitution and laws had been duly executed and that no further declaration of these facts was necessary. Mr. Keifer said that in conference with the tellers on the part of the Senate it had been decided that the resolution should be in this form and should not be concurrent in form. There was some discussion about the precedents and whether the President of the Senate might have declared the result instead of simply announcing the vote, and adding a disclaimer of his authority as presiding officer of the Senate or joint convention to make any declaration at all.

Finally Mr. S. S. Cox, of New York, saying that he wished to make no precedent for the future, moved that the resolution be laid on the table. This was done by a vote of 137 yeas to 113 nays.

Then Mr. James F. Clay, of Kentucky, presented a resolution, concurrent in form, that a committee of the House and Senate be appointed to notify the President-elect and Vice-President-elect of their election, and that the President of the Senate be directed to make out and sign a certificate, the form of which was appended.

After debate and some citation of precedents the resolution was agreed to without division. On February 12 the resolution was received in the Senate and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.[5] That committee did not report on the subject.

2001. "Treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors" require removal of President, Vice-President, or other civil officers from office on conviction by impeachment.—The Constitution, in Article II, section 4, provides:

The President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

2002. Impeachments are exempted from the constitutional requirement of trial by jury.—The Constitution, in Article III, section 2, provides:

The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury. * * *

2003. Cases of impeachment are excluded by the Constitution from the offenses for which the President may grant reprieves and pardons.—The Constitution in Article II, section 2, provides:

The President * * * shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment.

2004. The English precedents indicate that jury trial has not been permitted in impeachment cases.

The Commons are considered, in English practice, as having in impeachment cases the function of a grand jury.

In Chapter LIII of Jefferson's Manual the following is given in the "sketch of some of the principles and practices of England" on the subject of impeachments:

Jury. In the case of Alice Pierce (1 R., 2) a jury was impaneled for her trial before a committee. (Seld. Jud., 123.) But this was on a complaint, not on impeachment by the Commons. (Seld. Jud., 163.) It must also have been for a misdemeanor only, as the Lords spiritual sat in the case, which they do on misdemeanors, but not in capital cases. (Id., 148.) The judgment was a forfeiture of all her lands and goods. (Id., 188.) This, Selden says, is the only jury he finds recorded in Parliament for misdemeanors; but he makes no doubt if the delinquent doth put himself on the trial of his country, a jury ought to be impaneled, and he adds that it is not so on impeachment by the Commons; for they are in loco proprio, and there no jury ought to be impaneled. (Id., 124.) The Ld. Berkeley (6 E., 3) was arraigned for the murder of L. 2 on an information on the part of the King and not on impeachment of the Commons; for then they had been patria sua. He waived his peerage, and was tried by a jury of Gloucestershire and Warwickshire. (Id., 126.) In 1 H., 7, the Commons protest that they are not to be considered as parties to any judgment given, or thereafter to be given, in Parliament. (Id., 133.) They have been generally and more justly considered, as is before stated, as the grand jury, for the conceit of Selden is certainly not accurate that they are the patria sua of the accused, and that the Lords do only judge but not try. It is undeniable that they do try, for they examine witnesses as to the facts, and acquit or condemn according to their own belief of them. And Lord Hale says "the peers are judges of law as well as of fact" (2 Hale, P. C., 275), consequently of fact as well as of law.

2005. Under the parliamentary law an impeachment is not discontinued by the dissolution of Parliament.—In Chapter LIII of Jefferson's Manual the following is given in the "sketch of some of the principles and practices of England" on the subject of impeachments:

Continuance. An impeachment is not discontinued by the dissolution of Parliament, but may be resumed by the new Parliament. (T. Ray., 383; 4 Com. Journ., 23 Dec., 1790; Lords' Journ., May 15, 1791; 2 Wood., 618.)

2006. It was decided in 1876 that an impeachment trial could only proceed when Congress was in session.

Instance during an impeachment trial wherein a Member of the Senate called on the managers for an opinion.

On June 19, 1876,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, the counsel for the respondent asked for a postponement of the trial until some time in the next November.

[1] First session Forty-fourth Congress, Record of Trial, p. 173.

Thereupon a question arose as to whether or not the trial might proceed when the House of Representatives was not in session, and Mr. John J. Ingalls, a Senator from Kansas, asked for an opinion from the managers for the House of Representatives.

Mr. Manager Scott Lord said:

Perhaps, Mr. President, it will be sufficient for the managers to say in that regard that the managers are not agreed on that question. Some of us have a very fixed opinion one way, and other managers seem to have as fixed an opinion the other way; and not being agreed among ourselves we perhaps ought not to discuss the question until we can come to some agreement.

I will say further, Mr. President and Senators, that the question which is presented by the Senator has not been fully considered by the managers; it has not been very much discussed by them, but it has been sufficiently discussed to enable us to see that there is this difference of opinion. I think myself that when the question is fully discussed by the managers they will come to a conclusion on the subject unanimously; but perhaps one differing with me might think we should come unanimously to a different conclusion from that which I entertain. I will say for myself that I have no doubt of the power of this court to sit as a court of impeachment after the adjournment of the Congress.

* * * * * * *

I ought to say in regard to the opinion which I have expressed that I predicate that opinion upon the action of both the Houses. I think that in order to authorize the sitting of this court beyond all question either the House or the Congress should vote to empower the managers to appear before this court in the recess or absence of the House.

* * * * * * *

I ought to say in furtherance of the view which I have presented, that the question has been settled in the State of New York, the State in which I reside, and I, of course, would naturally be influenced somewhat by the decision. In the case of Judge Barnard the trial was had at Saratoga after the adjournment of the legislature, and in the recent impeachment trial in Virginia the same course was taken—the impeachment was not tried until after the adjournment of the legislature. I am also reminded that as far back as 1853 when Mr. Mather, a canal commissioner, was impeached in New York, he was tried after the legislature adjourned. In regard to the English authorities they seem on the whole to warrant the proposition that the House of Lords may proceed as a court of impeachment after the adjournment of the Parliament.

Soon after,[1] while an order was pending providing that the trial should proceed on July 6, Mr. Oliver P. Morton, of Indiana, proposed to add thereto as an amendment the following:

Provided, That impeachment can only proceed in the presence of the House of Representatives.

On motion of Mr. Frederick T. Frelinghuysen, of New Jersey, and without division, the words "in the presence of the House of Representatives" were stricken out and the words "while Congress is in session" were inserted.

Thereupon Mr. Morton asked and obtained leave to withdraw his amendment.

Thereupon Mr. Roscoe Conkling, of New York, offered the proviso again:

Provided, That impeachment can only proceed while Congress is in session.

This proviso was agreed to, yeas 21, nays 19.

Thereupon Mr. Oliver P. Morton proposed to amend by adding the words, "and in the presence of the House of Representatives."

Mr. Eli Saulsbury, of Delaware, proposed to amend Mr. Morton's amendment by adding the words, "or its managers."

[1] Senate Journal, pp. 957, 959.

Mr. Saulsbury's amendment was disagreed to without division; and Mr. Morton's amendment was disagreed to by a vote of yeas 9, nays 28.

So it was Provided, That the impeachment can only proceed while the Congress is in session.

The reasons actuating the Senate in coming to this decision do not appear from Senate proceedings, as the debates were in secret; but in a verbal report made to the House of Representatives by the Chairman of the Managers, Mr. Scott Lord, of New York, this statement appears:[1]

The plan of the managers on the part of the House has been this: To induce the Senate, as a court of impeachment, to allow Congress to adjourn and then sit as a court to carry on the case. But there are two reasons against that which render it conclusive that the Senate will not do so. The first is that many Senators doubt the power of the Senate to sit as a court of impeachment after the adjournment of Congress. The second, and the really practicable reason, is that it will be found impossible to keep a quorum of the court together after the adjournment of Congress.

2007. The Senate decided, in 1876, that William W. Belknap was amenable to trial notwithstanding his resignation of the office before his impeachment for acts therein.

In the Belknap trial the managers and counsel for respondent agreed that a private citizen, apart from offense in an office, might not be impeached.

Discussion as to effect of an officer's resignation after the House has investigated his conduct, but before it has impeached.

On May 4, 1876,[2] in the Senate, sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, the President pro tempore announced that the Senate had adopted the following:

Ordered, That the Senate proceed first to hear and determine the question whether W.W. Belknap, the respondent, is amenable to trial by impeachment for acts done as Secretary of War, notwithstanding his resignation of said office; and that the managers and counsel in such argument discuss the question whether the issues of fact are material and whether the matters in support of the jurisdiction alleged by the House of Representatives in the pleadings subsequent to the articles of impeachment can be thus alleged if the same are not averred in said articles.

On the first question, whether or not the respondent was amenable to trial for acts done as Secretary of War, notwithstanding his resignation, the argument naturally divided itself into three branches.

1. May a private citizen be impeached, irrespective of whether he has held office or not?

2. May a private citizen who formerly held an office be impeached for acts done as an incumbent of that office?

3. Assuming that a person may not be impeached after he is out of office for acts done in office, does a resignation, after proceedings for impeachment begin, confer immunity?

---

[1] Record, p. 3871.

[2] First session Forty-fourth Congress, Senate Journal, p. 928; record of trial, p. 27.

As to the first question, may a private citizen be impeached, Mr. Montgomery Blair, of counsel for the respondent, said:[1]

Upon the first question I do not know how the managers are to maintain the jurisdiction of this court upon any other principle than that which was asserted in the Blount case, which was that "all persons are liable to impeachment" (Annals of Congress of 1797, vol. 2, p. 2251), because, as was alleged there all persons are liable in England, the country from which we borrow the proceeding, and to whose laws and usages we must therefore look for the extent of its application. But as the court on that occasion overruled this doctrine, and the decision has been acquiesced in for seventy-eight years, the managers ought not now to expect this court to overrule it.

And Mr. Manager Scott Lord, speaking for the House of Representatives, said:[2]

The learned counsel, Mr. Blair, suggested that we should be driven to the position of asserting that a citizen who had never held office was impeachable. We claim no such thing. We claim first, and admit, that the authorities have settled that a mere citizen can not be impeached; and if the authorities had not settled it, the Constitution, not by express words, but by its intent, does exclude the idea of impeachment as against a mere private citizen.

Mr. Matt H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, after an exhaustive discussion of authorities, said:[3]

In Blount's case, where the question I am discussing was first presented to this court, Messrs. Bayard and Harper, managers, understanding the task before them, grappled with the subject, and maintained the broad ground that the power of impeachment under our Constitution reached to every inhabitant of the United States. Blount, not as a Senator, but while a Senator, had committed the acts charged in the articles of impeachment. He pleaded to the jurisdiction, first, that he was not an officer of the United States when he committed the acts complained of, and, secondly, that he was not even a Senator at the time of the impeachment. It appeared from the record that he was a Senator at the time the acts were committed. The managers argued that a Senator was a civil officer. But they also contended that whether a Senator was a civil officer or not was immaterial; because impeachment was not confined to civil officers. And there was no fault in their reasoning, upon their premises. If impeachment lies against any private citizen of the United States, then Blount should have been convicted; because surely he could not interpose his senatorial character as a shield against an impeachment maintainable against any private citizen. And so the question was distinctly presented, whether or not impeachment lies against a private citizen.

The court, as is well known, decided that there was no jurisdiction. And this decision is an authoritative declaration that impeachment can not be maintained against a private citizen.

* * * * * * *

We have been unable to find any case in which a private citizen has been held subject to impeachment for misconduct in an office formerly held by him. In the Barnard case, it is true, the court held that the accused might be convicted and removed from office on account of offenses committed in a former term of the same elective office which he was holding at the time of impeachment.

In the State of Ohio, Messrs. Pease, Huntingdon, and Tod held a certain act of the legislature unconstitutional and void. At the session of the legislature 1807–8 steps were taken to impeach them therefor, but the resolution was not acted upon at that session; but at the next session steps were taken toward the impeachment of the offending judges, and articles of impeachment were reported against Pease and Tod, but not against Huntingdon, who in the meantime had been elected governor of the State, and of course had ceased to be a judge of the court. This discrimination is an authority in favor of the proposition that no man can be impeached after he is out of office. (Cooley on Constitutional Limitations, p. 160, note 3.)

[1] Record of trial, p. 28. [2] Page 34. [3] Pages 39–42.

(2) The main force of the argument was expended on the second question, whether or not a private citizen who has formerly held an office may be impeached for acts done as an incumbent of that office. The question of the right to impeach a private citizen was argued only for its relation to this second question.

Mr. Montgomery Blair, of counsel for the respondent, began the argument with a review of the nature of impeachment in America and England, and continued:[1]

This settles the principle upon which impeachment must be exercised. It is strictly confined to the cases expressly enumerated in the Constitution, as much so as any other court established by the Federal Constitution.

And this brings me to the consideration of what are the cases enumerated by this Constitution as within the power of impeachment. There is no other enumeration except what is contained in the fourth section of the second article, as follows:

"The President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors."

The enumerated cases of persons, therefore, against whom this court can entertain articles of impeachment are "the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States;" not persons who have been President, Vice-President, or civil officers, but only persons who can be at the time truly described as President, Vice-President, or as civil officers, and who can "be removed from office on impeachment and conviction of treason," etc. "If there must be a judgment of removal," says Story, "it would seem to follow that the party was still in office;" but it is not necessary to rely upon this inference, plain and necessary as it is, because the only persons specified as subject to impeachment are officers, and it would be equally plain that only officers were amenable to impeachment if nothing was said in the section about removal, and it were simply "that the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers shall be subject to impeachment for and conviction of treason, bribery, "etc., because it is only by these descriptions as officers that they are made subject to impeachment. Hence the only question before the court is whether the term "officer" can be applied to a person not at the time in the holding of an office.

And this has been the accepted construction. From the day when Blount was tried until now no attempt has been made to impeach a private citizen, and that not because there have not been plenty of proper subjects for impeachment if the law had authorized the proceeding against ex-officers. Within a few years past it is notorious that a number of officers who were under investigation and who were threatened with impeachment resigned to avoid it, and the proceedings against them were abandoned. Several judges were among the number, all whose names I do not now recall, and it is not necessary to do so, because the Senate knows to whom I refer, who resigned their places and thereby arrested the proceedings. So in New York, where the high court of impeachment is composed of the judges of the court of appeals and the senate, and the provisions of whose constitution, if not in identical words with those of the national Constitution, are substantially the same, an impeachment was dismissed against Judge Cardozo, within a few years, on the presentation of his resignation. The judiciary committee of the house of representatives of that State, composed of persons who will, I understand, be recognized by some of the managers as among the ablest lawyers of that State, reported against the power of impeachment of any person not actually in office. The language of the resolution in Fuller's case (the case referred to) is:

"That no person can be impeached who was not at the time of the commission of the alleged offense and at the time of the impeachment holding some office under the laws of the State."

This resolution and the accompanying report form part of the report of the trial of George G. Barnard, page 158.

I have examined all the constitutions of all the States with reference to the provisions therein contained on the subject of impeachment. With two exceptions, they correspond in substance with the national Constitution; and I have not learned that any impeachments against ex-officers have taken place under those constitutions.

[1] Page 29.

Mr. Blair next cited opinions of the framers of the Constitution, and the comments of Judge Story, saying: [1]

All the reasons upon which the proceeding was supposed to be necessary were applicable only to a man who wielded at the moment the power of the Government, when only it was necessary to put in motion the great power of the people, as organized in the House of Representatives, to bring him to justice. It is a shocking abuse of power to direct so overwhelming a force against a private man. It may be deemed by some of small moment, because it can only effect his disfranchisement; but the effect is to dishonor him, and it is simply tyranny to put this man's honor in peril by the application of that overwhelming force. The great authors of England, as well as the great commentator on our Constitution mentioned, hold that impeachment ought only to be brought into action to arrest the wrongdoing of another power in the Government. The arena of impeachment is in fact a place in which a controversy takes place between the high powers of the Government. The only theory upon which it can be justified is to enable the people, massed and organized in their representative houses, to assail their oppressors, armed with the power of the Executive and the patronage and prestige which that gives them. Do you seek to prostitute that power to the oppression of a private individual, wasting his means by an action that, as this author says, has invariably ruined every private man who has been the subject of it in Great Britain?

Mr. Matt H. Carpenter held that there were two theories in regard to impeachment—one that the proceeding was so broad that private persons might fall within its reach, as in England, and the other that impeachment "was only a proceeding to remove an unworthy public officer." And he declared that one of these theories must be accepted, and that there was no middle ground. He then proceeded at length to cite authorities [2] to show that a private citizen might not be impeached, and then said: [3]

Bearing in mind this method, when we read that the "House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment, and the Senate the sole power to try impeachments;" and learn from the debates in the convention that impeachment was intended as a method of removal from office, we naturally look elsewhere in the Constitution for the extent of this power; in other words, for the officers who may be removed by this method, which we find in section 4 of article 2, as follows:

"The President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment, etc."

There is a strong implication arising from the provision that punishment in cases of impeachment shall extend no further than removal from office, or removal and disqualification, that impeachment only lies against those in office. But section 4 of article 2 is perfectly conclusive.

Consider the language of this fourth section of the second article. The President shall be removed, etc. Suppose General Jackson still alive, and to be impeached to-day for removing the deposits from the Bank of the United States. Who would preside over the trial?

Section 3 of article 1 provides:

"When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside."

Suppose General Jackson living and impeached for removing the deposits. Would the Chief Justice preside? Manifestly not, because General Grant is President, and the case supposed would be an impeachment of a private citizen, and not of the President. And yet, upon the theory now maintained, that once a President is always a President for the purposes of impeachment, the Chief Justice would have to preside. This is as absurd as it would be to construe a statute giving Members of Congress the franking privilege, as giving that privilege to every one who had been a Member of Congress.

The Constitution does not authorize the impeachment of certain crimes—that is, crimes committed in offices—but it authorizes an impeachment of certain persons, described by the class to which they belong; that is, civil officers of the United States.

I may assume therefore that the purpose for which the power of impeachment was incorporated in the Constitution will be observed by this court, in exercising the jurisdiction which the Constitution confers. And upon this subject the debates in the convention are not only satisfactory, but absolutely conclusive.

Before passing from the subject of these debates let me say that considerable opposition was developed against embodying this power in the Constitution. Those who opposed it did so upon the ground that conferring the power would make the President a subservient tool of Congress and destroy the proper equilibrium of the three departments. On the other hand, it was urged that without the impeachment clause it would be in the power of the President, especially in time of war, when he would have large military and naval forces at command, and public moneys at his disposal, to overthrow the liberties of the people. Near the close of the debate Mr. Morris said his views had been changed by the discussion, and he expressed his opinion to the effect that—

"The Executive ought to be impeached. He should be punished, not as a man, but as an officer, and punished only by degradation from his office."

This was the only debate upon the general subject of impeachment. Thus it will be seen that those who favored and those who opposed incorporating the power in the Constitution, contemplated the impeachment of officers while holding office.

Mr. Jeremiah S. Black, also of counsel for the respondent, said:[1]

We must then fall back on the one question whether an officer who has resigned is subject to the power of impeachment, or whether he is to be regarded as a private citizen after he goes out, and therefore amenable only to the courts.

The words are "the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers." Who is the President? If that means an ex-President, a person who has once held the office of President, but whose term has expired or who has resigend, then the same interpretation must be given to the other words, and the words "the Vice-President and all civil officers" may include all persons who have held office at any period of their lives. When we speak about the President, do we ever refer to anybody except the incumbent of that office? A half-grown boy reads in a newspaper that the President occupies the White House; if he would understand from that that all ex-Presidents are in it together he would be considered a very unpromising lad.

The managers would not assign that absurd meaning to any other part of the Constitution. Where it is provided that the Vice-President shall preside in the Senate, they know very well that nobody is included but the actual incumbent. Statutes have been passed declaring that the Members of Congress shall have certain privileges, such as franking letters and receiving an annual compensation out of the Treasury. Did any body ever claim that this extended to old Members retired from public life? Any law which declares that public officers as a class shall be entitled to pay as privileges would be confined to those persons in office, and no sensible man would think of a Constitution extending it to former officers. When, therefore, the Constitution says that all civil officers may be impeached, it is a violation of common sense to hold that the power may be applied to a late Secretary of War or other person who does not at the time actually hold any office at all.

The Constitution declares that when the President is impeached the Chief Justice shall preside. The question has been propounded repeatedly, and by several Senators, who would preside if an ex-President was impeached? I admit that that is a puzzle. The puzzle arises out of the absurdity of impeaching an ex-President. Our friends on the other side are so hampered by their own theory that they are obliged simply to decline answering. There is one answer and only one consistent with their logic, and that is this: That when an ex-President is impeached an ex-Chief Justice ought to preside at the trial.

But then the reductio ad absurdum is furnished to their argument when they read on that the President, the Vice-President, and all other civil officers of the United States shall be removed upon conviction. The single sentence uttered by Governor Johnstone in the North Carolina convention puts this in a light so perfectly clear that it would be throwing words away to talk about it. How can a man be removed from office who holds no office? How turn him out if he is not in? The object and purpose of impeachment was removal—removal, mind you, not for a day, not for an hour, not a removal which might be rendered nugatory the next moment by his reappointment or reelection, but a permanent removal. You find an officer misbehaving himself, and you get hold of him while he is still in the possession of power. When you get your grasp upon him, you hurl him down, and give him such a pernicious fall that he can never rise again.

Removal is not only the object of impeachment, but it is the sole object. Removal and disqualification are so associated together that they can not be separated. You can not pronounce a judgment of removal without disqualifying; and you can not pronounce a judgment of disqualification without removal, because the judgment which the Constitution requires you to pronounce is a judgment of removal and disqualification—not removal or disqualification; and this is made perfectly manifest to my mind from the experience we have had in Pennsylvania. It was thought by the convention that framed our Constitution desirable that the Senate, upon conviction of an offender of this kind, should have the discretion to say that he might be removed without being disqualified; and accordingly they changed the provision which had previously been copied from the Constitution of the United States, and instead of saying what is said here, that judgment shall extend to removal and disqualification, it says it shall extend to removal, or to removal and disqualification. The effect of that was to allow of a judgment of removal alone, but not of disqualification alone—removal alone, or removal and disqualification.

On the other hand, the managers for the House of Representatives maintained, with careful citation of authorities, that impeachment was intended to reach a public officer while in office or after he had left office. Mr. Manager Scott Lord said:[1]

Therefore we claim that the limitation of the Constitution is not as to time; it simply relates to a class of persons, and the word "officer" is used as descriptive precisely as it is used in the very statute to which the counsel referred. If it be true because the word "office" or "officer" is used in the Constitution, without saying anything about a person after he is out of office, that the defendant is not impeachable, then he can not be indicted, because the statute relating to his indictment simply speaks of him as an officer.

What is the real intent and meaning of the word "officer" in the Constitution? It is but a general description. An officer in one sense never loses his office. He gets his title and he wears it forever, and an officer is under this liability for life; if he once takes office under the United States, if while in office and as an officer he commits acts which demand impeachment, he may be impeached even down to the time to which the learned counsel, Mr. Carpenter, so eloquently referred the other day—down to the time that he takes his departure from this life.

It is supposed by many that because an officer must be removed no judgment can be pronounced without pronouncing the judgment of removal. This, it seems to me, is a very great error. If he is in office, of course under the Constitution he must be removed; but if out of office, the sentence of disqualification or some inferior sentence may be passed upon him, for the obvious reason that the sentence is divisible. This was distinctly held in the Barnard case, to which reference has been made. In that case the court proceeded unanimously to vote that he should be removed from office; but when the question came up on the other point, shall he be disqualified? several members of the court voted in the negative.

I do not see, then, any possible view in which there is difficulty; and the learned counsel on the other side will not be able to create any difficulty excepting under the claim that a person in office, having so conducted himself as to be worthy of impeachment, finding that it is impossible to escape the facts or pervert them, may, I repeat, defeat the Constitution for the purpose of preventing his punishment.

Messrs. Managers George A. Jenks and George F. Hoar examined the English precedents and the history of the Constitution at length, the latter summarizing his conclusions[2] thus:

The history of the steps by which these constitutional provisions found their place, the few authorities which can be found on the subject, the narrower argument drawn from the language of the Constitution and the broader argument drawn from a consideration of the great public object to be accomplished all point the same way and bring us irresistibly to the conclusion that the power of the Senate of the

[1] Page 34. [2] Page 57.

United States over all grades of public official national wrongdoers, a power conferred for the highest reasons of state and on fullest deliberation, to interpose by its judgment a perpetual barrier against the return to power of great political offenders, does not depend upon the consent of the culprit, does not depend upon the accidental circumstance that the evidence of the crime is not discovered until after the official term has expired or toward the close of that term, but is a perpetual power, hanging over the guilty officer during his whole subsequent life, restricted in its exercise only by the discretion of the Senate itself and the necessity of the concurrence of both branches, the requirement of a two-thirds' vote for conviction, and the constitutional limitation of the punishment

* * * * * * *

But I think I can show to the Senate of the United States, from the history of the formation of this Constitution, that the jurisdiction conferred was complete, and that the unanimous purpose of the convention to confer the power of impeachment over everybody committing crime in office is to be found and proved by its debates, and that the clause saying that civil officers can be removed on conviction is put there as an exception to the clauses which previously had determined the tenure of those offices. In other words, the framers of the Constitution had given power of impeachment to the House, given the power of trial to the Senate, extended the power to all cases of national official wrongdoers, prescribed the mode of proceeding, the numbers necessary to convict, limited the judgment, and passed from that question.

Mr. Aaron A. Sargent, a Senator from California, asked if Members of the Senate who had in times past been civil officers of the United States were, in Mr. Hoar's view, liable to impeachment. Mr. Hoar replied:[1]

They are, undoubtedly. The logic of my argument brings us to that result, and undoubtedly they are as safe from the operation of that process practically as the newly-born infant in his mother's arms. Does anybody suppose that there is to be a two-thirds vote of the American Senate which will rake up and try and punish for political offenses, when the public judgment of this people has demanded an amnesty? The whole power to punish, the whole judgment after the offender has left office is disqualification to hold office, and that judgment is a judgment in the discretion of the Senate. Hunt in Massachusetts, a justice of the peace—the language being exactly the same as this—was sentenced simply to suspension from his office and disqualification to hold any other for twelve months. That was the case of a justice of the peace in the town of Watertown, I think, early in this century.

* * * * * * *

Let me sum up the argument, drawn from the language of the Constitution. The power of impeachment is not defined in the grant in the Constitution. It is conferred as a general common-law power. The judgment is then limited to removal and disqualification, and two-thirds required for conviction. No limit of its application to persons is inserted in the grant. But a subsequent limitation on the tenure of office is inserted, namely, the case of a removal by impeachment, to guard against the argument that officers, whose term is fixed in the Constitution, can not be removed under the power of impeachment, just as impeachment is excepted in the clause securing the right of trial by jury and in the clause conferring the power to pardon.

But suppose we grant the phrase, all civil officers, to be inserted as a definition of the persons who may be reached by this process. Is the definition to be taken to apply to them at the time of the commission of the offense or at the time of the punishment? Suppose a statute enact that all wrongdoers may be punished. Is it not clear that if they be wrongdoers when they commit the act the liability to punishment attaches? The very statute which punishes bribery would fail by this construction to reach anybody, because it is in this respect, as has already been said, almost identical with the provision of the Constitution in its description.

The provision that the judgment shall extend no further than removal from office and perpetual disqualification authorizes any lesser penalty included within those limits to be imposed at the discretion of the Senate. In Hunt's case, in Massachusetts, the sentence was disqualification for a year under a like constitutional provision.

* * * * * * *

[1] Page 60.

The whole constitutional provision, so far as affects our present purpose, can be summed up in two sentences which are scarcely a paraphase or change of the existing text of the existing law, and these two sentences I think state precisely the contentions on the one side and on the other. We say that the Constitution in substance is this: "The Senate shall have the sole power to try impeachments, and civil officers shall be removed on conviction." The counsel for the defendant would state it to be: "Judgment in case of conviction shall be removal from office and disqualification if the defendant is willing." That is the summing up of the two propositions.

But the meaning of these provisions of the Constitution must be ascertained after all by a broad consideration of the great public objects they were intended to accomplish. "Never forget," says Chief Justice Marshall, in McCulloch v. Maryland—and that sentence is the keynote to his whole judicial power—"Never forget that it is a constitution you are interpreting."

(3) As to the third branch of the inquiry, assuming that an ex-officer may not be impeached, whether or not a resignation after proceedings begin confers immunity, there was not very extended debate. Mr. Manager Scott Lord said,[1]

I now propose to call the attention of the court to the other questions of this case referred to in the order of the Senate. The first question of the second replication is: "Can the defendant escape by dividing the day into fractions?" This question is also presented by the articles and plea. The allegation on page 5 is not denied. Therefore, as I propose to show this court by an unbroken series of decisions that the law does not permit a day to be divided into fractions in such a case as this, and if it be true that the defendant was Secretary of War on the 2d of March, on any part of that day, and therefore impeachable, then that question, perhaps, can be argued independent of this replication. I propose, now, to argue the question under the second replication. The authorities will bear upon both the plea and replication. First, I say a judicial act dates from the earliest minute of the day in which it is done.

After citing authorities, he continued—[2]

The next question presented by their replication is, Did the impeachment relate back to the inception of the proceedings by an authorized committee of the House? Whether the committee was authorized or not is a question of fact. Therefore the comments of the learned counsel relating thereto were not in order, because it is affirmed on the part of the House of Representatives that this committee had authority. If it should appear that the committee had no authority, then another principle would be invoked, and that is the principle of adoption. But it is not necessary to discuss that now, because for the purposes of this argument the authority is conceded. In regard to the principle of relation it is this: That the House of Representatives before this resignation having instituted proceedings against Mr. Belknap for the purpose of investigating these crimes and for the purpose of impeaching the defendant, when the impeachment was made it related back to the original proceeding which was instituted, as is confessed, before this resignation. When divers acts concur to a result, the original act is to be preferred, and to this the other acts have relation.

And after citing other authorities:

In this case we claim that the House of Representatives, having obtained jurisdiction of the subject-matter by instituting these proceedings against the defendant, he could no more defeat them by resigning midway than he could defeat the Constitution itself. When the House of Representatives by its solemn act impeached him of high crimes and misdemeanors, that was a judicial act, the highest judicial act that can be performed in this nation save one, and that is the act to be performed by this tribunal when it pronounces "guilty" or "not guilty" upon the proofs before it.

Therefore, we say the defendant in this case should not be allowed his dilatory plea, because these proceedings had been instituted against him long before he had resigned his office, long before he had attempted to escape the penalty due to his crime by this resignation. This impeachment is in furtherance of justice, not in furtherance of injustice. It is due to the defendant; it is due to the dead whom he claims to represent; it is due to all the associations that surround him, if he is an innocent man, that he establish his innocence in this tribunal. Therefore to hold jurisdiction in this case, to give him the opportunity to establish his innocence, or the House of Representatives to establish his guilt, is in furtherance of justice. To deny jurisdiction under these circumstances would be in furtherance of injustice.

In this case before the court the doctrine of relation prevents injustice, for it changes no rule of evidence, and does not affect the merits.

Mr. Carpenter, of counsel for respondent, argued,[1] on the other hand:

If I am right in saying that the only purpose of impeachment is to remove a man from office, when the man is out of office the object of impeachment ceases, and the proceedings must abate. There would be no further object to attain by the proceeding. Suppose the man committed suicide while his trial was progressing, would not that be good matter of abatement? Suppose he commits official suicide by resigning, why should this not have the same effect? I have attempted to show that the sole object for which the power of impeachment was given is removal from office.

There is another proposition which I intended to argue in that connection. The disqualification clause of punishment was evidently put in for the purpose of making the power of removal by impeachment effectual. After providing that the officers of the United States might be removed on impeachment, although the President could not pardon the offender convicted and removed, yet if he could reinstate him the next morning he would have substantially the power of pardon. To prevent this was the object of the disqualifying clause; which Story says is not a necessary part of the judgment. You might impose it where you had removed an officer appointed by the President whom the President could reinstate. You could stop that by fixing disability upon the officer; and that I take to have been the sole purpose of this clause.

If I am right in this position, if the man died in the middle of the trial, or if he died after finding against him, but before judgment had been pronounced, the suit would abate. Must this court go on and sentence a man after he is dead—either physically or officially dead? It is equally absurd to talk of removing a man from an office which he no longer fills, as to talk of removing a man from office after he is dead. So far as its effect upon the suit is concerned I see no difference between the case of his natural death and his official death. The suit abates because there is no further object to be attained by its prosecution.

Let me remind the Senate that there is not a writer on this subject who does not maintain that the power of impeachment was never intended for punsihment.

This is conclusively shown by the fact that the party, after he is impeached, is to be indicted and punished for his crime. And it should be remarked that, if impeachment lies against one not in office, he must either not be punished at all, which would show the absurdity of the proceeding; or you must inflict the disqualification, which, Story says, you need not inflict on one removed from office.

Returning from this digression to the line of my argument, let me say that Rawle's Commentaries and the report of the Blount case were considered by Judge Story in writing his Commentaries, and he quotes from them both, but evidently disagrees with Rawle's parenthetic suggestion, and the concessions made by the counsel of Blount.

Mr. Roscoe Conkling, a Senator from New York, asked Mr. Carpenter this question:

Is there no distinction on the point of jurisdiction to try an impeachment, between the case of a resignation before articles are found and the case of resignation not till after articles, have been found?

Mr. Carpenter replied:[2]

The question put to me by the Senator from New York is very specific, and, in reply, I would say that a distinction exists between the case where a resignation precedes the exhibition of the articles and the case where a resignation comes between the exhibition of the articles and final judgment. And this court might hold that after jurisdiction had attached by exhibition of the articles, or even by the formal impeachment which precedes exhibition of articles, the jurisdiction had attached, and resignation would not prevent final judgment. Speaking, however, for myself, I still incline to the opinion that if the officer, who alone can be impeached, is out of the office before judgment of removal passes, this would abate a proceeding, which, I have endeavored to show, can only be had for the purpose of removal. It is said the law will not require a vain thing; from which I infer that the highest court in the Republic will not render a vain judgment.

Mr. Carpenter also said,[1] after citing authorities:

But against this array of authorities, showing that a private citizen can not be impeached, the managers say that Belknap was in office at the time of the impeachment. It is not denied that Belknap resigned, and his resignation was accepted by the President, at 10 o'clock and 20 minutes a. m., March 2, 1876; nor is it denied that the first proceedings in the House in relation to him took place after 3 p. m. of that day. But the managers say that, in legal contemplation, he was in office at the time of impeachment, because the law will not notice fractions of a day; and, second, that he resigned to evade impeachment, and therefore was in office for the purpose of impeachment after his resignation was accepted.

Fractions of a day! I did not suppose this case would be determined on a question of special pleading, or a fiction of law, until I heard the argument of the learned manager [Mr. Lord] yesterday. I supposed we could strike through the fog and place our feet upon the solid rock of jurisdiction. But the managers propose to hold us by a fiction. They maintain that, although the respondent had resigned, and his resignation had been accepted, nevertheless, this court must decide that he was in office all day, and until after his impeachment on the afternoon of that day, because this court can not distinguish between the forenoon and afternoon of a day.

Suppose a man is sentenced by a criminal court to be hanged at 2 p. m. of a certain day; and suppose the President pardons him at 10 a. m. of that day. Must he be hanged at 2 p. m. because the law knows no fraction of a day? We have heard of men being hanged on the gallows; hanged at the yard-arm; but we never heard of a man being hanged on the fraction of a day.

Suppose in time of war the colonel of a regiment is relieved from duty, or his resignation accepted at 9 o'clock in the morning, and at 4 p. m. of the same day the regiment is engaged in battle. Could the colonel be court-martialed because he was not at the head of his regiment at 4 o'clock?

But having answered the managers on the substance of their claim of jurisdiction, we shall not yield to their fictions.

Mr. Manager Jenks replied[2] to Mr. Carpenter:

Of the second portion of this proposition, which is concerning the collateral facts, I shall say but little, if anything, more than this: It has been considered by the chairman of the managers, he has advanced three or four propositions in support of the view that it is material to consider all the surrounding facts. One of those propositions is, that in law there is no fraction of a day. He has cited authorities to establish that; that was the general rule, that in law there is no fraction of a day. This being the general rule, an exception was introduced by the honorable counsel for the defendant, that is, that if it be necessary to subserve the purposes of justice, a court will consider the fractions of a day. Then the matter stands thus: As a rule, courts will not recognize the fractions of a day; but as an exception, if it be necessary to subserve the purposes of justice, they will recognize the fractions of a day. Hence, when the counsel cited those authorities to show that they would consider it as an exception, it was essential to show that it was necessary to subserve the purposes of justice to bring his case within the exception. He left off just where the real contest began: Is it necessary to subserve the purposes of justice that this court should recognize the fractions of a day? It seems to me that there is no necessity in subserving the purposes of justice that this court should recognize any fraction of a day. Put the question in this form: How can it subserve the interests of justice, when a defendant is charged with having surreptitiously filched from the pockets of from eight hundred to a thousand men from 10 to 25 cents every day for five years, that that defendant shall plead this as an excuse, that the ends of justice are subserved by recognizing the fractions of a day? If he had discussed this, and shown that this defendant would have been wronged did you not consider it, he would then have brought his case within the exception; but, having failed to do that, he leaves it as my colleague, the chairman, left it; that is, that the general rule, if the defendant have not brought himself within the exception, still exists, and the court will not recognize the fractions of a day.

With reference to the question of relation, that was not considered at all by the counsel for the defendant, and we shall leave it, as our chairman has left it, with you.

The Senate debated the question from the 15th to the 29th of May.[1] The debates were behind closed doors and were not reported.

On May 16[2] the following questions were submitted by Senators for consideration:

By Mr. Oliver P. Morton, of Indiana:

Is there power in Congress to impeach a person for crime committed while in office if such person had resigned the office and such resignation had been accepted before the finding of articles of impeachment by the House?

By Mr. Justin S. Morrill, of Vermont:

Has the Senate power to entertain jurisdiction in the pending case of the impeachment by the House of Representatives of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, notwithstanding the facts alleged in relation to his resignation?

By Mr. John Sherman, of Ohio, on May 25:[3]

Resolved, That notwithstanding the resignation of William W. Belknap prior to his impeachment by the House of Representatives he is still liable to such impeachment for the misdemeanors charged in the articles presented by the House of Representatives, and his plea of such resignation is not sufficient in law to bar the trial upon such articles.

On May 29[4] the Presiding Officer announced that the proposition pending was that offered by Mr. Morton on the 16th instant. Thereupon Mr. Morton modified his proposition to read as follows:

Resolved, That the power of impeachment created by the Constitution does not extend to a person who is charged with the commission of a high crime while he was a civil officer of the United States and acting in his official character, but who had ceased to be such officer before the finding of articles of impeachment by the House of Representatives.

Mr. Justin S. Morrill, of Vermont, moved to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "resolved," in the first line, and in lieu thereof inserting:

That the demurrer of the respondent to the replication of the House of Representatives to the plea of the respondent be, and the same is hereby, overruled; and that the plea of the respondent to the jurisdiction of the Senate be, and the same is hereby, overruled; and that the articles of impeachment are sufficient to show that the Senate has jurisdiction of the case, and that the respondent answer to the merits of the accusation contained in the articles of impeachment.

Mr. Isaac P. Christiancy, of Michigan, moved to amend the amendment of Mr. Morrill, of Vermont, by striking out all after the word "that" in the first line thereof, and inserting:

W. W. Belknap, the respondent, is not amenable to trial by impeachment for acts done as Secretary of War, he having resigned said office before impeachment.

Mr. George G. Wright, of Iowa, moved to lay the resolution of Mr. Morton on the table, and this motion was agreed to, yeas 36, nays 30.

Thereupon Mr. Allen G. Thurman, of Ohio, proposed a resolution, which was in this form, after the words "before he was impeached" had been added on motion of Mr. Roscoe Conkling, of New York:

Resolved, That in the opinion of the Senate William W. Belknap, the respondent, is amenable to trial by impeachment for acts done as Secretary of War, notwithstanding his resignation of said office before he was impeached.

Mr. Algernon S. Paddock, of Nebraska, moved to amend the said resolution by striking out all after the word "resolved" and in lieu thereof inserting:

That William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, having ceased to be a civil officer of the United States by reason of his resignation before proceedings in impeachment were commenced against him by the House of Representatives, the Senate can not take jurisdiction in this case.

This amendment was disagreed to, yeas 29, nays 37.

Then the resolution was agreed to, yeas 37, nays 29.

Mr. Thurman also presented a further resolution, which, after amendment at the suggestion of Mr. Thomas F. Bayard, of Delaware, was agreed to by a vote of 35 yeas, 22 nays:

Resolved, That at the time specified in the foregoing resolution [June 1 was fixed by a separate resolution] the President of the Senate shall pronounce the judgment of the Senate as follows: "It is ordered by the Senate sitting for the trial of the articles of impeachment preferred by the House of Representatives against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, that the demurrer of said William W. Belknap to the replication of the House of Representatives to the plea to the jurisdiction filed by said Belknap be, and the same hereby is, overruled; and, it being the opinion of the Senate that said plea is insufficient in law and that said articles of impeachment are sufficient in law, it is therefore further ordered and adjudged that said plea be, and the same hereby is, overruled and held for naught;" which judgment thus pronounced shall be entered upon the Journal of the Senate sitting as aforesaid.

In the final arguments Messrs. Montgomery Blair[1] and Matthew H. Carpenter.[2] also argued this question.

2008. Reference to discussions as to what are impeachable offenses.— In the course of the arguments during the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, the question, "What are impeachable offenses?" was discussed at length and learnedly. Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts, argued[3] learnedly in favor of this definition:

We define therefore an impeachable high crime or misdemeanor to be one in its nature or consequences subversive of some fundamental or essential principle of government or highly prejudicial to the public interest, and this may consist of a violation of the Constitution, of law, of an official oath, or of duty, by an act committed or omitted, or, without violating a positive law, by the abuse of discretionary powers from improper motives or for any improper purpose.

Mr. Butler also appended to his argument[4] an exhaustive brief on the "law of impeachable crimes and misdemeanors," prepared by Mr. William Lawrence, of Ohio.[5] This view was also supported by Mr. Manager John A. Logan, of Illinois.[6] Of the Senators who filed written opinions, Mr. Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts, argued at length that political offenses were impeachable offenses.[7] So also argued Mr. Richard Yates, of Illinois.[8]

Mr. Benjamin R. Curtis, of Massachusetts, of counsel for the President, argued, on the other hand, that impeachable offenses could only be offenses against the laws of the United States.[1] Mr. Thomas A. R. Nelson, of Tennessee, also of President's counsel, argued in the same line,[2] and Mr. William M. Evarts, of New York, also of counsel for the President, argued at length against the definition given by Mr. Manager Butler.[3] Of the Senators who filed written opinions on the case, this view was sustained by Mr. Garrett Davis, of Kentucky.[4]

2009. Argument that the phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors" is a "term of art," of fixed meaning in English parliamentary law, and transplanted to the Constitution in unchangeable significance.—On February 22, 1905,[5] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Messrs. Anthony Higgins and John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, offered a brief in support of their plea of jurisdiction as to the first seven articles. This brief, which was signed by them as counsel, but which, as they said, had been prepared by another, covered many questions relating to impeachments, the following being among them:

I. WHAT ARE IMPEACHABLE "HIGH CRIMES AND MISDEMEANORS," AS DEFINED IN ARTICLE II, SECTION 4, OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES?

By a strange coincidence, the death of parliamentary impeachment, as a living and working organ of the English constitution, synchronizes with its birth in American constitutions, State and Federal. Leaving out of view the comparatively unimportant impeachment of Lord Melville (1805), really the last of that long series of accusations by the Commons and trials by the Lords, which began in the fiftieth year of the reign of Edward III (1376), was the case of Warren Hastings, who was impeached in the very year in which the Federal Convention of 1787 met at Philadelphia. Before that famous prosecution, with its failure and disappointment, drew to a close, the English people resolved that the ancient and cumbrous machinery of parliamentary impeachment was no longer adapted to the wants of a modern and progressive society. But before this ancient method of trial thus passed into desuetude in the land of its birth it was embodied, in a modified form, first in the several State constitutions and finally in the Constitution of the United States.

Article II, section 4, of the Federal Constitution, provides that "the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors." Article I, section 2, provides that "the House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker and other officers; and shall have the sole power of impeachment." Article I, section 3, provides that "the Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. When sitting for that purpose, they shall be on oath or affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside; and no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the Members present. Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States; but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment, according to law." Article III, section 2, provides that "the trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury."

II. PROVISIONS BORROWED FROM THE ENGLISH CONSTITUTION.

Mr. Bayard said in his argument in Blount's trial (Wharton's St. Tr., 264): "On this subject, the Convention proceeded in the same manner it is manifest they did in many other cases. They considered the object of their legislation as a known thing, having a previous definite existence. Thus existing, their work was solely to mold it into a suitable shape. They have given it to us, not as a thing of their creation, but merely of their modification. And therefore I shall insist that it remains as at common law, with the variance only of the positive provisions of the Constitution. * * * That law was familiar to all those who framed the Constitution. Its institutions furnished the principles of jurisprudence in most of the States. It was the only common language intelligible to the members of the Convention."

A recent writer of note, speaking on the same subject, has said: "If we examine the clauses of the Constitution, we perceive at once that the phraseology is applied to a method of procedure already existing. 'Impeachment' is not defined, but is used precisely as 'felony,' 'larceny,' 'burglary,' 'grand jury,' 'real actions,' or any other legal term used so long as to have acquired an accepted meaning, might be. The Constitution takes impeachment as an established procedure, and lodges the jurisdiction in a particular court, declaring how and by whom the process shall be put in motion, and how far it shall be carried. They have given to us a thing not of their creation, but of their modification. To ascertain, then, what this established procedure was, what were, at the time of the Constitutional Convention, impeachable offenses, we must look to England, where the legal notions contained in the clauses quoted had their origin." (American Law Review, vol. 16, p. 800. Article by G. Willett Van Nest.) Madison, in No. 65 of the Federalist, said: "The model from which the idea of this institution has been borrowed pointed out the course to the Convention. In Great Britain it is the province of the House of Commons to prefer the impeachment and of the House of Lords to decide upon it. Several of the State constitutions have followed the example."

III. HIGH CRIMES AND MISDEMEANORS AS DEFINED IN ENGLISH PARLIAMENTARY LAW.

The English Parliament as a whole has always been considered and styled "The high court of Parliament," which is governed by a single body of law peculiarly its own. As Sir Thomas Erskine May (Parl. Prac., pp. 71 and 72) has well expressed it: "Each house, as a constituent part of Parliament, exercises its own privileges independently of the other. They are enjoyed, however, not by a separate right peculiar to each, but solely by virtue of the law and custom of Parliament." In the words of Lord Coke (4 Inst., 15), "As every court of justice hath laws and customs for its direction—some the civil and canon, some the common law, others their own peculiar laws and customs—so the high court of Parliament hath also its own peculiar law, called the lex et consuetudo parliamenti." Blackstone (Bk. I, 163) in commenting upon the statement of Coke, that the law of Parliament, unknown to many and known by few, should be sought by all, observes that, "It is much better to be learned out of the rolls of Parliament and other records and by precedents and continual experience than can be expressed by any one man." Chitty, in commenting upon the statement of Blackstone, has said:

"The law of Parliament is part of the general law of the land, and must be discovered and construed like all other laws. The members of the respective houses of Parliament are in most instances the judges of that law; and, like the judges of the realm, when they are deciding upon past laws, they are under the most sacred obligation to inquire and decide what the law actually is, and not what, in their will and pleasure, or even in their reason and wisdom, it ought to be. When they are declaring what is the law of Parliament, their character is totally different from that with which, as legislators, they are invested when they are framing new laws; and they ought never to forget the admonition of that great and patriotic chief justice, Lord Holt, viz, 'that the authority of the Parliament is from the law, and as it is circumscribed by law, so it may be exceeded; and if they do exceed those legal bounds and authority their acts are wrongful, and can not be justified any more than the acts of private men.' (1 Salk, 505.)" (Chitty's Blackstone, vol. 1, p. 119, note 21.) It has always been conceded that the phrase "other high crimes and misdemeanors," embodied in Article II, section 4, of the Constitution of the United States, must be construed in the light of the definitions fixing its meaning in the parliamentary law of England as that law existed in 1787. The construction then given to the phrase in question was incorporated into our Federal Constitution as a part of the phrase itself, which is unintelligible and meaningless without such construction. The following elementary principles (as stated by Hon. William Lawrence, in the brief prepared by him for use in the trial of Andrew Johnson, Vol. I, pp. 125, 136), seem upon that occasion, to have passed unchallenged:

"As these words are copied by our Constitution from the British constitutional and parliamentary law, they are, so far as applicable to our institutions and condition, to be interpreted not by English municipal law but by the lex parliamentaria. * * * Whatever 'crimes and misdemeanors' were the subject of impeachment in England prior to the adoption of our Constitution, and as understood by its framers, are therefore subjects of impeachment before the Senate of the United States, subject only to the limitations of the Constitution. * * * 'Treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors' are, of course, impeachable. Treason and bribery are specifically named, but 'other high crimes and misdemeanors' are just as fully comprehended as though each was specified. The Senate is made the sole judge of what they are. There is no revising court. The Senate determines in the light of parliamentary law. Congress can not define or limit by law that which the Constitution defines in two cases by enumeration and in others by classification, and of which the Senate is sole judge. * * * Now, when the Constitution says that all civil officers shall be removable on impeachment for high crimes and misdemeanors, and the Senate shall have the sole power of trial, the jurisdiction is conferred and its scope is defined by common parliamentary law."

While the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment is the sole and final judge of what impeachable "high crimes and misdemeanors" are, no arbitrary discretion so to determine is vested. The power of the court simply extends to the construction of the phrase in question as defined in English constitutional and parliamentary law as it existed in 1787. That is made plain by Story in his Commentary on the Constitution, section 797, when he says: "Resort then must be had either to parliamentary practice, and the common law, in order to ascertain what high crimes and misdemeanors; or the whole subject must be left to the arbitrary discretion of the Senate for the time being. The latter is so incompatible with the genius of our institutions that no lawyer or statesman would be inclined to countenance so absolute a despotism of opinion and practice, which might make that a crime at one time or in one person which would be deemed innocent at another time or in another person. The only safe guide in such cases must be the common law."

IV. A RULE OF CONSTITUTIONAL CONSTRUCTION AS DEFINED BY THE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The fundamental principles of English constitutional law were first reproduced in the constitutions of the several States. In the light of the construction put upon them there, they were embodied, so far as applicable and desirable, in the Constitution of the United States. Thus the Federal Supreme Court was called upon at an early day to interpret the immemorial formulas or "terms of art" through which the cardinal principles of English constitutional law were incorporated in our governmental systems, State and Federal. The uniform rule for construing such formulas or "terms of art" adopted at the outset has been continued in force until the present time. When, in the trial of Aaron Burr, Chief Justice Marshall was called upon to construe Article III, section 3, of the Constitution, which provides that "treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort," he said, "What is the natural import of the words 'levying war?' and who may be said to levy it? * * * The term is not for the first time applied to treason by the Constitution of the United States. It is a technical term. It is used in a very old statute of that country whose language is our language and whose laws form the substratum of our laws. It is scarcely conceivable that the term was not employed by the framers of our Constitution in the sense which had been affixed to it by those from whom we borrowed it. So far as the meaning of any terms, particularly terms of art, is completely ascertained, those by whom they are employed must be considered as employing them in that ascertained meaning, unless the contrary be proved by the context. It is therefore reasonable to suppose, unless it be incompatible with other expressions of the Constitution, that the term 'levying war' is used in that instrument in the same sense in which it was understood in England and in this country to have been used in the statute of twenty-fifth of Edward III, from which it was borrowed." (Burr's Trial, vol. 2, pp. 401, 402.)

When in the case of Murray v. The Hoboken Land Co. (18 How., 272) it became necessary for the Supreme Court to construe the formula "due process of law," as embodied in the fifth amendment, Mr. Justice Curtis, speaking for the court, said: "The words 'due process of law' were undoubtedly intended to convey the same meaning as the words 'by the law of the land' in Magna Charta. Lord Coke, in his commentary on those words (2 Inst., 50), says they mean due process of law. The constitutions which had been adopted by the several States before the formation of the Federal Constitution, following the language of the Great Charter more closely, generally contained the words 'but by the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land.' The ordinance of Congress of July 13, 1787, for the government of the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio, used the words."

When in the case of Davidson v. New Orleans (96 U. S., 97) it became necessary to again construe the same formula—"due process of law," as embodied in the fourteenth amendment—Mr. Justice Miller, speaking for the court, said: "The prohibition against depriving the citizen or subject of his life, liberty, or property without due process of law is not new in the constitutional history of the English race. It is not new in the constitutional history of this country, and it was not new in the Constitution of the United States when it became a part of the fourteenth amendment, in the year 1866. The equivalent of the phrase 'due process of law,' according to Lord Coke, is found in the words 'law of the land,' in the Great Charter, in connection with the writ of habeas corpus, the trial by jury, and other guarantees of the rights of the subject against the oppression of the Crown." In Smith v. Alabama (124 U. S., 465) it was held that "the interpretation of the Constitution of the United States is necessarily influenced by the fact that its provisions are framed in the language of the English common law, and are to be read in the light of its history," a statement affirmed by the adoption in United States v. Wong Kim Ark (169 U. S. 649).

V. IMMEMORIAL FORMULAS TRANSPLANTED FROM THE ENGLISH CONSTITUTION, UNCHANGEABLE BY SUBSEQUENT CONGRESSIONAL LEGISLATION.

The foregoing authorities put the fact beyond all question that the immemorial formulas or "terms of art" transferred from the English constitution to our own were adopted, not as isolated or abstract phrases, but as epitomes or digests of the great principles which they embodied. That is to say, the term "levying war" carried with it the identical meaning given it as a part of the statute of Edward III; the term "due process of law," the identical meaning given to it as a part of Magna Charta; the term "high crimes and misdemeanors," the identical meaning given it as a part of the law of the High Court of Parliament. Or, in other words, when such formulas were embedded in the Constitution of 1787, their historical meaning and construction went along with them as completely as if such meaning and construction had been written out at length upon the face of the instrument itself. If that be true, the conclusion is self-evident that no subsequent Congressional legislation can change in any way, by addition or substraction, the definitions embodied in such formulas at the time of their adoption. If the contrary were true, Congress could any day give to the term "levying war" or "due process of law" a definition, conveying ideas of which the fathers never dreamed. Or if the term "high crimes and misdemeanors" could be subjected to a new Congressional definition, acts which were such in 1787 could be relieved of all criminality, and new acts not then criminal could be added to the list of impeachable offenses. So obvious is the fact that Congress can not legislate at all on the subject that Mr. Lawrence, whose brief has been heretofore quoted, frankly admitted, while striving to give to the powers of Congress the widest possible construction, that "Congress can not define or limit by law that which the Constitution defines in two cases by enumeration, and in others by classification, and of which the Senate is sole judge."

The last phrase is specially suggestive of the fact that if Congress could, by subsequent legislation, "define or limit by law that which the Constitution defines," the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment could be entirely deprived by such legislation of the power to determine what were impeachable high crimes and misdemeanors as defined by the fathers in 1787. In other words, if Congress can add to or subtract from the constitutional definition in any particular, it can destroy it altogether. In the great case of Marbury v. Madison (1 Cranch, 137) the first in which an act of Congress was ever declared unconstitutional, the question of questions was this: Does the fact that the Constitution itself has defined the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court prohibit Congress from enlarging such original jurisdiction by subsequent legislation? The solemn answer was that the attempt of Congress to do so was void. Why? Because the dividing line between the original and appellate jurisdiction having been drawn by the Constitution itself, it is immovable by legislation. In the words of the great Chief Justice: "If Congress remains at liberty to give this court appellate jurisdiction where the Constitution has declared their jurisdiction shall be original, and original jurisdiction where the Constitution has declared it shall be appellate, the distribution of jurisdiction made in the Constitution is form without substance." Thus it follows that any act of Congress which attempts to change the constitutional definition of impeachable high crimes and misdemeanors, by adding to the list some offense unknown to the parliamentary law of England as it existed in 1787, is simply void and of no effect.

2010. Argument of Mr. John M. Thurston, counsel, that judges may be impeached only for judicial misconduct occurring in the actual administration of justice in connection with the court.

Argument that an impeachment trial is a criminal proceeding.

On February 25, 1905,[1] in the Senate, sitting for the impeachment of Judge Charles Swayne, Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, in final argument, said:

In the printed brief originally filed in behalf of the respondent a demonstration, based upon the authorities, was made, to the effect that no clear light is to be derived as to the meaning of the phrase "other high crimes and misdemeanors," so far as that phrase relates to the impeachment of English and American judges, except from the English and American judicial impeachment cases in which it has been applied to that subject. Instead of attempting to meet that reasonable and obvious contention upon its merits, the managers have evaded it by propounding a series of generalities, based upon principles drawn, in the main, from political impeachments which throw no real light upon the subject. In the course of that evasion the following remarkable statement has been made:

Said the managers in their brief:

"For the first time in impeachment trials in this or any other country the claim is made that a judge can be impeached only for acts done in his official capacity."

The fact that that statement does not fully relate the history of impeachment cases will appear by consideration of those cases. After the impeachments for bribery, pure and simple, of English judges are put aside, but two judicial impeachments remain in the entire history of the English people—that is, the impeachment of judges.

Judges, like all others, can be impeached for treason not committed upon the bench or in judicial affairs. They can be impeached for bribery by the strict terms of the Constitution, bribery committed anywhere, without regard to whether they were sitting upon the bench at the time. But as to other causes of impeachment I challenge the honorable managers to show me any case in history, English or American, where a judge has been impeached for any other crime or high misdemeanor except one alleged to have been committed in connection with his exercise of judicial authority. In saying that, I do not refer to some impeachment cases that have happened in States and under State constitutions, for many of the constitutions of the several States have provisions largely at variance with those of the Constitution of the United States upon this subject.

But four judicial impeachments have taken place under the Constitution of the United States. It was admitted by the House of Commons in England and by the House of Representatives in the United States by the form of the articles they presented in these judicial impeachment cases that, excepting treason or bribery, neither an English nor a Federal judge could be impeached except for judicial misconduct occurring in the actual administration of justice in connection with his court, either between private individuals or between the Government and the citizen.

The statement of the honorable managers in their brief—

"For the first time in impeachment trials in this or any other country the claim is made that a judge can be impeached only for acts done in his official capacity"— is contradicted by the judicial history of every case of impeachment of a judge in Great Britain and the United States.

Mr. Manager Olmsted was greatly mistaken when he said in his argument.

"One year later, the Senate having convicted John Pickering, Federal judge in a New Hampshire district, upon a charge of drunkenness"—

The article exhibited against John Pickering charged him with drunkenness upon the bench, and was limited to that charge, for the framers of that impeachment well knew that the drunkenness of the judge was no ground for impeachment under the Constitution of the United States unless he carried that drunkenness upon the bench.

The articles against Pickering read.

"Being then judge of the district court in and for the district of New Hampshire, did appear on the bench of the said court for the purpose of administering justice in a state of total intoxication, produced by the free and intemperate use of inebriating liquors, and did then and there frequently in a most profane and indecent manner"—

[1] Third session Fifty-eighth Congress, Record, pp. 3365, 3366.

That is, on the bench, while administering justice—

"invoke the name of the Supreme Being, etc."

It was perfectly understood by every constitutional lawyer then, as it should be understood now, that the personal misconduct of an English judge off the bench has never furnished the ground for impeachment, and for the well-understood reason that under the English constitution, as it has been called, they provided for two methods of removing judges from the bench—one by impeachment for high crimes and misdemeanors and the other upon address to the sovereign by both houses of Parliament.

When we came to frame our Constitution we adopted from the English constitution the term "treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors." The question was mooted in that convention as to whether or not we should also embody in our Constitution the English provision for the removal of Federal judges by address of the two Houses of Congress to the President. Understanding perfectly well, as the debates will show, that impeachment would only lie for a crime or offense committed in connection with the judicial office and the administration of justice, they rejected the proposed clause providing for removal by address. The framers of our Constitution did this because they were tenacious of the stability of the tenure of office of our Federal judges, and were fearful that if they enlarged the impeachment provision some of the States, by reason of local prejudice, might proceed criminally against them, and upon conviction of crime base articles of impeachment thereon.

Mr. President, I state here and now that the contention made by one of the honorable managers that a judge can be impeached under the Constitution of the United States for a crime committed as an individual against a State law has no foundation in any case that has ever been known of on the earth, was not thought of as possible by the framers of our Constitution, and is not the law to-day. It would leave a Federal judge at the mercy of a local condition, inimical as it might be to the Federal Constitution.

The case of Humphreys has been cited as a case where a Federal judge was impeached for other than judicial misconduct. Yes, Humphreys was impeached for treason. Any judge can be impeached for treason or for bribery, no matter where or how committed, but the only charge in his impeachment other than treason was the charge of judicial misconduct as the judge of the court, in the court, and acting in the administration of justice.

Mr. President, that the framers of our Constitution well knew the limitations they were imposing upon the right of impeachment is further attested by the fact that in the original draft of that great document the language was "for treason, bribery, or maladministration," and the word "maladministration" has crept into some of the constitutions of our several States. Upon the consideration of that question on the floor of the convention it was moved to strike out "maladministration" and insert "other high crimes and misdemeanors," and for the very reason that the term "maladministration" was a loose term that might mean, under the decisions of the Senate in the future, much or little; that it might cover impeachments at one period of time by one party in power that it would not cover at another period of time with another party in power. They struck it out because it was too large a term, too loose a term, and they inserted in its place those definite words, "high crimes and misdemeanors," taken from the English constitution with parliamentary construction already attached.

We took that provision from the English constitution and with it we took the interpretation that was placed upon it by the lex parliamenti, the law of Parliament, established by the adjudications in the great tribunal. That provision meant then what it meant in England at the time. Mr. President, that provision meant then what it has meant ever since. It meant then what it always must mean. From the debates in that convention it does appear that those words were adopted with that construction upon them because it was claimed that it would be unwise to permit even the Congress of the United States, by ever making something a crime that was not then a crime, to enlarge the operation of that impeachment provision of the Constitution, or to repeal some of those things which then constituted crimes and thereby prevent the impeachment of those who committed them.

Sir, that provision of the Constitution was embodied in that great instrument with a meaning that can never be changed by the Congress of the United States. It was embodied there with a meaning which will remain the same to the end of time. It furnishes the limitation with which the power of Congress can be exercised in impeachment cases.

I insist that for the first time in this case is it even suggested by constitutional lawyers that that term permits the impeachment of a judge simply because he has been tried and convicted in a court of a State for a crime against the statutes of a State, or because in his private life he has been impure or improvident, or because of any other shortcomings or failures exhibited in his career except those which relate to the administration of justice in the court over which he presides.

Mr. President, before proceeding to discuss the articles and the evidence, I call your attention to the fact that this is a criminal proceeding, and the respondent is charged with a crime. That question was settled by the Senate some days since upon the vote taken on the question of the admissibility of evidence. It is certain that this proposition is true, because the last portion of section 2 of article 3 of the Constitution of the United States provides that "the trial of all crimes except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury," and thereby the framers of that great instrument declared that an offense to be impeachable must be a crime, or, what is equivalent to it, a high misdemeanor.

Mr. President, this respondent, being on trial charged with crime, is entitled to every reasonable doubt that may arise upon the evidence in the case. I do not come here to claim that he needs the application of this rule, for I insist that the evidence in this case shows that he is guiltless beyond a reasonable doubt; but I invoke the attention of the Senate to that beneficent rule of law now because it is the outgrowth of the spirit of liberty and justice so strong in the Anglo-Saxon race. It is the common safeguard and heritage of every American citizen. It is the shield of the accused and is a bulwark for the protection of the liberty and life of every man, woman, and child in the land.

2011. Argument of Mr. Manager Perkins that a judge may be impeached for personal misconduct.—On February 24, 1905,[1] in the Senate, sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Mr. Manager James B. Perkins, of New York, in concluding argument, said in relation to the articles charging nonresidents in the district:

The argument made in behalf of the respondent is this: That a judge, under the precedents of the English courts, can not be impeached for any act except one done in the course of his duty as a judge, and that the sixth and seventh articles do not charge an omission of duty as a judge, but an omission of duty as an individual.

Mr. President, this can best be answered by an illustration of what is the logical and necessary result of the argument on the other side, that a judge of the United States court can not be impeached by the Senate of the United States unless for some strictly judicial act. Let us suppose that a judge commits a crime; that he forges a note; that he embezzles money. He is indicted and tried and convicted in the State courts of these crimes and sentenced to bear the punishment. Then it is sought to remove him from office by impeachment. The judge having committed these crimes is impeached. He employs my learned friends on the other side, and they claim before the Senate then, as they claim now, that the Senate has no power to impeach a judge except for acts done as a judge. They say, and say justly, that when this judge forged a note, or embezzled money, he was not acting as a judge, but as an individual. And if the argument be just, we have this extraordinary conclusion: A judge can not be removed except by impeachment. The judge, for the crime committed in his private capacity, is serving his term in State's prison. As he marches to perform hard labor, he will once a month receive the consolation of opening the envelope containing the check which will be monthly sent to him to pay him his salary as a judge of the United States court. Such a result shows the absurdity of the position.

The English cases are cited, but in England, apart from the remedy by impeachment, a judge can be removed for any cause deemed sufficient by a bill of attainder. That is unknown in this country. Bills of attainder were not put in our Constitution, and the remedy by impeachment by the Senate is the sole remedy by which a judge can be removed.

But a word more. What offense is Judge Swayne charged with? It is that he did not reside within his district. The law could not say that Judge Swayne as an individual should reside in the northern district of Florida or anywhere else, but the law says that when he is a judge he, because he is a judge, shall reside within his district; and when he failed so to do he omitted a judicial requirement made of him just as much as if he had sold justice or made unrighteous decisions.

[1] Third session Fifty-eighth Congress, Record, p. 3246.

I shall say no more on that point, but come at once to what is the important, the great question in this case—not whether the offense is impeachable, but whether the offense was committed. It has already been suggested that a judge of the United States court is the one officer in the land who holds his office by a life tenure. He can not be removed by the people. He can not be removed by the President. Nothing but the act of God or the vote of the Senate can remove a man who holds the office of United States judge. His dignity is great; his responsibility is correspondingly great. The people who complain, the people who lack confidence in their judges, can look to the Senate and can look here alone for relief. If they can not get it here they can not get it anywhere.

2012. Argument of Mr. Anthony Higgins, counsel, that impeachable offenses by a judge are confined to acts done on the bench in discharge of his duties.—On February 24, 1905,[1] in the Senate, sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Mr. Anthony Higgins, of counsel for the respondent, said in final argument:

Mr. President, I conceive it is of no slight interest or importance to the Senate that of the four learned managers who have now taken part in the presentation of the prosecution of this case three of them have devoted as much time as they have to the question whether the offenses charged in the first seven articles constitute impeachable offenses—the alleged offense or crime of the respondent of making a false claim, or obtaining money by false pretenses; of using a car belonging to a railroad company, contrary to good morals, and, third, in not obeying the statute to reside in his district. All three have united in presenting the argument of ab inconvenienti—one which seldom weighs much with courts, and one which, it seems to us, after the conclusive discussion of the subject in the argument which it has been our privilege to present to the Senate on the constitutional question, is not left in the case really for discusion. That argument shows beyond peradventure that the framers of the Constitution in leaving out of the Constitution any provision for the removal of an official subject to impeachment by address did it purposely and with a view of giving stability to those who hold the offices, and especially the judges.

"Mr. Dickinson," says Elliott in his Debates on the Constitution, "moved, as an amendment to Article XI, section 2, after the words 'good behavior,' the words 'Provided, That they may be removed by the Executive on the application by the Senate and House of Representatives.' "

This was in respect of the judges.

Mr. Gerry seconded the motion. Mr. Gouverneur Morris thought it a contradiction in terms to say that the judges should hold their offices during good behavior and yet be removable without a trial. Besides, it was fundamentally wrong to subject judges to so arbitrary an authority.

* * * * * * *

"Mr. Randolph opposed the motion as weakening too much the independence of the judges.

* * * * * * *

"Delaware alone voted for Mr. Dickinson's motion."

Says Judge Lawrence in a paper on this subject, which he filed in the Johnson impeachment case:

"Impeachment was deemed sufficiently comprehensive to cover every proper case for removal.

* * * * * * *

"The first proposition was to use the words 'to be removable on impeachment and conviction for malpractice and neglect of duty.' It was agreed that these expressions were too general. They were therefore stricken out."

* * * * * * *

Mr. Mason said:

"Treason, as defined in the Constitution, will not reach many great and dangerous offenses. Hastings is not guilty of treason. Attempts to subvert the Constitution may not be treason as above defined."

He moved to insert after "bribery" the words "or maladministration."

Mr. Madison replied:

"So vague a term will be equivalent to a tenure during the pleasure of the Senate."

[1] Third session Fifty-eighth Congress, Record, pp. 3258-3259.

Mr. Mason withdrew "maladministration" and substituted "other high crimes and misdemeanors against the State."

Mr. President, there are in the States of Pennsylvania, Delaware, South Carolina, Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Illinois, Kentucky, Louisiana, and Texas provisions substantially the same as those contained in the constitutions of Pennsylvania and of Delaware. The constitution of the State of Pennsylvania of 1790 provides:

"ARTICLE V.

"SEC. 2. The judges of the supreme court and of the several courts of common pleas shall hold their offices during good behavior. But for any reasonable cause, which shall not be sufficient ground of impeachment, the governor may remove any of them on the address of two-thirds of each branch of the legislature."

The clause of the constitution of Delaware is similar. The Pennsylvania constitution as amended in 1838 provides:

"SEC. 3. The governor and all other civil officers under this Commonwealth shall be liable to impeachment for any misdemeanor in office, but judgment in such cases shall not extend farther than to removal from office and disqualification to hold any office of honor, trust, or profit under the Commonwealth. The party, whether convicted or acquitted, shall, nevertheless, be liable to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law." (Page 1561.)

So that there are in those constitutions the direct provision that power of removal by address is given as punishment for cases which by the very words of the constitution are said not to be the subject of impeachment.

An examination of the constitutions of the several States will show that there are not more than two or three State constitutions which do not contain the power of removal by address. That power was placed in the English constitution by a great and famous historic statute—the Act of Settlement—passed early in the reign of William and Mary, or of Anne, at the time when the present dynasty of the British throne was placed upon the authority of an act of Parliament. Then it was that the provision was placed in the statute that judges should be removable by address for causes that were not the subject of impeachment. Therefore, in the face of this state of the constitutional law and of the terms and provisions of the Constitution, where is there room for an argument that that construction shall not hold because there is no other way of getting rid of judges but by impeachment?

Now, but one word more on this, and that is in respect to the case that was cited by the learned manager, Mr. Olmsted, of an impeachment in Massachusetts. I call attention to the fact that the constitution of Massachusetts of 1780 makes provision for the impeachment of judges broader than the other States, or at least most of them.

"ART. VIII. The Senate shall be a court with full authority to hear and determine all impeachments made by the house of representatives against any officer or officers of the Commonwealth for misconduct and maladministration in their offices."

So in Massachusetts the judge who took illegal fees upon the ministerial side of his probate court was clearly impeachable under the provision of the Massachusetts constitution, which extended to ministerial functions.

2013. Argument from review of English impeachments that the phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors," as applied to judicial conduct, must mean only acts of the judge while sitting on the bench.

History of removal by address in England and the States as bearing on the nature of impeachable offenses on the part of a judge.

On February 22, 1905,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Messrs. Anthony Higgins and John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, offered a brief in support of their plea of jurisdiction as to the first seven articles. This brief, which was signed by them as counsel, but which, as they said, had been prepared by another, covered many questions relating to impeachments, the following being among them:

[1] Third session Fifty-eighth Congress, Record, pp. 3028-3031.

The only pertinent definitions of the term "high crimes and misdemeanors," as contained in Article II, section 4, of the Federal Constitution, must be drawn (1) from the law of Parliament as it existed in 1787; (2) from the contemporaneous expositions of that law embodied in the constitutions of the several States. In order to present anything like an adequate statement of the English law of impeachment as it existed at the time in question, some account must be given of the process of growth through which it had passed prior to that time. The history of that growth is divided into two epochs, easily distinguishable from each other. The first begins with the proceedings against the Lords Latimer and Neville, which took place in the Good Parliament in the fiftieth of Edward III (1376). These proceedings are regarded by the constitutional historians as the earliest instances of a trial by lords upon a definite accusation made by the Commons. (Hallam, M. A., Vol. III, p. 56; Stubbs, Const. Hist., Vol. II, p. 431.) Not until early in the reign of Edward III was Parliament definitely and finally divided into two houses that deliberated apart; not until near the close of that reign did the Commons, as the grand jury of the whole realm, attempt to present persons accused of grave offenses against the State to the Lords for trial. At the outset, the new method of accusation was rivaled by what were known as "appeals," which have been thus defined: "It was the regular course for private persons, even persons who were not members of Parliament, to bring accusations of a criminal nature in Parliament, upon which proceedings were had." (Stephen, Hist. of the Criminal Law of England, Vol. I, 151.)

The results of the private warfare thus instituted were so inconvenient that "appeals" were finally abolished by the statute of I Hen. 4, c. 14. Thus left without a rival, proceedings by impeachment were occasionally employed during the reigns of Richard II, Henry IV, Henry V, and Henry VI. In the reign last named Lord Stanley was impeached in 1459 for not sending his troops to the battle of Bloreheath. That trial terminates the first epoch in the history of the law of impeachment in England. It was not again employed during the period that divides 1459 from 1621, an interval of one hundred and sixty-two years. The primary cause for the suspension is to be found in the fact that during that interval it was that the decline in the prestige and influence of Parliament was such that the directing power in the state passed to the King in council, the judicial aspect of which was known as "the star chamber." There it was that the great state trials took place during the reign of Edward IV and during the following reigns of the princes of the house of Tudor. Such impeachment trials as did take place during the first or formative epoch are not as distinctly defined as those that occurred during the later period, and have now only an antiquarian interest.

VII. IMPEACHMENTS IN ENGLAND: SECOND EPOCH.

With the revival of the powers of Parliament in the reign of James I, impeachment was resumed as a weapon of constitutional warfare. From that time its modern history, with which this discussion is concerned, really begins. The first impeachment case to occur during the second epoch was that of Sir Giles Mompesson in 1621, the last that of Lord Melville in 1805. Including the first and last the total is 54. [Here follows the list.]

An examination of the foregoing list reveals the fact that many of the impeachments in question were directed against private individuals, it having always been the law of England that all subjects, as well out of office as in office, might be thus accused and tried. A good illustration may be found in the notable case of Doctor Sacheverell, rector of St. Savior's, Southwark, who was impeached by the Commons and convicted by the Lords for having preached two sermons inculcating the doctrine of unlimited passive obedience. (State Trials, XV, p. 1.) As that branch of the law of impeachment which authorized the accusation of private individuals out of office was never reproduced in this country, cases of that class may be dismissed from consideration. By far the greater number of the remaining cases are what are known as "political impeachments," whereby one party in the State would attempt to crush its adversaries in office by impeaching them for high treason, which generally involved commitment to the Tower.

As illustrations, reference may be made to the case of Portland, Halifax, and Somers, three Whig peers impeached of high treason by a Tory House of Commons for their share in promoting the Spanish partition treaties in 1700; and to that of Oxford, Bolingbroke, and Ormond, Tory ministers impeached by the triumphant Whigs in the Commons for their share in negotiating the peace of Utrecht in 1713. (State Trials, Vol. XIV, p. 233. Parl. Hist., Vol. VII, p. 105.) A well-known English writer has described the latter as "the last instance of purely political impeachment." (Taswell-Langmead, English Const. Hist., p. 549, note.) Cases of that class shed but a dim light upon the definition of the term "high crimes and misdemeanors" as applied to those offenses for which English judges have been punished for misbehavior in office. No clear or authoritative definitions of the term in question can be found, as applied to that subject, outside of what are known as judicial impeachments as contradistinguished from political. As the purely judicial impeachment cases which have occurred in England are very few in number, their results may be stated within narrow limits.

The earliest of the accusations which have been made against English judges have been for the crime of bribery, the crime for which Lord Bacon was impeached by the Commons in 1621. The charges against Bacon particularly set forth instances of judicial corruption by the acceptance of bribes, and in his "confession and submission" he said: "I do plainly and ingeniously confess that I am guilty of corruption, and do renounce all defense." (State Trials, Vol. II, 1106.) Such cases, though rare, had occurred before Bacon's time. In the words of Sir J. F. Stephen, Coke "gives two instances in which judges were punished for taking bribes, namely, Sir William Thorpe, in 1351, who took sums amounting in all to £90 for not awarding an exigent against five persons at Lincoln assizes, and certain commissioners (probably special commissioners) of oyer and terminer, who were fined 1,000 marks each for taking a bribe of £4. I have elsewhere referred to the impeachment of the Chancellor Michael de la Pole, by Cavendish, the fishmonger, for taking a bribe of £40, 3 yards of scarlet cloth, and a quantity of fish, in the time of Richard II. * * *

"Lord Macclesfield was also impeached and removed from his office for bribery in 1725." (Hist. of the Crim. Law of Eng., Vol. III, pp. 251–52, citing as to the case of Lord Macclesfield Sixteen State Trials, p. 767.) That case was the last judicial impeachment in England. It is not, therefore, strange that bribery, as a distinct and substance offense, should have been named, side by side with treason, as an impeachable crime, in the Constitution of the United States. After the bribery cases of Lord Chancellor Bacon and Lord Chancellor Macclesfield have been subtracted from the foregoing list, but two judicial impeachments remain in the entire history of the English people. Only in those two cases have the Commons impeached and the Lords tried English judges upon charges of judicial misconduct other than bribery.

IX. IMPEACHMENT OF SIR ROBERT BERKLEY AND OTHER JUDGES.

In 1635 Charles I announced his attention to extend the exaction of ship money to the inland counties. When the writs of that year were resisted, the judges gave answers in favor of the prerogative. When in 1636 another set of ship writs were issued, Hampden made a test case by refusing to pay the assessment on his lands at Great Missenden, and the issue thus raised was argued in November and December, 1637, before a full bench. The contention made in favor of the Crown was sustained by seven of the judges—Finch, chief justice of the common pleas; Bramston, chief justice of the king's bench; Berkley, one of the justices of that court; Crawley, one of the judges of the common pleas; Davenport, lord chief baron of the exchequer; Weston and Trevor, barons of that court. When the day of reckoning came, Finch fled to Holland, and the remaining six were impeached by the Commons for their judgments rendered in favor of the royal contention, the charges being delivered to the Lords July 6, 1641. As Berkley's opinion in favor of the legality of ship money was the most emphatic, he was made the special object of attack in articles which charged him not only with the ship-money opinion, but with other acts of judicial misconduct on the bench. The nature of the accusations against him can be best explained by extracts from the articles themselves, which open with the general statement "that the said Sir Robert Berkley, then being one of the justices of the said court of king's bench, hath traitorously and wickedly endeavored to subvert the fundamental laws and established government of the realm of England, and instead thereof to introduce an arbitrary and tyrannical government against law, which he hath declared, by traitorous and wicked words, opinions, judgments, practices, and actions appearing in the several articles ensuing."

The following are a fair sample of the special charges: "4. That he, the said Robert Berkley, then being one of the justices of the king's bench, and having taken an oath for the due administration of justice, according to the laws and statutes of the realm, to His Majesty's liege people, on or about the last of December subscribed an opinion, in hæc verba: 'I am of opinion, that where the benefit doth more particularly redound to the good of the ports,' etc. * * * 6. That he, the said Sir Robert Berkley, then being one of the justices of the court of king's bench, and duly sworn as aforesaid, did on——— deliver his opinion in the exchequer chamber against John Hampden, esq., in the case of ship money. * * * 7. That he, the said Sir Robert Berkley, then being one of the justices of the court of king's bench, and one of the justices of the assize for the county of York, did, at the assizes held at York in Lent, 1636, deliver his charge to the grand jury, 'that it was a lawful and inseparable flower of the Crown for the King to command, not only the maritime counties, but also those that were inland, to find ships for the defense of the kingdom.' * * * 8. The said Sir R. Berkley then being one of the justices of the court of king's bench, in Trinity term last, then sitting on the bench in said court, upon debate of the said case between the said chambers and Sir E. Bromfield, said openly in the court, 'that there was a rule of law, and a rule of government;' and that 'many things which might not be done by the rule of law might be done by the rule of government;' and would not suffer the point of legality of ship money to be argued by chambers' counsel. * * * 9. The said Sir R. Berkley, then and there sitting on the bench, did revile and threaten the grand jury returned to serve at the said session, for presenting the removal of the communion table in All Saints Church in Hertford aforesaid. * * * 11. He, the said Sir R. Berkley, being one of the justices of the said court of king's bench, and sitting in said court, deferred to grant a prohibition to the said Court-Christian in said cause, although the counsel did move in the said court many several times and several times for a prohibition." (State Trials, vol. 3, pp. 1283–1291.) The impeachment against Berkley ended in his paying a fine of £10,000.

X. IMPEACHMENT OF SIR WILLIAM SCROGGS, CHIEF JUSTICE OF THE KING'S BENCH.

In the reign of Charles II, Sir William Scroggs, chief justice of the king's bench, was impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors, the nature of which may be best explained by the following extracts from the articles themselves. The general accusation is "that the said William Scroggs, then being chief justice of the court of king's bench, hath traitorously and wickedly endeavored to subvert the fundamental laws, and the established religion and government of this Kingdom of England; and instead thereof to introduce popery and arbitrary and tyranical government against law; which he has declared by divers traitorous and wicked words, opinions, judgments, practices, and actions." Chief among the special charges are the following: II. "That he, the said Sir William Scroggs, in Trinity term last, being then chief justice of the said court, and having taken an oath duly to administer justice according to the laws and statutes of this realm, in pursuance of his said traitorous purposes, did, together with the rest of the justices of the said court, several days before the end of said term, in an arbitrary manner, discharge the grand jury which then served for the hundred of Oswaldston, in the county of Middlesex, before they had made their presentments, etc. * * * III. That, whereas one Henry Carr had, for some time before, published every week a certain book, entitled 'The Weekly Pacquet of Advice from Rome, or The History of Popery,' wherein the superstitions and cheats of the Church of Rome were from time to time exposed, he, the said Sir William Scroggs, then chief justice of the court of king's bench, together with the other judges of the said court, before any legal conviction of the said Carr, of any crime did in the said Trinity term, in a most illegal and arbitrary manner, make and cause to be entered a certain rule of that court against the printing of said book, in hæc verba. * * * IV. That the said Sir William Scroggs, since he was made chief justice of the king's bench, hath, together with the other judges of the said court, most notoriously departed from all rules of justice and equality in the imposition of fines upon persons convicted of misdemeanors in said court." The result was that the chief justice was removed from office and given a pension for life. (State Trials, Vol. VIII, pp. 195, 216.)

XI. PROCEEDING AGAINST LORD CHIEF JUSTICE KEELING.

Intervening between the case of Berkley and other judges (1640) and that of Sir William Scroggs (1680) are proceedings by the Commons against Lord Chief Justice Keeling, which occurred in 1667, notable for the reason that they clearly illustrate what kind of judicial acts were considered as impeachable high crimes and misdemeanors at that time. "A copy of Judge Keeling's case, taken out of the Parliament Journal, December 11, 1667: 'The House resumed the hearing of the rest of the report touching the matter of restraint upon juries; and that upon the examination of divers witnesses, in several causes of restraints put upon juries, by the Lord Chief Justice Keeling; whereupon the committee made their resolutions, which are as follows: 1. That the proceedings of the Lord Chief Justice, in the cases now reported, are innovations in the trial of men for their lives and liberties; and that he hath used an arbitrary and illegal power, which is of dangerous consequence to the lives and liberties of the people of England, and tends to the introducing of an arbitrary government. 2. That in the place of judicature, the Lord Chief Justice hath undervalued, vilified, and condemned Magna Charta, the great preserver of our lives, freedom, and property. 3. That he be brought to trial, in order to condign punishment in such manner as the House shall judge most fit and requisite.'" (State Trials, vol. 6, p. 991, seq.)

"On the 16th of October, 1667, the House being informed 'that there have been some innovations of late in trials of men for their lives and deaths, and in some particular cases restraints have been put upon juries in the inquiries,' this matter is referred to a committee. On the 18th of November this committee are empowered to receive information against the Lord Chief Justice Keeling for any other misdemeanors besides those concerning juries. And on the 11th of December, 1667, the committee report several resolutions against the Lord Chief Justice Keeling of illegal and arbitrary proceedings in his office. The chief justice desiring to be heard, he is admitted on the 13th of December and heard in his defense to the matters charged against him, and being withdrawn, the House resolve 'that they will proceed no further in the matter against him.'" (4 Hatsel Prec., pp. 123–4, cited in Chase's Trial, Vol. II, p. 461.)

XII. REMOVAL BY ADDRESS PROVIDED BY THE ACT OF SETTLEMENT.

By the foregoing analysis of the only English precedents to which we can look for expositions of the meaning of the phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors," as applied to the conduct of English judges, the fact is put beyond all question that the only judicial acts which the House of Commons ever regarded as falling within that category are such acts as a judge performs while sitting upon the bench, administering the laws of the realm, either between private persons or between the Crown and the subject. In the case of Mr. Justice Berkley the gravamen of the charge was that he rendered a judgment in the matter of ship money in conflict with what his triers considered the law of the realm to be. In the case of Chief Justice Scroggs the gravamen of the charge was that he arbitrarily discharged grand juries; that in a libel case he rendered an illegal judgment, and that he imposed unjust fines upon those convicted of misdemeanors. In the proceedings against Chief Justice Keeling the gravamen of the charge was that he had put "restraint" upon juries by fining them for their verdicts. "Wagstaff and others of a jury were fined an hundred marks a piece by Lord Chief Justice Keeling." (4 Hatsell Prec., p. 124, note.) Excepting bribery there is no case in the parliamentary law of England which gives color to the idea that the personal misconduct of a judge, in matters outside of his administration of the law in a court of justice, was ever considered or charged to constitute a high crime and misdemeanor. When the question is asked, By what means is the personal misconduct of an English judge, not amounting to a high crime and misdemeanor, punished? the answer is easy.

Prior to the passage in 1701 of the famous Act of Settlement (12 and 13 Will. III, C. 2) neither the tenure nor the compensation of English judges rested upon a firm or definite foundation. Hallam (Const. Hist., Vol. III, p. 194) tells us that "it had been the practice of the Stuarts, especially in the last years of their dynasty, to dismiss judges, without seeking any other pretense, who showed any disposition to thwart government in political prosecutions." As the hasty and imperfect Bill of Rights had failed to provide a remedy for that condition of things, it became necessary for the authors of the Act of Settlement, "the complement of the Revolution itself and the Bill of Rights," to provide that English judges should hold office during good behavior (quandiu se bene gesserint), and that they should receive ascertained and established salaries. But, while the judges were being thus entrenched in their offices, the fact was not forgotten that the remedy by impeachment extended only to high crimes and misdemeanors which did not embrace personal misconduct. Therefore a method of removal was provided by address, which was intended to embrace all misconduct not included in the term "high crimes and misdemeanors."

In the light of that statement it will be easier to understand the full purport of that section of the Act of Settlement which provides "that after the said limitations shall take effect as aforesaid, judges' commissions be made quandiu se bene gesserint, and their salaries ascertained and established; but upon the address of both Houses of Parliament it may be lawful to remove them." Thus, for seventy-five years prior to the severance of the political tie which bound the English colonies in America to the parent State, the twofold method for the removal of English judges was clearly defined and perfectly understood on both sides of the Atlantic. The twofold method embraced (1) the removal by impeachment for all acts constituting "high crimes and misdemeanors," a term then clearly defined in English parliamentary law; (2) the removal by address for all lesser acts of personal misconduct not embraced within that term. That such was the general and accepted view on this side of the Atlantic in 1776 of the English parliamentary law on impeachment and address will be put beyond all question by the following references to the several State constitutions in which that law reappeared.

XIII. IMPEACHMENT AND ADDRESS AS DEFINED IN THE CONSTITUTIONS OF THE SEVERAL STATES.

On May 10, 1776, the Continental Congress recommended to the several conventions and assemblies of the colonies the establishment of independent governments "for the maintenance of internal peace and the defense of their lives, liberties, and properties." (Charters and Constitutions, vol. 1, p. 3.) Before the end of the year in which that recommendation was made the greater part of the colonies had adopted written constitutions, in which were restated, in a dogmatic form, all of the vital principles of the English constitutional system. Illustrations of the adoption of the English plan for the removal of judges by impeachment and address may be drawn from the following State constitutions: The constitution of Pennsylvania of 1776, Article V, section 2, provides that "the judges of the supreme court and of the several courts of common pleas shall hold their offices during good behavior. But for any reasonable cause, which shall not be sufficient ground for impeachment, the governor may remove any of them, on the address of two-thirds of each branch of the legislature."

The constitution of Delaware of 1792, Article VI, section 2, provides that "the chancellor and the judges of the supreme court of common pleas shall hold their offices during good behavior; but for any reasonable cause, which shall not be sufficient ground for impeachment, the governor may in his discretion, remove any of them on the address of two-thirds of all the members of each branch of the legislature." The constitution of South Carolina of 1868, Article VII, section 4, provides that "for any willful neglect of duty or other reasonable cause, which shall not be sufficient ground of impeachment, the governor shall remove any executive or judicial officer on the address of two-thirds of each house of the general assembly." Here are explicit and dogmatic statements of the settled rule of English parliamentary law that judges may be removed by impeachment for grave offenses of judicial misconduct, and by address for lesser offenses of personal misconduct. As this distinction was so well known, many of the State constitutions simply presuppose it without stating it in express terms. The constitution of Massachusetts of 1780, Chapter III, article 1, after providing for removal by impeachment, declares that "all judicial officers duly appointed, commissioned, and sworn shall hold their offices during good behavior, excepting such concerning whom there is different provision made in this constitution: Provided, nevertheless, the governor, with consent of the council, may remove them upon the address of both houses of the legislature."

The constitution of Georgia of 1798, Article III, section 1, provides that "the judges of the superior court shall be elected for the term of three years, removable by the governor on the address of two-thirds of both houses for that purpose, or by impeachment and conviction thereon." The constitution of New Hampshire of 1784, Article I, part 2, provides that "all judicial officers, duly appointed, commissioned, and sworn, shall hold their offices during good behavior, excepting those concerning whom there is a different provision made in this constitution: Provided, nevertheless, the president, with the consent of council, may remove them upon the address of both houses of the legislature." The constitution of Connecticut of 1818, Article V, section 3, provides that "the judges of the supreme court and of the superior court shall hold their offices during good behavior; but may be removed by impeachment, and the governor shall also remove them on the address of two-thirds of the members of each house of the general assembly." It is said that the constitution of New York of 1777 was the model from which the impeachment clauses of the Constitution of the United States were copied. (6 Am. Law Reg., N. S., 277.)

The New York constitution of that date expressly limited impeachment to persons in office, and omitted removal by address. Such an omission was, however, exceptional. The rule was to introduce into the State constitutions both processes of removal by impeachment and address. And if it were not for fear of wearying the court by reiteration, the list of instances could be greatly lengthened in which both methods were introduced into later State constitutions not here mentioned, together with the recognized distinction between impeachable offenses and the lesser acts of misconduct justifying only removal by address, expressed in the words "not sufficient ground of impeachment." (See Appendix.)

2014. Argument that Congress might not by law make nonresidence a high misdemeanor in a judge.

Discussion of the intent of a judge as a primary condition needed to justify impeachment.

On February 22, 1905,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Messrs. Anthony Higgins and John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, offered a brief in support of their plea of jurisdiction as to the first seven articles. This brief, which was signed by them as counsel, but which, as they said, had been prepared by another, covered many questions relating to impeachments, the following being among them:

First. That the definition of the term "high crimes and misdemeanors," as employed in Article II, section 4, of the Constitution, must be drawn from the parliamentary law of England as it existed in 1787, construed in the light of the contemporaneous expositions of that law embodied in the provisions of the constitutions of the several States as to impeachment and address.

Second. That the definition of that term, as thus fixed at the time of the adoption of the Federal Constitution, is organic and unchangeable by subsequent Congressional legislation; that no act not an impeachable offense when the Constitution was adopted can be made so by a subsequent act of Congress.

Third. That the "high crimes and misdemeanors" for which English judges were impeachable in 1787 can only be clearly ascertained from an examination of what are known as the English judicial impeachment cases, as contradistinguished from the political.

Fourth. That English judges have never been impeached except for bribery, or for judicial misconduct occurring in the actual administration of justice in court, either between private individuals or between the Crown and the subject.

Fifth. That since the act of settlement (1701), when the tenure and compensation of English judges was first fixed on a definite basis, such judges have been removable for judicial misconduct not amounting to an impeachable high crime and misdemeanor, by address.

Sixth. That the plain distinction between the acts for which a judge may be impeached and the acts for which he may be removed by address was clearly recognized and defined in the constitutions of many of the States.

Seventh. That after careful consideration and debate the Federal Convention of 1787, with only one dissenting vote, rejected the proposition to embody the removal of Federal judges by address in the Constitution of the United States "as weakening too much the independence of the judges." After rejecting the more ample provisions upon the subject of impeachment embodied in some of the State constitutions, it was resolved that Federal judges should only be removed by impeachment for and conviction of "high crimes and misdemeanors" in the limited sense in which that phrase was defined in the parliamentary law of England as it existed in 1787.

Eighth. That in no one of the four judicial impeachments which have taken place since the adoption of our Federal Constitution has the House of Representatives ever attempted to impeach a Federal judge for "high crimes and misdemeanors," except in those cases in which he would have been impeachable under the English parliamentary precedents. That is to say, the proceedings against Justice Berkley and other judges (1640), the proceedings against Chief Justice Keeling (1667), the proceedings against Chief Justice Scroggs (1680), the proceedings against Judge Pickering (1803), the proceedings against Judge Chase (1804), the proceedings against Judge Peck (1830), the proceedings against Judge Humphreys (1862), so far as they relate to judicial misconduct, rest upon a single proposition, which is this: In English and American parliamentary and constitutional law the judicial misconduct which rises to the dignity of a high crime and misdemeanor must consist of judicial acts, performed with an evil or wicked intent, by a judge while administering justice in a court, either between private persons or between a private person and the government of the State. All personal misconduct of a judge occurring during his tenure of office and not coming within that category must be classed among the offenses for which a judge may be removed by address, a method of removal which the framers of our Federal Constitution refused to embody therein.

[1] Third session Fifty-eighth Congress, Record, pp. 3033–3034.

When the allegations contained in articles 1, 2, and 3, presented against this respondent, are examined, it appears that they set forth in three forms an identical charge, which is in substance that the respondent, in settling his accounts with certain United States marshals under a certain act of Congress providing for the reasonable expenses for travel and attendance of a district judge, when lawfully directed to hold court outside of his district, exacted and received in payment for such expenses from the said marshals sums in excess of the amounts contemplated in said act. It is charged that such acts constitute "a high crime, to wit, the crime of obtaining money from the United States by a false pretense, and of a high misdemeanor in office." The short answer to such a charge is that no such offense was ever thought of or defined in the parliamentary law of England as a high crime and misdemeanor in 1787, or at any other time; that it bears no relation whatever to the acts known in English parliamentary law as an impeachable offense. If it be true, as alleged, that the respondent was guilty in making such settlements of "obtaining money from the United States by a false pretense," then the remedy is by indictment by a grand jury and a trial by a petit jury, as in the case of any other citizen of the country. The Constitution expressly provides, Article I, section 3, that persons subject to impeachment "shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law." While it is quite possible to understand how such personal misconduct upon the part of a judge, entirely disconnected with the conduct of judicial business on the bench, might subject him to removal by address in a State which had adopted that plan of removal for nonimpeachable offenses, it is hard to conceive how any effort of the imagination could reach the conclusion that such an act constitutes an impeachable high crime and misdemeanor as defined in English parliamentary law.

The same comments are applicable to the charges made in articles 4 and 5 as to the use by the respondent of a certain car belonging to a certain railroad, "the said railroad company being at the time in the possession of a receiver appointed by said Charles Swayne, judge as aforesaid, on the petition of creditors." Even if it could be established that the circumstances attending such a transaction would warrant removal by address, no advance would be made toward the conclusion that such acts constitute an impeachable high crime and misdemeanor as defined in English parliamentary law, because the further allegation that "the said Charles Swayne, acting as judge, allowed the credit claimed by the said receiver for and on account of the said expenditure as part of the necessary expenses of operating said road" falls far short of the English and American rule as to the evil or wicked intent which must accompany a judgment or opinion delivered on the bench in order to render it impeachable. Nothing is better settled than the fact that a judge is not impeachable even for a judgment, order, or opinion rendered contrary to law unless it is alleged and proved that it was rendered with an evil, wicked, or malicious intent. Justice Berkley was impeached not simply because he decided in favor of ship money, but because he "traitorously and wickedly endeavored to subvert the fundamental laws" of the realm thereby. Chief Justice Scroggs was impeached not simply for imposing "fines upon persons convicted of misdemeanors in said court," but because he imposed them "for the further accomplishing of his said traitorous and wicked purposes."

Justice Chase was impeached because he, "with intent to oppress and procure the conviction of the said Callender, did overrule the objection of John Bassett, one of the jury;" "that, with intent to oppress and procure the conviction of the prisoner, the evidence of John Taylor, a material witness on behalf of the aforesaid Callender, was not permitted by the said Samuel Chase to be given in." Judge Peck was impeached not because he punished Lawless for contempt, but because he did so "with intention wrongfully and unjustly to oppress, imprison, and otherwise injure the said Luke Edward Lawless under color of law, * * * under the color and pretense aforesaid and with the intent aforesaid, in the said court then and there did unjustly, oppressively, and arbitrarily order and adjudge," etc. If further illustrations of the necessity for averments as to the wicked and malicious intent with which a judicial act must be performed need be given, they may be drawn from articles 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12, presented against this respondent, in which impeachable offenses are properly charged under the rule which the Constitution prescribes—that is to say, the rule of English parliamentary law. It is charged in one article that the said Charles Swayne "did maliciously and unlawfully adjudge guilty of contempt of court and impose a fine of $100 upon and commit to prison for a period of ten days E. T. Davis, an attorney at law, for an alleged contempt of the circuit court of the United States;" and in another that he "did maliciously and unlawfully adjudge guilty of a contempt of court and impose a fine of $100 upon and commit to prison for a period of ten days Simeon Belden, an attorney and counselor at law, for an alleged contempt of the circuit court of the United States."

With the plain and settled rule thus recognized clearly in view, the draftsmen of articles 4 and 5 have not only failed to charge that the respondent "allowed the credit claimed by said receiver for and on account of the said expenditure," etc., "maliciously and unlawfully," but, what is more to the point, they have failed to charge that he did so "knowingly." There is no reason to suppose, in the absence of such an allegation, that a judge, approving the mass of accounts presented to the court by a receiver of a railroad, would have personal knowledge of every trivial item which such accounts contain. The presumption is clearly to the contrary. In articles 4 and 5 there is no charge either that the respondent ever "knowingly" passed upon the items of expense in question or that he approved them "maliciously and unlawfully." In the absence of such allegations articles 4 and 5 fall to the ground.

The charge of nonresidence contained in article 6 presupposes the validity of section 551, Revised Statutes of the United States, which provides that "a district judge shall be appointed for each district, except in cases hereinafter provided. Every judge shall reside in the district for which he is appointed, and for offending against this provision shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor." If the foregoing argument proves anything, it is the fact that when the phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors" was embodied in the Federal Constitution in 1787 it drew along with it, as an integral part of it, the definitions which fixed its meaning in English parliamentary law at that time. The phrase, coupled with the definitions of it, thus became organic and unchangeable by subsequent Congressional legislation, just as the definition of the original and appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court became organic and unchangeable. The convention pointedly refused to make impeachable offenses an uncertain or changeable quantity. "The first proposition was to use the words 'to be removable on impeachment and conviction for malpractice and neglect of duty.' It was agreed that these expressions were too general. They were therefore stricken out. * * * Colonel Mason said: 'Treason, as defined in the Constitution, will not reach many great and dangerous offenses. Hastings is not guilty of treason. Attempts to subvert the Constitution may not be treason as above defined.' He moved to insert after 'bribery' the words 'or maladministration.' Madison: 'So vague a term will be equivalent to a tenure during the pleasure of the Senate.' Mason withdrew 'maladministration' and substituted 'other high crimes and misdemeanors against the State.'" (American Law Review, vol. 16, p. 804.)

The fathers knew exactly the limitations of the phrase adopted, and they repelled the idea that it was ever to be enlarged or diminished. If nonresidence of a judge in his district could be added by Congress to the list of impeachable offenses, that list could be thus indefinitely extended; or, by the same authority, every impeachable offense as understood in 1787 could be abolished. If it is admitted that Congress can change the organic definition, either by addition or subtraction, it follows as clearly as a mathematical demonstration that the scheme of impeachment provided in the Constitution can be entirely remodeled by legislation. The validity of the section in question, making nonresidence a high misdemeanor, can not be supported by serious argument. Even if it could be, the fact can not be lost sight of that its plain provision is that "every such judge shall reside in the district for which he is appointed." It will not be disputed that Judge Swayne was so residing in the district for which he was appointed at the time that subsequent legislation excluded the place of his residence from such district. Certainly nothing more can be put forward by those who assert the validity of section 551 than the contention that it was respondent's duty to remove, within a reasonable time, from the district for which he was appointed into the new one for which he was not appointed. It follows, therefore, that the accusation now made amounts to nothing more than the charge that respondent did not act with sufficient alacrity; that he did not remove his residence into the new district with sufficient promptness. How could such laches possibly constitute an impeachable high crime and misdemeanor?

2015. Argument that an impeachable offense is any misbehavior that shows disqualification to hold and exercise the office, whether moral, intellectual or physical.

Answer to the argument that a judge may be impeached only for acts done in his official capacity.

Answer to the argument that Congress might not make nonresidence a high misdemeanor.

By permission, before the final arguments in the Swayne trial, the managers filed a brief on the respondent's plea to jurisdiction.

On February 23, 1905,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Manager Henry W. Palmer, of Pennsylvania, filed, by permission the following brief:

A BRIEF OF AUTHORITIES ON THE LAWS OF IMPEACHMENT.

The purpose of this brief is to show—

First. That the framers of the Constitution intended that the House of Representatives should have the right to impeach and the Senate the power to try a judicial officer for any misbehavior that showed disqualification to hold and exercise the office, whether moral, intellectual, or physical.

The provisions of the Constitution relating to the subject of impeachment are as follows:

"The House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker and other officers, and shall have the sole power of impeachment. (Art. I, sec. 2.)

"Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States; but the party convicted shall, nevertheless, be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment, according to law. (Art. II, sec. 1.)

"The President * * * shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment. (Art. II, sec. 2.)

"The President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors. (Art. II, sec. 4.)

"The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury." (Art. 3, sec. 2.)

The convention that framed the Constitution did not define words, but used them in the sense in which they were understood at that time.

The convention did not invent the remedy by impeachment, but adopted a well-known and frequently used method of getting rid of objectionable public officers, modifying it to suit the conditions of a new country.

In England all the King's subjects were liable to impeachment for any offense against the sovereign or the law. Floyd was impeached for speaking lightly of the Elector Palatine and sentenced to ride on horseback for two successive days through certain public streets with his face to the horse's tail, with the tail in his hands; to stand each day two hours in pillory; to be pelted by the mob, then to be branded with the letter "K" and be imprisoned for life in the Tower. The character and extent of the punishment was in the discretion of the House of Lords.

The Constitution modified the remedy by confining it to the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers, and the punishment to removal from office and disqualification to hold office in future.

That it was not intended as a punishment of crime clearly appears when we read that a party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law.

Said Mr. Bayard, in Blount's trial:

"Impeachment is a proceeding of a purely political nature. It is not so much designed to punish the offender as to secure the State. It touches neither his person nor his property, but simply divests him of his political capacity." (Wharton's State Trials, 263.)

Subject to these modifications and adopting the recognized rule, the Constitution should be construed so as to be equal to every occasion which might call for its exercise and adequate to accomplish the purposes of its framers. Impeachment remains here as it was recognized in England at and prior to the adoption of the Constitution.

These limitations were imposed in view of the abuses of the power of impeachment in English history.

These abuses were not guarded against in our Constitution by limiting, defining, or reducing impeachable crimes, since the same necessity existed here as in England for the remedy of impeachment, but by other safeguards thrown around it in that instrument. It will be observed that the sole power of impeachment is conferred on the House and the sole power of trial on the Senate by Article I, sections 2 and 3. These are the only jurisdictional clauses, and they do not limit impeachment to crimes and misdemeanors. Nor is it elsewhere so limited. Section 4 of Article II makes it imperative when the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers are convicted of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors that they shall be removed from office. There may be cases approprate for the exercise of the power of impeachment where no crime or misdemeanor has been committed.

[1] Third session Fifty-eighth Congress, Record, pp. 3179–3181.

Whatever crimes and misdemeanors were the subjects of impeachment in England prior to the adoption of our Constitution, and as understood by its framers, are, therefore, subjects of impeachment before the Senate of the United States, subject only to the limitations of the Constitution.

"The framers of our Constitution, looking to the impeachment trials in England, and to the writers on parliamentary and common law, and to the constitutions and usages of our own States, saw that no act of Parliament or of any State legislature ever undertook to define an impeachable crime. They saw that the whole system of crimes, as defined in acts of Parliament and as recognized at common law, was prescribed for and adapted to the ordinary courts." (2 Hale, Pl. Crown, ch. 20, p. 150; 6 Howell State Trials, 313, note.)

They saw that the high court of impeachment took jurisdiction of cases where no indictable crime had been committed, in many instances, and there was then, as there yet are, two parallel modes of reaching some, but not all offenders—one by impeachment, the other by indictment.

With these landmarks to guide them, our fathers adopted a Constitution under which official malfeasance and nonfeasance, and, in some cases, misfeasance, may be the subject of impeachment, although not made criminal by act of Congress, or so recognized by the common law of England, or of any State of the Union. They adopted impeachment as a means of removing men from office whose misconduct imperils the public safety and renders them unfit to occupy official position. All American text writers support this view.

[Story on the Constitution, p. 583.]

"Congress have unhesitatingly adopted the conclusion that no previous statute is necessary to authorize an impeachment for any official misconduct; and the rules of proceeding and the rules of evidence, as well as the principles of decision, have been uniformly regulated by the known doctrines of the common law and parliamentary usage. In the few cases of impeachment which have hitherto been tried no one of the charges has rested upon any statutable misdemeanors. It seems, then, to be the settled doctrine of the high court of impeachment that, though the common law can not be a foundation of a jurisdiction not given by the Constitution or laws, that jurisdiction, when given, attaches, and is to be exercised according to the rules of the common law, and that what are and what are not high crimes and misdemeanors is to be ascertained by a recurrence to that great basis of American jurisprudence. The reasoning by which the power of the House of Representatives to punish for contempts (which are breaches of privileges and offenses not defined by any positive laws) has been upheld by the Supreme Court stands upon similar grounds; for if the House had no jurisdiction to punish for contempts until the acts had been previously defined and ascertained by positive law it is clear that the process of arrest would be illegal.

"In examining the parliamentary history of impeachments it will be found that many offenses not easily definable by law, and many of a purely political character, have been deemed high crimes and misdemeanors worthy of this extraordinary remedy. Thus lord chancellors, and judges, and other magistrates have not only been impeached for bribery and acting grossly contrary to the duties of their offices, but for misleading their sovereign by unconstitutional opinions, and for attempts to subvert the fundamental laws and introduce arbitrary power. So where a lord chancellor has been thought to have put the great seal to an ignominious treaty, a lord admiral to have neglected the safeguard of the sea, an ambassador to have betrayed his trust, a privy councilor to have propounded or supported pernicious and dishonorable measures, or a confidential adviser of his sovereign to have obtained exorbitant grants or incompatible employments—these have been all deemed impeachable offenses. Some of these offenses, indeed, for which persons were impeached in the early ages of British jurisprudence would now seem harsh and severe; but perhaps they were rendered necessary by existing corruptions, and the importance of suppressing a spirit of favoritism and court intrigue.

"Thus persons have been impeached for giving bad counsel to the King, advising a prejudicia peace, enticing the King to act against the advice of Parliament, purchasing offices, giving medicine to the King without advice of physicians, preventing other persons from giving counsel to the King except in their presence, and procuring exorbitant personal grants from the King. But others, again, were founded in the most salutary public justice, such as impeachments for malversations and neglects in office, for encouraging pirates, for official oppression, extortions, and deceits, and especially for putting good magistrates out of office and advancing bad. One can not but be struck, in this slight enumeration, with the utter unfitness of the common tribunals of justice to take cognizance of such offenses, and with the entire propriety of confiding the jurisdiction over them to a tribunal capable of understanding and reforming and scrutinizing the policy of the state, and of sufficient dignity to maintain the independence and reputation of worthy public officers.

"The otner point is one of more difficulty. In the argument upon Blount's impeachment it was pressed with great earnestness, while there is not a syllable in the Constitution which confines impeachments to official acts, and it is against the plainest dictates of common sense that such restraint should be imposed upon it. Suppose a judge should countenance or aid insurgents in a meditated conspiracy or insurrection against the Government. This is not a judicial act, and yet it ought certainly to be impeachable. He may be called upon to try the very persons whom he has aided. Suppose a judge or other officer to receive a bribe not connected with his judicial office, could he be entitled to any public confidence? Would not these reasons for his removal be just as strong as if it were a case of an official bribe? The argument on the other side was that the power of impeachment was strictly confined to civil officers of the United States, and this necessarily implied that it must be limited to malconduct in office."

[American and English Encyclopedia of Law, Vol. XV, p. 1066.]

"In the United States.—The Constitution of the United States provides that the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors. If impeachment in England be regarded merely as a mode of trial for the punishment of common-law or statutory crimes, and if the Constitution has adopted it only as a mode of procedure, leaving the crimes to which it is to be applied to be settled by the general rules of criminal law, then, as it is well settled that in regard to the National Government there are no common-law crimes, it would seem necessarily to follow that impeachment can be instituted only for crimes specifically named in the Constitution or for offenses declared to be crimes by Federal statute This view has been maintained by very eminent authority. But the cases of impeachment that have been brought under the Constitution would seem to give to the remedy a much wider scope than the above rule would indicate.

"In each of the only two cases of impeachment tried by the Senate in which a conviction resulted the defendant was found guilty of offenses not indictable either at common law or under any Federal statute, and in almost every case brought offenses were charged in the articles of impeachment which were not indictable under any Federal statute, and in several cases they were such as constituted neither a statutory nor a common-law crime. The impeachability of the offenses charged in the articles was, in most of the cases, not denied. In one case, however, counsel for the defendant insisted that impeachment would not lie for any but an indictable offense, but after exhaustive argument on both sides this defense was practically abandoned. The cases, then, seem to establish that impeachment is not a mere mode of procedure for the punishment of indictable crimes, that the phrase 'high crimes and misdemeanors' is to be taken, not in its common-law but in its broader parliamentary sense, and is to be interpreted in the light of parliamentary usage; that in this sense it includes not only crimes for which an indictment may be brought, but grave political offenses, corruptions, maladministration, or neglect of duty involving moral turpitude, arbitrary and oppressive conduct, and even gross improprieties, by judges and high officers of state, although such offenses be not of a character to render the offender liable to an indictment either at common law or under any statute. Additional weight is added to this interpretation of the Constitution by the opinions of eminent writers on constitutional and parliamentary law and by the fact that some of the most distinguished members of the convention that framed it have thus interpreted it."

[Rawle on the Constitution, p. 210.]

"Impeachments are thus introduced as a known definite term, and we must have recourse to the common law of England for the definition of them."

In England the practice of impeachments by the House of Commons before the House of Lords has existed from very ancient times. Its foundation is that a subject intrusted with the administration of public affairs may sometimes infringe the rights of the people and be guilty of such crimes as the ordinary magistrates either dare not or can not punish. Of these, the representatives of the people, or House of Commons, can not judge, because they and their constitutents are the persons injured, and can therefore only accuse. But the ordinary tribunals would naturally be swayed by the authority of so powerful an accuser. That branch of the legislature which represents the people, therefore, brings the charge before the other branch, which consists of the nobility, who are said not to have the same interests or the same passions as the popular assembly.

"The delegation of important trusts, affecting the higher interests of society, is always from various causes liable to abuse. The fondness frequently felt for the inordinate extension of power, the influence of party and of prejudice, the seductions of foreign states, or the basest appetite for illegitimate emoluments are sometimes productive of what are not inaptly termed political offenses, which it would be difficult to take cognizance of in the ordinary course of judicial proceedings."

[Cushing's Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies, p 980, par. 2539.]

"The purpose of impeachment, in modern times, is the prosecution and punishment of high crimes and misdemeanors, chiefly of an official or political character, which are either beyond the reach of the law, or which no other authority in the State but the supreme legislative power is competent to prosecute, and, by the law of Parliament, all persons, whether peers or commoners, may be impeached for any crimes or offenses whatever."

[Trial of Judge Peck, p 427 Mr. Buchanan's argument]

'What is an impeachable offense? This is a preliminary question which demands attention. It must be decided before the court can rightly understand what it is they have to try. The Constitution of theUnited States declares the tenure of the judicial office to be "during good behavior." Official misbehavior, therefore, in a judge is a forfeiture of his office. But when we say this we have advanced only a small distance. Another question meets us. What is misbehavior in office? In answer to this question and without pretending to furnish a definition, I freely admit we are bound to prove that the respondent has violated the Constitution or some known law of the land. This, I think, was the principle fairly to be deduced from all the arguments on the trial of Judge Chase, and from the votes of the Senate in the articles of impeachment against him, in opposition to the principle for which his counsel in the first instance strenuously contended, that in order to render an offense impeachable it must be indictable. But this violation of law may consist in the abuse as well as in the usurpation of authority.

"The abuse of a power which has been given may be as criminal as the usurpation of a power which has not been granted. Can there be any doubt of this? Suppose a man to be indicted for an assault and battery. He is tried and found guilty, and the judge, without any circumstances of peculiar aggravation having been shown, fines him a thousand dollars and commits him to prison for one year. Now, although the judge may possess the power to fine and imprison for this offense, at his discretion, would not this punishment be such an abuse of judicial discretion and afford such evidence of the tyrannical and arbitrary exercises of power as would justify the House of Representatives in voting an impeachment? But why need I fancy cases? Can fancy imagine a stronger case than is now, in point of fact, before us? A member of the bar is brought before a court of the United States guilty, if you please, of having published a libel on the judge—a libel, however, perfectly decorous in its terms and imputing no criminal intention, and so difficult of construction that though the counsel of the respondent have labored for hours to prove it to be a libel still that question remains doubtful. If in this case the judge has degraded the author by imprisonment and deprived him of the means of earning bread for himself and his family by suspending him from the practice of his profession for eighteen months, would not this be a cruel and oppressive abuse of authority, even admitting the power to punish in such a case to be possessed by the judge?

"A gross abuse of granted power and an usurpation of power not granted are offenses equally worthy of and liable to impeachment. If, therefore, the gentleman could establish, on the firmest foundation, that the power to punish libels as contempts may be legally exercised by all the courts of the United States, still he would not have proceeded far toward the acquittal of his client.

"It has been contended that even supposing the judge to have transcended his power and violated the law, yet he can not be convicted unless the Senate should believe he did the act with a criminal intention. It has been said that crime consists in two things, a fact and an intention; and in support of this proposition the legal maxim has been quoted that 'actus non fit reum, nisi mens rea.' This may be true as a general proposition, and yet it may have but a slight bearing upon the present case.

"I admit that if the charge against a judge be merely an illegal decision on a question of property in a civil cause, his error ought to be gross and palpable, indeed, to justify the interference of a criminal intention and to convict him upon an impeachment. And yet one case of this character has occurred in our history. Judge Pickering was tried and condemned upon all the four articles exhibited against him, although the three first contained no other charge than that of making decisions contrary to law in a cause involving a mere question of property, and then refusing to grant the party injured an appeal from his decision, to which he was entitled.

"And yet am I to be told that if a judge shall do an act which is in itself criminal; if he shall, in an arbitrary and oppressive manner and without the authority of law, imprison a citizen of this country and thus consign him to infamy, you are not to infer his intention from the act?"

[Judge Spencer's argument, p. 290.]

"It is necessary to a right understanding of the impeachment to ascertain and define what offenses constitute judicial misdemeanors. A judicial misdemeanor consists, in my opinion, in doing an illegal act colore officii with bad motives, or in doing an act within the competency of the court or judge in some cases, but unwarranted in a particular case from the facts existing in that case, with bad motives. To illustrate the last proposition: The eighth article of the amendments of the Constitution forbids the requirement of excessive bail, the imposition of excessive fines, or the infliction of cruel or unusual punishment. If a judge should disregard these provisions, and from bad motives violate them, his offense would consist, not in the want of power, but in the manner of his executing an authority intrusted to him and for exceeding a just and lawful discretion."

[Mr. Wickliffe's argument, p. 308.]

"By the third article of the Constitution of the United States it is declared that the judges of the supreme and inferior courts shall hold their office during good behavior.

"I maintain the proposition that any official act committed or omitted by the judge, which is a violation of the condition upon which he holds his office, is an impeachable offense under the Constitution.

"The word misdemeanor, used in its parliamentary sense as applied to offenses, means maladministration, misconduct not necessarily indictable, not only in England, but in the United States.

"'In the Senate, July 8, 1797, it was resolved that William Blount, esq., one of the Senators of the United States, having been guilty of a high misdemeanor, entirely inconsistent with his public trust and duty as a Senator, be, and he hereby is, expelled from the Senate of the United States.' (Wharton's State Trials, 202.)

"He was not guilty of an indictable crime. (Story on the Constitution, sec. 799, note.)

"The offense charged, Judge Story remarks, was not defined by any statute of the United States. It was an attempt to seduce a United States Indian interpreter from his duty, and to alienate the affections and conduct of the Indians from the public officers residing among them."

Blackstone says: "The fourth species of offense more immediately against the King and Government are entitled 'misprisions and contempts.' Misprisions are, in the acceptance of our law, generally understood to be all such high offenses as are under the degree of capital, but nearly bordering thereon. * * * Misprisions which are merely positive are generally denominated contempts or high misdemeanors, of which the first and principal is maladministration of such high offices as are in public trust and employment. This is usually punished by the method of parliamentary impeachment." (Vol. 4, p. 121. See Prescott's trial, Mass., 1821, pp. 79–80, 109, 117–120, 172–180, 191.)

On Chase's trial the defense conceded that to misbehave or to misdemean is precisely the same. (2 Chase's Trial, 145.)

The Constiution declares that judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their commissions during good behavior. This tenure of office was introduced into the English law to enable a removal to be made for misbehavior. (Chase's Trial, 357.)

At common law, an ordinary violation of a public statute, even by one not an officer, though the statute in terms provides no punishment, is an indictable misdemeanor. (Bishop, Constitutional Law, 3d ed., 187, 535.)

The term "misdemeanor" covers every act of misbehavior in a popular sense. Misdemeanor in office and misbehavior in office mean the same things. (7 Dane Abgt., 365.) Misbehavior, therefore, which is a mere negative of good behavior, is an express limitation of the office of a judge.

We may therefore conclude that the House has the right to impeach and the Senate the power to try a judicial officer for any misbehavior or misconduct which evidences his unfitness for the bench, without reference to its indictable quality. All history, all precedent, and all text writers agree upon this proposition. The direful consequences attendant upon any other theory are manifest.

For the first time in impeachment trials in this or any other country the claim is made that a judge can be impeached only for acts done in his official capacity.

If that position is well taken, a judge might be a common drunkard, an open frequenter of disreputable resorts; he might be a common thief, an embezzler of trust funds, a gambler, even a murderer. If he could manage to keep out of jail and attend to his judicial duties, the remedy by impeachment would not reach him. To state the proposition, is to argue it.

Removal of a judge for misbehavior or lack of good behavior is impossible unless it can be done through the impeaching power. Otherwise the people are powerless to rid themselves of the most unworthy, disgraceful, and unfit official.

But the exigencies of this case do not demand even a discussion of the proposition that a judge can be impeached only for acts done in his official capacity.

The claim is in the nature of a demurrer to the first seven articles. It admits the truth of the averments contained in them. It admits that the respondent, as judge of the district court he held at Waco, Tex., that as judge he knowingly made a false certificate; that as judge he receipted for and received money to which he was not entitled as reimbursement for expenses incurred as judge which he never did incur. All these acts were done in his official capacity. If he had not been a judge, he could not have held the court, incurred any expense, or receipted for or received any money. The stamp of his official character is on every act. His official position enabled him to do what he did do; without it he could not have violated the law.

In the case of the use of the property of the bankrupt corporation, which was in his hands for preservation, it was because he was judge that he had the opportunity to use the property. It was to bring him to hold court that the car was sent. An officer of his court sent it. He had the right and it was his duty to approve the account covering the expenses of the trip. If he had not been a judge, he could not have used the property of the railroad company. The article charges that Charles Swayne, judge, appropriated the property to his own use without making compensation under a claim of right, viz, that what he did was done in his official capacity.

The articles that charge him with violating the residence law assert that he did it while exercising his office of judge. The act is directed against judges; a private person can not violate it. The act commands a judge to reside in his district—that is, the official must live there; it is to be his official residence, so that he will be where he is wanted to perform his official duty. The violation of the law is the violation of an official duty, which the law imposes on him in his official character. All this the demurrer confesses, and yet the argument is made that for a violation of the act a judge is not impeachable, because it is not an official act.

But the proposition is seriously advanced that no act of Congress can create an impeachable offense or make a crime or misdemeanor the subject of impeachment for which impeachment would not lie in England before the adoption of the Constitution.

Impeachable offenses were not defined in the English law by act of Parliament or otherwise; any offense was impeachable that Parliament chose to so consider. Therefore when Congress makes that a crime or misdemeanor which was not so denominated at the time of the adoption of the Constitution it does not follow that the acts made crimes were not the subject of impeachment before the adoption of the Constitution.

For example, suppose no English law condemned the making of false certificates by a judge for the purpose of obtaining money from the Treasury. Can it be said that if an English judge had been guilty of such an offense that he would not have been subject to impeachment? If so, then neither can it be said that Congress created new impeachable offenses when the act was passed pertaining to false certificates.

The power to impeach for misbehavior of civil officials is vested in the House and the power to try in the Senate as fully as it was exercised by the English Parliament before 1787. That power covered every offense from high treason to slander against a ruler. Subject only to the limitation that the remedy by impeachment is confined to civil officers—for high crimes and misdemeanors—the power was conferred and may be exercised as fully now as then.

We have seen that according to the law of Parliament misdemeanor and misbehavior of public officers are synonymous terms. Another proposition advanced by counsel for respondent is that no judge was ever impeached in England for a misbehavior not committed in the discharge of his judicial functions. This is believed to be an error; judges were impeached for giving extrajudicial opinions. But suppose the fact to be as stated, the conclusion would not follow that because no English judge ever so misbehaved himself outside of his official duties as to make him a subject of impeachment that therefore he could not have been impeached if he had so misbehaved.

But however interesting discussion of such question may be it is quite unimportant in this case. All the charges against this respondent grow out of his official acts. Nothing that he did of which complaint is made could have been done by a private person, or by anyone who did not hold a judicial office. Because the respondent was a judge he had the right to make a certificate upon which to draw money from the Treasury, because he was a judge a private car was sent to bring him from Guyencourt to hold court at Jacksonville; because he was a judge the law imposed upon him the duty of living in a certain district; because he violated the law in all these cases in his official capacity he is charged.

The conclusion is therefore not to be resisted that even if the contention of the respondent's counsel is correct a judge can be impeached for nothing but official misconduct, these offenses are within the rule, and of them this court has jurisdiction.

2016. Argument of Mr. Manager Clayton that a judge may be impeached for misbehavior not necessarily connected with his judicial functions.—On February 24, 1905,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne. Mr. Manager Henry D. Clayton, of Alabama, said in final argument:

Mr. President, I desire to call attention to the fact that repeatedly in impeachment trials before the Senate it has been asserted that civil officers can not be impeached except for the commission of indictable offenses, but it was never before this time seriously contended that a judge can not be impeached except for wrongful conduct committed strictly in the performance of an act purely judicial.

Therefore in this case we are brought to a consideration of what is an impeachable offense. The Constitution denounces impeachable offenses under the terms of "treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors." "Other high crimes and misdemeanors" are general terms, and for their import and meaning reference may be had to English jurisprudence and parliamentary law, to the provisions of the constitutions of the several States relating to impeachments in existence prior to and at the time of the adoption of the Federal Constitution, and to the interpretation put upon the words in the debates in and by the action of the United States Senate in impeachment cases which have heretofore been tried.

In the present case the House of Representatives has charged this judge with crimes and misdemeanors, and also contends that he has forfeited his tenure of office because he has not conformed to the good behavior required by Article III, section 1, upon which his right to hold office is predicated. The judge is entitled to hold his office during good behavior, but not otherwise. The provision of the Constitution conversely stated would be that he shall not hold office after having been guilty of misbehavior. If I understand the contention of the counsel for the respondent here, they insist that high crimes and crimes and misdemeanors and the words "the judges both of the Supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behavior" are limited or restricted to such acts as may be committed by a judge in his purely judicial capacity. In other words, however serious the crime, the misdemeanor, or misbehavior of the judge may be, if it can be said to be extrajudicial he can not be impeached. To illustrate this contention, the judge may have committed murder or burglary and be confined under a sentence in a penitentiary for any period of time, however long, but because he has not committed the murder or burglary in his capacity as judge he can not be impeached. That contention, carried out logically, might lead to the very defeat of the performance of the function confided to the judicial branch of the Government.

[1] Third session Fifty-eighth Congress, Record, pp. 3249–3250.

In the History of the Constitution of the United States, by George Ticknor Curtis, in volume 2, page 260, is found this language:

"The purposes of an impeachment lie wholly beyond the penalties of the statute or the customary law. The object of the proceeding is to ascertain whether cause exists for removing a public officer from office. Such a cause may be found in the fact that, either in the discharge of his office or aside from its functions, he has violated a law or committed what is technically denominated a crime. But a cause for removal from office may exist when no offense against positive law has been committed, as when the individual has from immorality or imbecility or maladministration become unfit to exercise the office."

In the Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States, by Roger Foster, volume 1, page 569, this statement is made:

"The object of the grant of the power of impeachment was to free the Commonwealth from the danger caused by the retention of an unworthy public servant."

Again, on page 586, this statement:

"The Constitution provides that 'the judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their office during good behavior.'

"This necessarily implies that they may be removed in case of bad behavior. But no means, except impeachment, is provided for their removal, and judicial misconduct is not indictable by either a statute of the United States or the common law."

Again, on page 591, this statement:

"An impeachable offense may consist of treason, bribery, or a breach of official duty by malfeasance or misfeasance, including conduct such as * * * an abuse or reckless exercise of a discretionary power."

In Rawle on The Constitution, page 201, in speaking of the court of impeachment, it is said:

"The subjects of its jurisdiction are those offenses which proceed from the misconduct of public men, or, in other words, from the abuse or violation of some public trust."

In Story on The Constitution (5th edition), section 796, it is said:

"Is the silence of the statute book to be deemed conclusive in favor of the party until Congress have made a legislative declaration and enumeration of the offenses which shall be deemed high crimes and misdemeanors? If so, then, as has been truly remarked (citing Rawle on The Constitution), the power of impeachment, except as to the two expressed cases, is a complete nullity and the party is wholly dispunishable, however enormous may be his corruption or criminality. It will not be sufficient to say that, in the cases where any offense is punished by any statute of the United States, it may and ought to be deemed an impeachable offense. It is not every offense that by the Constitution is so impeachable. It must not only be an offense, but a high crime and misdemeanor."

The further answer to this contention may be that it is repugnant to the Constitution, which especially provides for the impeachment of a civil officer for high crimes and misdemeanors, and especially provides that the judge shall hold his office during good behavior.

Again, it is repugnant to the spirit and genius of our institutions; and, if it were correct, it would be to throw around the judge, as a civil officer, a protection not afforded any other officer under the Government. It is also repugnant to the precedents in impeachment trials before the Senate, to the precedents in impeachment trials in the different States that had similar provisions in their constitutions and had had impeachment trials before the adoption of the Federal Constitution.

Any civil officer can be impeached. The President of the United States can be impeached. The removal from office can be had in respect to any officer under the Government, and it would be anomaly to say that in a free representative government the people are deprived of the power and the right to remove from office an unworthy officer. If it be true that a judge can not be impeached except for what he may have done strictly in his capacity as judge, then this extraordinary protection is afforded to him: He is put upon a pedestal by himself; he is raised above the military, because they can be tried and gotten rid of; he is raised above the Executive, for he can be tried by impeachment and removed from office; he is raised above the members of the Senate and the Members of the House of Representatives, for they may be expelled upon a two-thirds vote of the members of their respective bodies. I say it would be anomaly. So far as the power of getting rid of an unworthy official is concerned, if that contention be correct it would be a hiatus in the power of government.

Did the fathers intend that it should ever come to pass that an unworthy officer, although a judge, guilty of murder or burglary or any other disgraceful crime which brings his high position into disrepute, can wrap a mantle of protection around him and say, "Although I am guilty of an infamous crime, I did not commit it in my judicial capacity, and therefore, convicted felon though I am, I can continue to be judge and to draw the emoluments of that high office?" I do not believe that this contention has ever been made in any of the cases heretofore presented to the Senate.

In Judge Pickering's case it will be remembered that he was accused of drunkenness. He was also accused of releasing a ship which had been libeled without requiring bond. It might be argued that he did not get drunk in his official capacity; and yet the Senate in that case did impeach him and remove him from office, and that was one of the charges.

In the case of Judge Humphreys, the other judge who was convicted and removed from office, the charge was that he had made secession speeches and that he had acted as a judge of a Confederate court. Certainly he did not make secession speeches in his capacity as a judge of the United States court; it was not done in the trial of any cause before him. He did that in his individual capacity, and yet the Senate did vote to convict him, and did remove him from office, because, among other things, he had made these speeches and had held and exercised the office of a Confederate judge during the civil war.

I have here Foster on the Constitution. I will not tax the patience of the Senate by reading it; but, availing myself of the privilege heretofore referred to, I shall ask to have inserted in the Record that portion of the text which I have marked.

The extract referred to is as follows

"The only difficulty arises in the construction of the term, 'other high crimes and misdemeanors.' As to this, four theories have been proposed: That, except treason or bribery, no offense is impeachable which is not declared by a statute of the United States to be a crime subject to indictment. That no offense is impeachable which is not subject to indictment by such a statute or by the common law. That all offenses are impeachable which were so by that branch of the common law known as the 'law of Parliament.' And that the House and Senate have the discretionary power to remove and stigmatize by perpetual disqualification an officer subject to impeachment for any cause that to them seems fit. The position that, except treason or bribery, no offense is impeachable which is not indictable by law was maintained by the counsel for the respondents on the trials of Chase and Johnson. * * *

"The first two theories are impracticable in their operation, inconsistent with other language of the Constitution, and overruled by precedents. If no crime, save treason and bribery, not forbidden by a statute of the United States, will support an impeachment, then almost every kind of official corruption or oppression must go unpunished. Suppose the Chief Justice of the United States were convicted in a State court of a felony or misdemeanor, must he remain in office unimpeached and hold court in a State prison?

"The term 'high crimes and misdemeanors' has no significance in the common law concerning crimes subject to indictment. It can be found only in the law of Parliament, and is the technical term which was used by the Commons at the bar of the Lords for centuries before the existence of the United States.

"The Constitution provides that—

"'The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior.'

"This necessarily implies that they may be removed in case of bad behavior. But no means except impeachment is provided for their removal, and judicial misconduct is not indictable by either a statute of the United States or the common law

"In 1803 Pickering, a district judge of the United States, was convicted on impeachment for his official action in surrendering to the claimant, without requiring the statutory bond, a vessel libeled by the United States, for refusing to allow an appeal from this order, and for drunkenness and profane language on the bench.

"None of these offenses was indictable by the common law or by statute.

"Humphreys, a district judge of the United States, was convicted on impeachment, not only for treason, but also for refusing to hold court, for holding office under the Confederate States, and for imprisoning citizens for expressing their sympathy with the Union. The managers of the House of Representatives who opened the case admitted that none of these offenses except the treason was indictable.

"Some advocates have gone so far as to maintain by a misapplication of a term of the common law that the proceedings on an impeachment are not a trial, but a so-called 'inquest of office,' and that the House and Senate may thus remove an officer for any reason that they approve. That Congress has the power to do so may be admitted. For it is not likely that any court would hold void collaterally a judgment on an impeachment where the Senate had jurisdiction over the person of the condemned. And undoubtedly a court of impeachment has the jurisdiction to determine what constitutes an impeachable offense. But the judgments of the Senate of the United States in the cases of Chase and Peck, as well as those of the State senates in the different cases which have been before them, have established the rule that no officer should be impeached for any act that does not have at least the characteristics of a crime. And public opinion must be irremediably debauched by party spirit before it will sanction any other course.

"Impeachable offenses are those which were the subject of impeachment by the practice in Parliament before the Declaration of Independence, except in so far as that practice is repugnant to the language of the Constitution and the spirit of American institutions. An examination of the English precedents will show that, although private citizens as well as public officers have been impeached, no article has been presented or sustained which did not charge either misconduct in office or some offense which was injurious to the welfare of the State at large.

"In this class of cases, which rests so much in the discretion of the Senate, the writer would be rash who were to attempt to prescribe the limits of its jurisdiction in this respect.

"An impeachable offense may consist of treason, bribery, or a breach of official duty by malfeasance, or misfeasance, including conduct such as drunkenness, when habitual or in the performance of official duties, gross indecency, and profanity, obscenity, or other language used in the discharge of an official function which tends to bring the office into disrepute, or an abuse or reckless exercise of a discretionary power, as well as a breach or omission of an official duty imposed by statute or common law; or a public speech when off duty which encourages insurrection. It does not consist in an error in judgment made in good faith in the decision of a doubtful question of law, except, perhaps, in the violation of the Constitution."

2017. Review of impeachments in Congress to show that judges have been impeached only for acts of judgment performed on the bench, as contradistinguished from personal acts performed while in office.—On February 22, 1905,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Messrs. Anthony Higgins and John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, offered a brief in support of their plea of jurisdiction as to the first seven articles. This brief, which was signed by them as counsel, but which, as they said, had been prepared by another, covered many questions relating to impeachments, the following being among them:

Seven impeachment trials have taken place under the machinery provided for that purpose by the Constitution of the United States: That of William Blount (1798), that of John Pickering (1803), that of Samuel Chase (1804), that of James H. Peck (1830), that of West H. Humphreys (1862), that of Andrew Johnson (1868), and that of William W. Belknap (1876). Three of the foregoing were political impeachments and four judicial, as those terms are understood in English parliamentary law. The articles presented by the House of Representatives against the four judges—Pickering, Chase, Peck, and Humphreys—illustrate in the most emphatic manner possible that the popular branch of Congress has heretofore always perfectly understood the meaning of the term "high crimes and misdemeanors," as applied to the misconduct for which a judge may be impeached. When placed side by side with the English precedents on that subject heretofore examined they agree in every particular. The House of Representatives, in the only four cases of the kind ever tried, limited its accusations, with the greatest strictness, to the acts of judgment performed by the judge on the bench, as contradistinguished from personal acts performed by the judge while in office, which might have been the ground of removal by address.

Turning first to the case against John Pickering, judge of the district court of New Hampshire, for practical illustrations, we find that judge charged with misconduct while adjudicating a certain admiralty case pending in said district court: "Yet the said John Pickering, being then judge of the said district court, and then in court sitting, with intent to defeat the just claims of the United States, did refuse to hear the testimony of the said witnesses so as aforesaid produced in behalf of the United States, and without hearing the said testimony so adduced in behalf of the United States in the trial of said cause did order and decree the ship Eliza, with her furniture, tackle, and apparel, to be restored to the said Eliphalett Ladd, the claimant, contrary to his trust and duty as judge of the said district court, in violation of the laws of the United States and to the manifest injury of their revenue." (Art. II.) Again (Art. III), when an appeal was prayed in open court in behalf of the United States, the charge is that "the said John Pickering, judge of the said district court, disregarding the authority of the laws, and wickedly meaning and intending to injure the revenues of the United States, and thereby to impair their public credit, did absolutely and positively refuse to allow the said appeal as prayed for."

And again (Art. IV), after the statement was made that said Pickering was "a man of loose morals and intemperate habits," he was thus accused: "On the eleventh and twelfth days of November, in the year one thousand eight hundred and two, being then judge of the district court in and for the district of New Hampshire, did appear upon the bench of said court, for the purpose of administering justice, in a state of total intoxication, produced by the free and intemperate use of inebriating liquors, and did then and there frequently, in a most profane and indecent manner, invoke the name of the Supreme Being, to the evil example of all good citizens of the United States, and was then and there guilty of other high misdemeanors, disgraceful to his own character as a judge and degrading to the honor and dignity of the United States." It should be specially noted here that no pretense was made that "loose morals and intemperate habits" or profanity constituted a high crime and misdemeanor. Upon the contrary, the accusation was strictly limited to acts done "upon the bench of the said court" while "administering justice in a state of total intoxication." There was no attempt in Pickering's case to claim that personal misconduct, which might have been the ground of removal by address, was an impeachable offense.

The articles of impeachment presented against Judge Samuel Chase contain equally pointed illustrations. In Article I he is charged with delivering an opinion in writing on the question of law, on the construction of which the defense of the accused materially depended, tending to prejudice the minds of the jury against the said John Fries, the prisoner, before the counsel had been heard in his defense; in Article II the charge is that "the said Samuel Chase, with intent to oppress and procure the conviction of the said Callender, did overrule the objection of John Bassett, one of the jury, who wished to be excused from serving on said trial;" in Article III the charge is that on the trial the judge refused to permit a witness to testify; in Article IV the charge is of various acts of judicial misconduct during a trial; and in the remaining articles the charges are of various acts of judicial misconduct on the bench in charging and refusing to discharge grand juries.

The accusation against Judge James H. Peck was contained in a single article, based upon the judicial conduct of the judge while sitting upon the bench in a case of contempt against Luke E. Lawless, who had published a newspaper article criticising a judgment rendered by Judge Peck in a case in which Lawless was plaintiff's counsel. The gravamen of the charge was this: "The said James H. Peck, judge as aforesaid, did afterwards, on the same day, under the color and pretenses aforesaid, and with intent aforesaid, in the said court, then and there unjustly, oppressively, and arbitrarily order and adjudge that the said Luke Edward Lawless, for the cause aforesaid, should be committed to prison for the period of twenty-four hours, and that he should be suspended from practicing as an attorney or counsellor at law in the said district court for the period of eighteen calendar months from that day; and did then and there further cause the said unjust and oppressive sentence to be carried into execution."

The impeachment of Judge West H. Humphreys was begun and concluded during the civil war. He was tried and condemned in his absence and without a hearing. While such an anomalous proceeding can have but little weight as a precedent, what it does contain of matter relevant to a judicial impeachment supports the contention made herein. The first charge contained in the articles presented against Judge Humphreys was that he was guilty of treason, in that he "then being district judge of the United States, as aforesaid, did then and there, to wit, within said State, unlawfully and in conjunction with other persons, organize armed rebellion against the United States and levy war against them." When the allegations incident to the accusation of treason are subtracted from the articles, all that remains is a charge of judicial misconduct upon the part of Judge Humphreys while sitting in a court of the Confederate States.

The words of the accusation are that the said Humphreys "did unlawfully act as judge of an illegally constituted tribunal within said State, called the district court of the Confederate States of America, and as judge of said tribunal last named, said West H. Humphreys, with the intent aforesaid, then and there assumed and exercised powers unlawful and unjust, to wit, in causing one Perez Dickinson, a citizen of said State, to be unlawfully arrested and brought before him, as judge of said alleged court of said Confederate States of America, and required him to swear allegiance to the pretended government of said Confederate States of America; * * * In decreeing within said State, and as judge of said illegal tribunal, the confiscation to the use of said Confederate States of America of property of citizens of the United States, and especially of property of one Andrew Johnson and one John Catron " Thus in this anomalous proceeding, carried on amid the passions of a great civil war, the idea was not for one moment lost sight of that the misconduct upon the part of a judge, which constitutes an impeachable high crime and misdemeanor, must occur while he is actually presiding in a judicial tribunal and abusing its powers.

2018. Review of the deliberation of the Constitutional Convention as bearing on the use of the words "high crimes and misdemeanors."—On February 22, 1905,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Messrs. Anthony Higgins and John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, offered a brief in support of their plea of jurisdiction as to the first seven articles. This brief which was signed by them as counsel but which as they said had been prepared by another, covered many questions relating to impeachments, the following being among them.

After reviewing the accepted meaning of the words "high crimes and misdemeanors," as used in England and the colonies, the argument proceeds:

Before the Federal Convention of 1787 met the original State constitutions had been in operation for at least ten years. As a general rule the framers looked to that source of light when the adoption of a principle of English constitutional law was concerned.

The questions that constantly arose were: In what form has such a principle reappeared in the several States? Is its operation an effect satisfactory therein? Such examples were sometimes taken, however, not as guides but as warnings. It did not always follow that a principle adapted to the wants of a single State was to be ingrafted without modification upon the constitution of a Federal State. The debates touching the adoption of impeachment and address pointedly illustrate that fact, as the Convention resolved to adopt the one without the other. The record is specially clear and direct upon that point. In the Madison papers (pp. 481–482) the following appears:

"Article XI being taken up, Doctor Johnson suggested that the judicial power ought to extend to equity as well as law, and moved to insert the words 'both in law and equity' after the words 'United States' in the first line of the first section."

Mr. Read objected to vesting these powers in the same court.

On the question, New Hampshire, Connecticut, Pennsylvania, Virginia, South Carolina, Georgia, aye—6; Delaware, Maryland, no—2; Massachusetts, New Jersey, North Carolina, absent

On the question to agree to Article XI, section 1, as amended, the States were the same as on the preceding question.

Mr. Dickinson moved, as an amendment to Article XI, section 2, after the words "good behavior," the words "Provided that they may be removed by the Executive on the application by the Senate and

[1] Third session Fifty-eighth Congress, Record, pp. 3031, 3032.

House of Representatives." (The words of the act of settlement are, "but upon the address of both Houses of Parliament it may be lawful to remove them.") Mr. Gerry seconded the motion. Mr. Gouverneur Morris thought it a contradiction, in terms, to say that the judges should hold their offices during good behavior, and yet be removable without a trial. Besides, it was fundamently wrong to subject judges to so arbitrary an authority.

Mr. Sherman saw no contradiction or impropriety if this were made a part of the constitutional legislation of the judiciary establishment. He observed that a like provision was contained in the British statutes

Mr. RUTLEDGE. If the Supreme Court is to judge between the United States and particular States, this alone is an insuperable objection to the motion.

Mr. Wilson considers such a provision in the British Government as less dangerous than here; the House of Lords and House of Commons being less likely to concur on the same occasions. Chief Justice Holt, he remarked, had successively offended, by his independent conduct, both Houses of Parliament. Had this happened at the same time, he would have been ousted. The judges would be in a bad situation if made to depend on any gust of faction which might prevail in the two branches of our Government. Mr. Randolph opposed the motion as weakening too much the independence of the judges.

Mr. Dickinson was not apprehensive that the legislature, composed of different branches, constructed on such different principles, would improperly unite for the purpose of displacing a judge.

On the question for agreeing to Mr. Dickinson's motion, it was negatived.

Connecticut, aye; all the other States present, no.

Thus the proposition to ingraft upon our Federal Constitution that provision of the act of settlement, specially referred to in the debate by Mr. Sherman, was rejected with only one dissenting voice. When, at another time, Mr. Dickinson attempted to provide that the President should be removed by address, his proposal was rejected by the same majority. As Mr. William Lawrence (Impeachment of Andrew Johnson, Vol. 1, p. 135) has stated it: "Removal on the address of both Houses of Parliament is provided for in the act of settlement (3 Hallam, 262). In the convention which framed our Countitution, June 2, 1787, Mr. John Dickinson, of Delaware, moved 'that the Executive be made removable by the National Legislature on the request of a majority of the legislatures of individual States.' Delaware alone voted for this and it was rejected. Impeachment was deemed sufficiently comprehensive to cover every proper case for removal." The last sentence states the essence of the whole matter. The Convention resolved that neither the executive nor judicial officers of the United States should be removed from office except "on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors."

As a well-known authority has expressed it: "The first proposition was to use the words, 'to be removable on impeachment and conviction of malpractice and neglect of duty.' It was agreed that these expressions were too general. They were therefore stricken out. It was voted that the clause should be simply 'removable on impeachment.' The debate shows that the Members did not wish the Senate to be able to remove a civil officer whenever he acted in a way detrimental to the public service, for such a power was expressly refused. (Citing Madison Papers, p. 481, heretofore quoted.) A general debate took place on a clause in one draft which made the President triable only for treason and bribery. It was urged that the jurisdiction was too limited. The following are extracts from the debate which ensued: Colonel Mason said· 'Treason, as defined in the Constitution, will not reach many great and dangerous offenses. Hastings is not guilty of treason. Attempts to subvert the Constitution may not be treason as above defined.' He moved to insert after 'bribery' the words 'or maladministration.' Madison: 'So vague a term will be equivalent to a tenure during the pleasure of the Senate' Mason withdrew 'maladministration' and substituted 'other high crimes and misdemeanors against the State.' In the final draft the words 'against the State' were omitted, doubtless as surplusage, and the expressions finally adopted, 'crimes' and 'misdemeanors,' were words which had a well-defined signification in the courts of England and in her colonies as meaning criminal offenses at common (parliamentary) law." (American Law Review, vol. 16, p. 804, article on "Impeachable offenses under the Constitution of the United States.") The term "common" instead of "parliamentary" law is carelessly used in that excellent statement, as it often is elsewhere. After quoting Rawle on Constitution (200, Lawrence (Johnson's Imp., Vol. I, p. 125) remarks: "This author says in reference to impeachments, 'we must have recourse to the common law of England for the definition of them;' that is, to the common parliamentary law. (3 Wheaton, 610; 1 Wood and Minot, 448.)"

2019. Abandonment of the theory that impeachment may be only for indictable offenses.

Discussion of the theory that an impeachable offense is one in its nature or consequence subversive of some fundamental or essential principle of government or highly prejudicial to the public interest.

On February 22, 1905,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Messrs. Anthony Higgins and John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, offered a brief in support to their plea of jurisdiction as to the first seven of the articles. This brief, which was signed by them as counsel, but which, as they said, had been prepared by another, covered many questions relating to impeachments, the following being among them:

When sitting as a high court of impeachment the Senate is the sole and final judge of the meaning of the phrase " high crimes and misdemeanors." It has been well said that " 'Treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors' are of course impeachable. Treason and bribery are specifically named. But 'other high crimes and misdemeanors' are just as fully comprehended as though each was specified. The Senate is made the sole judge of what they are. There is no revising court. The Senate determines in the light of parliamentary law. Congress can not define or limit by law that which the Constitution defines in two cases by enumeration and in others by classification, and of which the Senate is sole judge." (Lawrence, Johnson's Imp., Vol. I, p. 136.) And yet the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment has in no one of the seven cases tried before it ever attempted to define the momentous phrase in question, and probably never will. When a new case arises nothing can be learned except what may be gleaned from the individual utterances of Senators, and from the arguments of counsel made in preceding cases, too often under the temptation to bend the precedents to the necessities of the particular occasion. One good result has, however, been the outcome of such discussions, and that is the elimination of two propositions which have perished through their own inherent weakness. On the one hand, a grotesque attempt has been made to narrow unreasonably the jurisdiction of the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment by the claim that the power of impeachment is limited to offenses positively defined by the statutes of the United States as impeachable crimes and misdemeanors.

Apart from its other infirmities, this contention loses sight of the fact that Congress has no power whatever to define a high crime and misdemeanor. On the other hand, an equally untenable attempt has been made to widen unreasonably the jurisdiction of the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment by the claim that, under the general principles of right, it can declare that an impeachable high crime or misdemeanor is one in its nature or consequence subversive of some fundamental or essential principle of government or highly prejudicial to the public interest, and this may consist of a violation of the Constitution, of law, of an official oath, or of duty, by an act committed or omitted, or, without violating a positive law, by the abuse of discretionary powers for improper motives or for an improper purpose. This expansive and nebulous definition embodies an attempt to clothe the Senate sitting as a court with such a jurisdiction as it would have possessed had the Federal Convention seen fit to extend impeachment "to malpractice and neglect of duty," or to "maladministration," a proposition rejected with a single dissent because, as Madison expressed it, "So vague a term will be equivalent to a tenure during the pleasure of the Senate."

Even that school which gives the widest possible interpretation to the Federal Constitution will hardly be willing to go so far, even under the general-welfare clause, as to write into the Constitution phrases and meanings which the framers expressly rejected, in order to accomplish what may be considered by some a convenient end. Certainly that school which still respects the canons of strict construction can not listen to such an argument. Between the two extremes, those who have made a careful study of the subject find no difficulty in reaching the obvious conclusion that the term "high crimes and misdemeanors" embraces simply those offenses impeachable under the parliamentary law of England in 1787, subject to such modifications as that law suffered in the process of reproduction. When the objection is made that the phrase thus construed covers too narrow an area, the answer is that it was the expressly declared purpose of the framers so to restrict it within narrow limits perfectly understood at the time. In the first place, the proposition to adopt removal by address was rejected with only one dissent; in the second, the proposal to adopt such a comprehensive term as "maladministration" was rejected and the limited phrase in question substituted. The declaration was clearly made at the time that there must be no undue weakening of the independence of the Federal judiciary. The necessity for such a precaution was soon justified by events.

A leading authority upon the subject tells us that upon the destruction of the Federalist party on the election of Jefferson "An assault upon the judiciary, State and Federal, was made all along the lines. In some States, as New Hampshire, old courts were abolished and new ones, with similar jurisdiction, created for the sole purpose of obtaining new judges. In Pennsylvania an obnoxious Federal judge was removed from the common pleas by impeachment; and an impeachment of all the Federal judges of the highest court was made, but failed through the uprising of the entire bar, irrespective of party lines, in defense of their official chiefs. A similar attack was made upon the Federal judiciary." (Foster on the Constitution, Vol. I, p. 531.) With the possibility of such an assault impending it is not strange that the makers of our Federal Constitution should have confined the power of removing judges by impeachment within the well-known limits which the English constitution had defined.

2020. Mr. Manager Olmsted's argument that impeachment is not restricted to offenses indictable under Federal law and that judges may be impeached for breaches of "good behavior."

Discussion of English and American precedents as bearing on the meaning of the phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors."

On February 23, 1905,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Mr. Manager Marlin E. Olmsted, of Pennsylvania, in final argument, said:

Although it would seem that the question must now be considered settled, nevertheless in nearly every impeachment trial the question is raised as to the character of and offenses for which impeachment will lie. In times past men of great learning and authority have contended that no officer can be impeached except for indictable offenses, and that as there are no common-law offenses against the United States, it follows that there can be no impeachment except for an offense expressly declared and made indictable by act of Congress. This view of the matter fades away in the bright light of reason and of precedent.

Such a construction would render the constitutional provision practically a nullity. Congress has defined and made indictable by statute comparatively few offenses. It would be impossible in any statute to define or describe all the various ways in which a judge or other civil officer might so notably and conspicuously misbehave himself as to justify and require his removal. Even murder is not defined in any act of Congress. When it so appears, reference to some other source must be had to ascertain the meaning of the term. Murder is not made indictable by any act of Congress, nor has any Federal court jurisdiction of that crime unless committed upon the high seas.

Suppose a judge to commit murder upon the dry land within the confines of a State. That would not be a high crime or misdemeanor within the provision of any act of Congress. Could it successfully be maintained that it was not a high crime and misdemeanor within the meaning of Article II, section 4, of the Constitution, or that it was not such a breach of good behavior as would justify removal from office? If that be the proper construction, then it is possible to imagine that as the respondent transacted official business at and dated his communications from "United States district court, northern district of Florida, judge's chambers, Guyencourt, Del.," so a more violent and vicious man might conduct business at "Judge's chambers, State penitentiary," and still be free from all danger of impeachment or removal from the judicial office.

I have shown, Mr. President, that men have formerly argued that only indictable offenses are subjects for impeachment; that as there were no common-law offenses against the United States there can be no impeachment except for crimes declared and defined by act of Congress. But now, in the 48-page brief served upon us last evening, bearing the names of the honorable counsel for respondent, but the authorship of which they distinctly disavowed—and I now know the reason why—we find the astounding doctrine that no man can be impeached for any offense declared by Congress. Therefore no officer can be impeached, no matter what he does, unless we can find that in England some judge had been impeached for the same specific offense prior to the adoption of our Constitution, which borrowed something from the mother country in this matter.

[1] Third session Fifty-eighth Congress, Record, pp. 3182–3184.

Now, we admit, Mr. President, that the term "impeachment" is imported from the English law, and so is the constitutional phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors" used in relation thereto. They are both without definition, either in the Constitution or in any act of Congress. Where, then, shall their definition and construction be found? Our Supreme Court has declared that—

"Where English statutes—such, for instance, as the statute of frauds and the statute of limitations—have been adopted into our legislation, the known and settled construction of those statutes by courts of law has been considered as silently incorporated into the acts or has been received with all the weight of authority." (Pennock v. Dialogue, 2 Peters, 2–18.)

That was an unanimous decision in which Chief Justice John Marshall participated and concurred, and the opinion was written by Mr. Justice Story.

To the same effect is the case of United States v. Jones (3 Wash. C. C. R., 209), and many other authorities that might be cited.

We may therefore look to the law of England for the meaning of the term "impeachment" and of the phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors," as used in connection therewith—not so much to the statute law, nor to the common law, as generally understood, but to the common parliamentary law of England, as found in the precedents and reports of impeachment cases.

The Senate has always been governed in impeachment cases by the lex et consuetudo parliamenti. It requires but a brief investigation to show that according to the English parliamentary practice in vogue at and prior to the adoption of the Constitution, the greatest possible variety of offenses, not indictable, were nevertheless held proper causes for impeachment.

In II Wooddeson's Law Lectures, an acknowledged authority, the learned author, in his lecture upon "Parliamentary Impeachment," says (p. 596):

"It is certain that magistrates and officers intrusted with the administration of public affairs may abuse their delegated powers to the extensive detriment of the community and at the same time in a manner not properly cognizable before the ordinary tribunals. The influence of such delinquents and the nature of such offenses may not unsuitably engage the authority of the highest court and the wisdom of the sagest assembly. The Commons, therefore, as the grand inquest of the nation, become suitors for penal justice, and they can not consistently, either with their own dignity or with safety to the accused, sue elsewhere but to those who share with them in the legislature.

"On this policy is founded the origin of impeachments, which began soon after the constitution assumed its present form."

And again (p. 601):

"Such kind of misdeeds, however, as peculiarly injure the commonwealth by the abuse of high offices of trust, are most proper, and have been the most usual grounds for this kind of prosecution. Thus, if a lord chancellor be guilty of bribery, or of acting grossly contrary to the duty of his office; if the judges mislead their sovereign by unconstitutional opinions; if any other magistrate attempt to subvert the fundamental laws or introduce arbitrary power, these have been deemed cases adapted to parliamentary inquiry and decision. So where a lord chancellor has been thought to have put the seal to an ignominous treaty, a lord admiral to neglect the safeguard of the sea, an ambassador to betray his trust, a privy counselor to propound or support pernicious and dishonorable measures, or a confidential adviser of his sovereign to obtain exorbitant grants or incompatible employments, these imputations have properly occasioned impeachments, because it is apparent how little the ordinary tribunals are calculated to take cognizance of such offenses or to investigate and reform the general polity of the state."

In several cases English judges were impeached for giving extrajudicial opinions and misinterpreting the law. (4 Hatsell, 76.)

Such is the undoubted parliamentary law of England, from which our process and practice of impeachment and the very term itself are derived. That it has been adopted and followed here is equally certain.

Judge Curtis, in his History of the Constitution (pp. 260–261), says:

"The purposes of an impeachment lie wholly beyond the penalties of the statute or the customary law. The object of the proceeding is to ascertain whether cause exists for removing a public officer from office. * * * Such a cause may be found in the fact that either in the discharge of his office or aside from its functions he has violated a law or committed what is technically denominated a crime, but a cause for removal from office may exist where no offense against positive law is committed, as where the individual has from immorality, imbecility, or maladministration become unfit to exercise the office."

And Judge Story says, in section 799 of his work on the Constitution:

"Congress has unhesitatingly adopted the conclusion that no previous statute is necessary to authorize an impeachment for any official misconduct. * * * In the few cases of impeachment which have hitherto been tried no one of the charges has rested upon any statutable misdemeanor." (1 Story on Con., sec. 799.)

Such writers as Cooley and Wharton and Rawle maintain the same position and support it not only by reason, but by authority and precedent. For a very able discussion of this subject I refer to the brief of Mr. Lawrence, adopted by the managers and published among the proceedings in the impeachment of Andrew Johnson and also in 6 American Law Register, new series, page 641.

Every impeachment case ever presented to the United States Senate has been founded upon articles, some or all of which charged offenses not indictable; and Judge West, of Tennessee, as well as Judge Pickering, was convicted and removed for offenses not subject to indictment under either State or Federal laws.

We agree with respondent's brief, the authorship of which his counsel disavow, that the general character of offenses impeachable may be studied to advantage by a consideration of the English precedent, but I can never agree that in order to convict an American judge we must first show that some English judge has been convicted of the same specific offense.

No English judge has been impeached for murder, or perjury, or forgery, or larceny; and yet they were undoubtedly impeachable offenses in England as they are here to-day. They, or any of them, would certainly constitute a breach of that "good behavior" during which Federal judges hold their commissions. Surely an offense which would have been impeachable without a statute is none the less so because Congress has declared it a misdemeanor. Taking money out of the Treasury on a false certificate would have been impeachable in England before our Constitution. It is none the less so here, statute or no statute.

JURISDICTION OF FIRST SEVEN ARTICLES.

Respondent denies that the offenses charged in the first seven articles are proper subjects of impeachment on the ground, as we understand it, that they were committed by him in his private and not in his official capacity; or, in other words, that the articles do not charge misbehaviors or misdemeanors in office. We labor under the impression that the respondent is "in office," and that any misdemeanor committed by him, either in his private or official capacity, since he accepted the President's commission was a misdemeanor "in office." He may have been out of his court room and out of his district, but he has never been out of office.

The Constitution and his commission each defines his term as "during good behavior," and provides for his removal from office for "treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors," meaning thereby misbehavior, for misbehavior is misdemeanor, and misdemeanor is misbehavior. There is no limitation to offenses actually committed upon the bench, nor to those committed while in the performance of any judicial or official function, or in any way under color of office.

The Century Dictionary gives this definition:

"During good behavior: As long as one remains blameless in the discharge of one's duties or the conduct of one's life; as, an office held during good behavior."

Judge Curtis, in his History of the Constitution (pp. 260–261), says:

"The purposes of an impeachment lie wholly beyond the penalties of the statute or the customary law. The object of the proceeding is to ascertain whether cause exists for removing a public officer from office. * * * Such a cause may be found in the fact that either in the discharge of his office or aside from its functions he has violated a law or committed what is technically denominated a crime, but a cause for removal from office may exist where no offense against positive law is committed, as where the individual has from immorality, imbecility, or maladministration become unfit to exercise the office."

Such is manifestly the intention of the Constitution. That instrument says "during good behavior." It does not, as some of the State constitutions do, add the words "in office." It says "high crimes and misdemeanors," but it does not add "in office." In the brief of respondent's honorable counsel the authorship of which they disavow, they tell us, and it is entirely true, that at one stage of its formation the provision read "misdemeanors against the State." But as the words "against the State" were stricken out they argue that it must be construed as if they had been left in.

JUDGE HUMPHREY'S CASE.

Mr. President, there are plenty of authorities, both English and American, that in order to be the subject of impeachment it is not necessary that an offense shall be committed even under color of office, and just here I take issue in the most emphatic manner with the statements of that 48-page brief as to the causes for which convictions have been had in impeachment. It is full of historical inaccuracies. It declares, for instance, that Judge West H. Humphreys, of Tennessee, was convicted only for offenses committed in his judicial capacity.

I say that he was convicted upon each one of the seven articles, only one of which—the fifth—had any relation at all to his duties as a Federal judge. The very first article charged him with advocating secession. Where? Upon the bench? No. In the court room? No. In a written opinion? No; but in a public speech in the city of Nashville. Five other of those counts were of the same character. How could a judge commit that offense upon the bench? He did not speak as a judge, but as a citizen at a public meeting.

Mr. President, Andrew Johnson came within one vote of being impeached upon the eleventh article in his case, a portion of which I will read:

"That said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, unmindful of the high duties of his office, and of his oath of office, and in disregard of the Constitution and laws of the United States, did, heretofore, to wit, on the 18th day of August, A. D. 1866, at the city of Washington and the District of Columbia, by public speech, declare and affirm, in substance, that the Thirty-ninth Congress of the United States was not a Congress of the United States."

Upon that article the vote against him was 35 to 19. A change of one vote would have expelled him from the Presidency.

Treason, removal for which is made compulsory, is specifically defined by the Constitution in these words:

"Treason against the United States shall consist only of levying war against them or adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort."

It would hardly be possible for a judge, sitting upon the bench, or in any other way except entirely aside from any function of his office, to be guilty of this offense. But suppose that, disassociating himself as far as possible from his judicial position, he should in his individual capacity participate in "levying war against them or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort."

That would surely be treason, as constitutionally defined, and yet, upon the argument of the honorable counsel for respondent, he could not be impeached and removed from office for that offense. Think of that. A traitor to his country, sitting securely upon the bench, secure from removal by any power on earth, for in no way can he be removed except by the Senate, upon impeachment by the House of Representatives. A Federal judge, upon that reasoning, might commit murder upon the public highway, or be convicted of housebreaking, or forgery, or perjury, or in any other way bring into contempt his high office, and yet we are told that if the offense be not committed upon the bench, nor in the court room, nor in any way relating to his judicial duties, he can not be impeached and removed.

It is hardly necessary to prolong this branch of the discussion, in view of the fact that the question has already been determined by the Senate itself.

BLOUNT'S CASE.

In 1797 William Blount was expelled from the Senate for attempting to seduce a United States Indian interpreter from his duty and to alienate the affections and conduct of the Indians from the public officers residing among them. That was not a statutory offense, nor committed in the Senate Chamber, nor in the exercise or omission of any Senatorial function, nor under color of office; but the Senate, nevertheless, resolved that he "having been guilty of a high misdemeanor entirely inconsistent with his public trust and duty as a Senator, be, and he is hereby, expelled from the United States Senate."

That was not upon an impeachment proceeding, but the principle involved was precisely the same, and later it was sustained in the impeachment case of Judge Humphreys, as I have shown.

THE ARTICLES DO CHARGE OFFENSES HAVING STRICT RELATION TO HIS OFFICIAL OFFICE.

It is difficult in any event to see any force in respondent's plea to the jurisdiction. The offenses charged in the first seven as well as in all the other articles do relate entirely to his judicial office and not to his private conduct.

2021. Argument of Mr. Manager De Armond that Congress may make nonresidence of a judge a high misdemeanor.

Argument that a judge may be impeached for misbehavior generally.

On February 25, 1905,[1] in the Senate, sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Mr. Manager David A. De Armond, of Missouri, in final argument, said:

Thirty years before Judge Swayne was born the Congress of the United States enacted a law, now embodied in section 551, Revised Statutes, requiring a district judge to reside in his district. The question of the enactment of such a law arose years earlier. The discussion was participated in by makers of the Constitution as well as by contemporaries of those illustrious men. In the body which passed the law were those who had gathered in the spirit of the Constitution, not merely from the lips of those who had made it, but through participation in the making of it. The law was passed in the full belief, unchallenged by anybody, that the power rested in the Congress to pass such a law, and it was declared that a violation or disregard of that law should constitute a high misdemeanor, employing the very language of the Constitution itself.

And yet we find, thanks to the facile pen of some modern essayist whose product is embodied in the record in this case, some unknown great man, that it is impossible for Congress to add to or take from the category of "high crimes and misdemeanors" as embodied in the Constitution in the clause relating to impeachments.

Those who lived in that early day, those who participated in the discussions that led up to that early legislation, and those who enacted that law did not think just as this modern writer and essayist does think. This graceful writer, but, as he has demonstrated, evidently poor lawyer, confesses that he can not define, and he says nobody can define, just what was meant by "high crimes and misdemeanors;" but he insists that there was such a fixed, settled, immovable, unchangeable, ever-enduring meaning and limitation attached to and embodied in it that nothing can be added to it or taken from it; and yet he does not know what it is; he does not tell us, and he says nobody else can tell, what it is.

The doctrine, aside from this authority which the respondent's counsel quoted with so much approval and indorsed so fully, the doctrine of other essayists and other commentators upon the Constitution, the doctrine of men whose names have gone into our history as illustrating it in its best phases and as demonstrating the greatest capacity and the highest achievements of the human mind, was and is that Congress could add to what might be embraced in the term, and that the Senate of the United States, on the trial of an impeachment, was made by the Constitution itself, and ever must be, the final authorized judge of the meaning.

Suppose that this Republic were to endure, as all of us most sincerely hope it will, for centuries and multiplied centuries, and suppose that a thousand years hence, or five thousand years hence, after agencies and forces undreamed of to-day, as those playing important parts in the drama of to-day were undreamed of a short time ago, were brought into requisition, and out of their use and development new and strange conditions, unthought of and unthinkable to-day, should arise, and that the Congress, in its enlightened wisdom, should conclude to declare this, that, or the other thing arising out of the development of these new conditions high crimes and misdemeanors. These wise commentators of the school of this essayist and their successors, if they are to have succession in a more enlightened age of the world and of the country, would say: "You can not impeach for that. You must go back into the English parliamentary law for the chart of your powers. At the adoption of the Constitution you were confined within the Englishman's definition of high crimes and misdemeanors, and confined to his catalogue of them; but what his definition was or is and what was or is embraced within his catalogue we do not know, and nobody knows. Those who framed the Constitution meant to deny and did deny to the Congress all power whatsoever to declare anything a high crime or misdemeanor which was not such when the Constitution was made."

[1] Third session Fifty-eighth Congress, Record, pp. 3376, 3377.

Then if you or your successors should modestly say to these gentlemen, "Pray tell us, then, what are the things for which an impeachment will lie? What is comprehended within the term 'high crimes and misdemeanors?' What, within the meaning of the Constitution, made by those short-sighted men, so long, long ago in their graves, is embodied in these words?" They would answer then, I suppose, as this wise commentator of to-day answers, "I do not know; nobody ever has said, and nobody will ever be able to say."

Drifting back to English history, counsel claim to have discovered—and it is a discovery of something which does not exist, I think; but I pass that by—that no judge in English history ever was impeached or tried on impeachment except for an offense committed in the actual discharge of the duties of a judge, sitting on the bench itself. Well now, if that were true, what does it prove? It proves nothing—absolutely nothing.

Reflect upon it for a moment. Suppose all these trials had been with reference to some particular offense. It would be just as logical to contend that for no other offense committed upon the bench in the discharge of judicial duty would impeachment lie. How many cases must there be before this is settled? They say there have been but few, and that is true. How many are necessary to fix it that there can not be a trial by impeachment for any other offense? There again they can not answer.

The truth of the matter is that this question of impeachment and the right and power to impeach, and the things for which people could be impeached in Great Britain, shifted and changed with the shifting and changing judgment and legislation of the times. At one time it was supposed to be legitimate and proper, and the supposed power was exercised, to impeach and convict and remove from office and imprison for the advocacy of religious views and the propagation of religious doctrines which, at another time, were held to be the correct views and the sound doctrines relating to the subject of religion in that great realm. So it has been and so it is and so it will be.

These gentlemen ignore entirely the question as to good conduct—"during good behavior." They say that the provision for removing judges by address is not embodied in the Constitution. What do they say then? They say there is no way of removing them except in a few cases to which, they say, the constitutional provision respecting impeachment implies.

As was said by Mr. Morris, when that matter was under discussion in the Constitutional Convention, the judges ought not to be removed on the ground of lacking in good behavior except upon a trial. What trial is provided? The kind of trial you have here now. The trial before the Senate of the United States, on impeachment by the House of Representatives. There has been embodied in that one method all the power that resides in the Government in all its branches— all the power of the people of this vast country, this great and mighty Republic—to remove from office an offending civil officer. And precisely the same provision that applies to the judges applies to all other civil officers.

The gentlemen discriminate respecting the judges. Where do they get the ground for the discrimination? It is not in the Constitution. There is nothing in the Constitution suggesting that a judge can be removed from office only for offending on the bench, and that as to other civil officers they may be removed for offenses off duty, or not so narrowly official.

The learned counsel for the respondent who closed the case on the other side seemed to take lightly the suggestion of Mr. Manager Palmer in the brief which he filed, and of my other colleagues who argued this case, that according to the commentators upon the Constitution, according to the spirit of the Constitution, according to the just principles of law governing impeachment, it is within the power of the House of Representatives to vote impeachment, and it is within the just and constitutional powers of the Senate to convict, for conduct in a judge off the beach and away even from his judicial transactions. The logical conclusion from the contention of respondent's counsel is that no matter how vile any civil officer of the Government may be, no matter how great the sum total of the individual items of his offending, so long as the offending is not on the bench or in the active technical conduct of his office the whole power of the Government is too weak, the arm of the House of Representatives too short, and the judgment of the Senate too puny to reach the offender and protect the public from the vile contamination of his continued presence in office. We do not take that view of the matter.

2022. Opinion of Attorney-General Felix Grundy that Territorial judges are not civil officers of the United States within the meaning of the impeachment clause of the Constitution.—On February 4, 1839,[1] as pertinent to the consideration of a pending bill to amend the law establishing the Territorial government of Wisconsin, Mr. Isaac H. Bronson, of New York, chairman of the Committee on Territories, presented to the House a letter of the Attorney-General of the United States, Hon. Felix Grundy, giving an opinion on the subject of the removal of Territorial judges by impeachment:

The provision of the Constitution which relates most directly to this subject is contained in the first section of the third article, which declares that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish. The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office."

The construction of this part of the Constitution has been settled, it seems to me, by the opinion of Congress, expressed by various acts, and also by the Supreme Court of the United States.

By the article of the Constitution referred to the judges are to hold their offices during good behavior. Congress can not consistently with this provision provide any other or different tenure of office within the States.

Congress has in most cases limited the tenure of office of Territorial judges to four years. This could not be done were they judges under or provided for by the Constitution, because by that instrument the tenure is during good behavior. It should be noticed that Congress has imposed this limitation of four years, not in a single instance only, but in many. It has been imposed in the Territories embraced within the limits of the original States, where the Territory has been ceded to the General Government, and Territorial governments have been created therein. It has also been done in the Territories purchased by the United States from foreign nations. I think these acts clearly prove the sense of Congress to be that Territorial judges are not judges under the Constitution, but are mere creatures of legislation.

I have said that the Supreme Court of the United States have also decided upon this point. In the case of the American Insurance Company and others v. Canter, reported in first Peters, the court very distinctly recognized the opinion above expressed, and convey their views in the following strong language "These courts (meaning Territorial courts), then, are not constitutional courts, in which the judicial power conferred by the Constitution on the General Government can be deposited; they are incapable of receiving it; they are legislative courts, created in virtue of the general rights of sovereignty."

The only remaining inquiry is as to the liability of Territorial judges to impeachment under the Constitution. The fourth section of the second article of the Constitution is in these words: "The President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors."

If the construction of the Constitution be correct, as I suppose it is, that these judges are not constitutional but legislative judges, I can see nothing in the Constitution which would warrant their being embraced by the expression, "and all civil officers of the United States." They are not civil officers of the United States in the constitutional meaning of the phrase. They are merely Territorial officers, and therefore, in my opinion, not subject to impeachment and trial before the Senate of the United States.

2023. Reference to a summary of provisions of State constitutions relating to impeachment and removal by address.—On February 22, 1905,[1] in the Senate, sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Messrs. John M. Thurston and Anthony Higgins, of counsel for respondent, filed as part of an argument on a plea as to jurisdiction a summary of provisions in the constitutions of the various States at various periods of their existence. It appears in full in the Congressional Record of that date.

pro tempore laid before the Senate the following communication from the counsel of Judge Charles Swayne; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

To the President pro tempore of the United States Senate:

The undersigned have the honor to request that, inasmuch as Judge Charles Swayne has been declared not guilty by the Senate of the impeachment charges preferred against him by the House of Representatives, an allowance may be made as a part of the expenses of the Senate in connection with the impeachment which shall enable him to defray the expenses of his counsel and the other expenses incurred by him in making his defense.

The undersigned will submit a statement of such expenses whenever requested to do so by the Senate.

The joint resolution [1] appropriating for the expenses of the Senate in the trial made no provision for granting this request.

2026. Under the parliamentary law of impeachment the Commons, as grand inquest of the nation and as accusers, become suitors for penal justice at the bar of the Lords.

The Commons, in impeaching, usually pass a resolution containing a criminal charge against the accused and direct a Member to impeach him by oral accusation before the Lords.

The person impeaching on behalf of the Commons signifies that articles will be exhibited.

In impeaching, the spokesman of the Commons asks that the delinquent be sequestered from his seat, or committed, or that the Peers take order for his appearance.

In Chapter LIII of Jefferson's Manual the following is given in the "sketch of some of the principles and practices of England" on the subject of impeachment

Accusation. The Commons, as the grand inquest of the nation, become suitors for penal justice. (2 Wood., 597; 6 Grey, 356.) The general course is to pass a resolution containing a criminal charge against the supposed delinquent, and then to direct some member to impeach him by oral accusation at the bar of the House of Lords, in the name of the Commons. The person signifies that the articles will be exhibited, and desires that the delinquent may be sequestered from his seat, or be committed, or that the Peers will take order for his appearance. (Sachev. Trial, 325; 2 Wood., 602, 605; Lords' Journ., 3 June, 1701; 1 Wms., 616; 6 Grey, 324.)

2027. The Commons attend generally in impeachment trials, but not when the Lords consider the answer on proofs or determine judgment.

The Commons attend impeachment trials in committee of the whole, or otherwise, at discretion, and appoint managers to conduct proof.

The presence of the Commons is considered necessary at the answer and the judgment in impeachment cases.

Method of taking the vote in judgment in English impeachment trials.

In Chapter LIII of Jefferson's Manual, the following is given in the "sketch of some of the principles and practices of England" on the subject of impeachments:

Presence of Commons. The Commons are to be present at the examination of witnesses. (Seld. Jud., 124.) Indeed, they are to attend throughout, either as a committee of the whole House, or otherwise, at discretion, appoint managers to conduct the proofs. (Rushw. Tr. of Straff., 37; Com. Journ., 4 Feb., 1709-10; 2 Wood., 614.) And judgment is not to be given till they demand it. (Seld. Jud., 124.) But they are not to be present on impeachment when the Lords consider of the answer or proofs and determine of their judgment. Their presence, however, is necessary at the answer and judgment in cases capital (id., 58, 158) as well as not capital. (Id., 162.) The Lords debate the judgment among themselves. Then the vote is first taken on the question of guilty or not guilty; and if they convict, the question or particular sentence is out of that which seemeth to be most generally agreed on. (Seld. Jud., 167; 2 Wood., 612.)

2028. In 1830, during the impeachment trial of Judge Peck, the House reconsidered its decision to attend the trial daily.

Instance of the reconsideration of an order which had been partly executed.

On December 23, 1830,[1] this resolution was agreed to by the House:

Resolved, That, during the trial of the impeachment now pending before the Senate, this House will meet daily at the hour of 11 o'clock in the forenoon, and that from day to day it will resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole and attend said trial during the continuance thereof and until the conclusion of the same.

On the same day the House attended the trial in accordance with the order, and continued to do so as long as it remained in effect.

On December 24[2] Mr. Kensey Johns, jr., of Delaware, moved to reconsider the vote whereby the resolution was agreed to, and the consideration of this motion was postponed to December 27.

On December 27,[3] after consideration, the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

On January 3, 1831,[4] Mr. Johns moved that the House proceed to the consideration of the motion to reconsider,[5] and Mr. Johns's motion was agreed to, yeas 117, nays 58.

A motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table was disagreed to, yeas 55, nays 111.

And the question being put, "Will the House reconsider the same vote?" it was decided in the affirmative.

The question recurring on agreeing to the original resolution of December 23, after debate, on January 4[6] the question was put "that the House do, on reconsideration, agree to pass the same," and it was decided in the negative, yeas 69, nays 118.

The House up to this time had daily attended the impeachment trial. Thereafter it ceased to do so until a new order was adopted.

2029. The House sometimes continues an investigation begun in a preceding Congress with view to an impeachment, making use of the former report and the testimony already taken.

The House may empower a subcommittee to send for persons and papers and conduct an investigation.

On January 30, 1892,[7] Mr. William C. Oates, of Alabama, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported the following preamble and resolution, which were agreed to:

Whereas, Aleck Boarman, judge of the United States district court for the western district of the State of Louisiana, was charged in the House of Representatives of the Fifty-first Congress with high crimes and misdemeanors alleged to have been committeed by him as a judge; and

Whereas, the Committee on the Judiciary, under the authority of said House, investigated the alleged official misconduct in office of the said judge and took a considerable volume of testimony thereon both against said judge and for him, he being present in person or by his counsel whenever and wherever the said testimony was taken; and

Whereas, upon due consideration thereof the said committee reported a resolution to the said House of Representatives declaring that Judge Boarman should be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors in office, and accompanying the said resolution was the evidence upon which the same was based, which was duly printed under the direction of said committee and by order of the House; and

Whereas, the said resolution never came to a vote, and hence never was adopted by said House for the lack of time to duly consider the same; Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the said report, charges, and evidence be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to thoroughly investigate the same and to report to the House the findings and recommendations in regard thereto at any time.

And for the purpose of making the investigation hereby ordered the said Committee on the Judiciary may adopt and use as legal evidence the testimony taken as aforesaid during the Fifty-first Congress in the case of Judge Boarman, and may take and consider any additional and explanatory evidence of a legal character which may be offered either for or against the said judge; and in respect to this investigation the said committee is hereby authorized and empowered to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, take testimony, and to employ a clerk and stenographer, if necessary; to send a subcommittee whenever and wherever deemed necessary to take testimony for the use of said committee, and the said subcommittee while so employed shall have the same powers in respect to obtaining testimony as are herein given to said Committee on the Judiciary; that the Sergeant-at-Arms by himself or deputy shall serve the process of said committee and subcommittee and execute its orders and shall attend the sittings of the same as ordered and directed thereby, and the expenses of said investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

On June 1[1] the committee reported in favor of the impeachment of Judge Boarman.

When managers of an impeachment are elected by ballot, a majority is required for the choice of each.—On December 5, 1804,[4] the House having decided that seven managers should be appointed by ballot to conduct the impeachment of Judge Samuel Chase, the ballot was taken, and the following Members appeared to be duly elected by a majority of the votes of the whole House, as six of the said managers, to wit: Mr. John Randolph, Mr. Rodney, Mr. Nicholson, Mr. Early, Mr. Boyle, and Mr. Nelson.

whole House, but that the highest number of votes was given in favor of Mr. George Washington Campbell.

The Speaker[1] decided that it being provided by a standing rule and order of the House that in case of any second ballot of the House in which the number required to compose a committee should not be elected by a majority of the votes given on the second ballot, a plurality of votes shall prevail, and therefore that in his opinion the said George Washington Campbell was duly elected the seventh manager.

On an appeal this decision was reversed, and a further ballot being taken Mr. Campbell received a majority of votes and was elected.

The Annals show that the Speaker based his decision on the supposition that the rules of the House for choice of committees by ballot was applicable to the choice of managers.

But debate arising the concensus of opinion was that on former occasions a majority of votes had been given for each manager, although in the case of Judge Pickering this appeared rather from the recollection of gentlemen than from the Journals. The Speaker invited the appeal, which was taken by Mr. John Randolph, of Virginia, with expressions of respect.

2032. A Member appointed one of the managers of an impeachment may be excused by the House.—On January 25, 1805,[2] the House excused Mr. Roger Nelson, of Maryland, from serving as one of the managers appointed to conduct the impeachment against Judge Samuel Chase.

2033. The House gives leave to its managers to examine Members as witnesses in an impeachment trial, and leave to its Members to attend for that purpose.—On April 28, 1876,[3] Mr. Scott Lord, of New York, offered this resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the managers have leave to examine any member of the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department and any Member of the House whom they deem necessary as a witness on the trial of the articles of impeachment against William W. Belknap, and that leave is hereby given to Members to attend the trial for that purpose if they see fit to do so.

2034. A resolution empowering managers of an impeachment to take the testimony of Members was presented as a question of privilege.—On April 28, 1876,[4] Mr. Scott Lord, of New York, presented as a question of privilege, and as required by the rule of parliamentary law, the following resolution, which was agreed to without debate:

Resolved, That the managers have leave to examine any member of the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department and any Member of the House whom they deem necessary as a witness on the trial of the articles of impeachment against William W. Belknap, and that leave is hereby given to Members to attend the trial for that purpose if they see fit to do so.

2035. The inability of a manager to attend a session of an impeachment trial is announced by his associates.

No question was made on an occasion during the Swayne trial when less than a quorum of the managers were in attendance.

On February 17, 1905,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, the managers attended, with the exception of Mr. Manager David H. Smith, of Kentucky.

Before proceedings began, Mr. Manager Henry D. Clayton, of Alabama, announced:

Mr. President, Mr. Manager Smith, of Kentucky, has requested me to say to the court that he is unable to attend to-day's session on account of sickness.

2036. On February 20, 1905,[2] the Senate, sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Mr. Manager Marlin E. Olmsted, of Pennsylvania, said:

Mr. President, I desire to announce the unavoidable absence to-day of Managers Palmer, Powers, of Massachusetts; Perkins and Smith, of Kentucky. We shall proceed as best we may in their absence.

No question was made as to the fact that only three of the seven managers—less than a quorum—were in attendance.

2037. The House thanked its managers for their services in the Swayne impeachment trial.—On March 3, 1905,[3] Mr. Swager Sherley, of Kentucky, by unanimous consent, offered this resolution, which was agreed to by the House:

Resolved, That the thanks of the House be, and are hereby, extended to the managers on behalf of the House in the impeachment proceedings of Judge Charles Swayne before the Senate of the United States, to wit, Henry W. Palmer, Samuel L. Powers, Marlin E. Olmsted, James B. Perkins, David A. De Armond, Henry D. Clayton, and David H. Smith, for the able and efficient manner in which they discharged the onerous and responsible duties imposed upon them.

2038. Forms of subpœna and compulsory process issued by House committee to produce persons and papers for Blount impeachment.—In the proceedings for the impeachment of William Blount in 1797–8, the managers of the House of Representatives issued a subpœna in the following form:[4]

To John Rogers, resident in the Cherokee Nation:

Whereas the House of Representatives of the United States did, on the 8th day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven, resolve as follows, to wit:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare and report articles of impeachment against William Blount, a Senator of the United States, impeached by this House, of high crimes and misdemeanors, and that the said committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

"Ordered, That Mr. Sitgreaves, Mr. Baldwin, Mr. Dana, Mr. Dawson, and Mr. Harper be a committee, pursuant to the said resolution."

And whereas the House of Representatives of the United States did, on the 10th day of July, in the year aforesaid, further resolve and order, as follows, to wit:

"Resolved, That the committee appointed to prepare and report articles of impeachment against William Blount, a Senator of the United States, impeached by this House, of high crimes and misdemeanors, be authorized to sit during the recess of Congress.

"Ordered, That Mr. Dana be excused from serving on the committee appointed to prepare and report articles of impeachment against William Blount, a Senator of the United States, and that Mr. Bayard be of the said committee in his stead."

You are hereby required, in pursuance of the powers vested in us, the said committee, by the resolutions and orders aforesaid, that, laying aside all manner of business and excuses whatsoever, you be and appear forthwith, in your proper person, before us, the said committee, at the statehouse, in 2039. In the proceedings for the impeachment of William Blount, in 1797–8, the managers for the House of Representatives issued orders of arrest in form as follows:[1]

UNITED STATES, to wit:

To Capt. William Eaton.

Whereas the House of Representatives of the United States did, on the eighth day of July, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven, come to the following resolution, viz:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare and report articles of impeachment against William Blount, a Senator of the United States, impeached by this House of high crimes and misdemeanors; and that the said committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records."

"Ordered, That Mr. Sitgreaves, Mr. Baldwin, Mr. Dana, Mr. Dawson, and Mr. Harper be a committee pursuant to the said resolution."

You are hereby authorized and required, in pursuance of the said authority vested in us as aforesaid, taking to your assistance such person or persons as you may deem necessary, to make strict and diligent search for Nicholas Romayne, now or late of the State of New York, practitioner of medicine; and him having found, to seize and apprehend, and to bring, together with his papers, in safe custody, before us, the committee aforesaid, at the city of Philadelphia, to be examined touching the premises. And all officers, civil and military, and all faithful citizens of the United States are required to be aiding and assisting to you, as there shall be occasion.

The chairman of the managers also, in connection with the first process, issued instructions as follows:

To Capt. William Eaton.

SIR: You will proceed with the utmost expedition to New York, and, immediately on your arrival, see Mr. Harrison, or such other person as, in case of his absence, you are addressed to. Having advised with such person as to the proper mode of executing your commission, you will proceed, with such assistance as may be deemed necessary, to arrest the person expressed in your warrant, in the most secret manner, and to secure all his papers. Him and his papers you will then convey safely and expeditiously to this place.

When you see the person to be arrested, it will be proper to inform him that the committee is desirous of avoiding all unnecessary publicity, and that, by attending quietly with his papers, it may be prevented. You may let him understand at the same time that hesitation or resistance can have no other effect than to render the affair more disagreeable to him by making it public. On the road he will be treated by you as a fellow-passenger, but carefully attended to, and, above all, the papers are to be most carefully guarded and kept in your own possession.

The same treatment may be observed toward any other person whom, with his papers, it may be resolved to arrest.

Whatever papers are seized you will immediately seal up in the presence of the person to whom they belong, if on the spot, or, if not, in the presence of some other person, and will deliver them sealed to the committee.

It is scarcely necessary to add that the papers most likely to be important will be letters from William Blount, and copies of letters sent to him. Such must be diligently sought and carefully secured.

I am, sir, your most obedient servant,

S. SITGREAVES, Chairman of the Committee.

2040. Form of discharge issued to a witness before the House committee which investigated the impeachment charges against William Blount.—In the proceedings for the impeachment of William Blount, in 1797–8, the managers of the House of Representatives issued a discharge to a witness in form as follows:[2]

These are to certify whom it may concern, that Dr. Nicholas Romayne, of the city of New York, having attended the committee of the House of Representatives of the United States, charged with the impeachment of William Blount, in pursuance of the process by them issued for that purpose, and having undergone such examination, and answered such interrogatories as were required and exhibited by the said committee; and having further entered into bonds for his appearance before the Senate of the United States as a witness on a trial of the said impeachment, has been, and hereby is, discharged by the said committee from any further attendance upon them.

By order of the committee.

2041. Form of subscription of witness to testimony and attestation thereof in examination preliminary to the Peck trial.—The Journal [1] of the Judiciary Committee, which in 1830 examined the charges against James H. Peck, judge of the United States court for the district of Missouri, shows that each witness subscribed to his testimony, which bore this further indorsement:

Sworn and subscribed before the Judiciary Committee on the — March, 1830.
Attest. JAMES BUCHANAN, Chairman.

The same form is found in later investigations.

2042. The House having attended when respondent's answer was read, it was held that the answer might not as of right be read again in the House during consideration of the replication.

The House may take official cognizance of a paper listened to by the Committee of the Whole in attendance on an impeachment trial.

On March 23, 1868,[2] the House was considering the proposed replication to the answer of President Johnson to the articles of impeachment presented against him in the Senate by the House. This answer had been transmitted to the House from the Senate by message.

Mr. John W. Chanler, of New York, rising to a parliamentary inquiry, asked if the answer of the President might be read.

The Speaker [3] said:

The Chair rules that the message from the Senate can be read, but the answer of the President can not be read upon the demand of any Member. * * * When the answer was read in the Senate, the House, in accordance with its own resolution, was in attendance there for the specific purpose of hearing the proceedings. It is therefore to be presumed that every Member of the House was present and heard the answer read.

Mr. Chanler having called attention to the fact that the House attended in Committee of the Whole, the Speaker said:

The Chair overrules the point made by the gentleman on the grounds that the House takes official cognizance of all proceedings in the Committee of the Whole as well as in the House; whether the Speaker or the chairman of the Committee of the Whole presides does not affect the question.

2043. During the Johnson trial the House considered matters pertinent thereto under suspension of the rules.—On March 16, 1868,[4] while proceedings for the impeachment of President Johnson were going on, the House, by suspension of the rules, considered and agreed to the following:

Resolved, That except during the morning hour on Monday the rules may be suspended during the pendency of the impeachment of the President to proceed to the consideration of any matter which may be reported by the managers on the part of the House of Representatives.

2044. Instance wherein the managers consulted the House as to a proposition that an impeachment trial be postponed.

The House having taken no action when consulted as to postponement of an impeachment trial, the managers left the decision to the court.

Instance wherein the managers of an impeachment made a verbal report to the House on a matter arising during the trial.

On June 17, 1876,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Willliam W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Mr. Jeremiah S. Black, of counsel for the respondent, moved "that this cause be now continued until some convenient day in the month of November."

Mr. Manager Scott Lord said:

Mr. President and Senators, under circumstances which I need not now here detail, surrounding this case, the managers have concluded to ask leave on this motion to consult with the House. I will say now that whatever the conference with the House may result in and whatever the determination of the Senate may be we desire that the question of filing this paper shall be disposed of when there is a quorum; but on the question of postponement under all the circumstances in which we find ourselves placed and the case placed we desire leave to confer with the House.

The Senate evidently in order to permit this consultation at once adjourned.

On the same day[2] Mr. Manager Lord made a verbal report to the House of Representatives, and then, on behalf of the managers, proposed this resulution:

Whereas in the impeachment of William W. Belknap the defendant has moved for a continuance now on account of the lateness of the session, with the difficulty which will probably attend the retaining of a full organization of the court and the urgency of other business.

Resolved, That the managers be authorized to consent to a continuance until the — day of November next.

Considerable debate arose over this proposition, there being a manifest feeling that the Senate should assume the responsibility of the decision. Mr. Manager Lord, in response to an inquiry by Mr. Fernando Wood, of New York, said that undoubtedly the Senate, like any other court, had the absolute right to postpone the trial without the assent of the managers for the House, and Mr. Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania, thereupon urged that as they had that power they should exercise it.

Mr. John H. Reagan, of Texas, proposed the following substitute for the proposition of the managers:

Resolved, That upon the information communicated by the managers with reference to the impeachment of W. W. Belknap, the House of Representatives, with renewed assurances of confidence in the managers to whom the conduct of the trial has been committed, authorize them to act upon the subject of their communication as to them shall under all the circumstances of the case seem proper.

A motion for the previous question showed an equal division of the House, the Speaker pro tempore casting the deciding vote on a vote by tellers. A disposition to resort to dilatory proceedings being manifested the House dropped the matter and proceeded to other business.

On the next day, in the Senate sitting for the trial, Mr. Manager Lord said:

Mr. President, in regard to the application of the defendant to adjourn the trial to November next, the managers have reported to the House the proceedings in the court of impeachment on Saturday last; the House has taken no action in the premises, and the managers therefore leave the question of such postponement with the court.

The Senate denied the application for a postponement.

2045. A proposition to impeach a civil officer of the United States is presented as a question of constitutional privilege.—On January 10, 1843,[1] Mr. John M. Botts, of Virginia, as a privileged subject, submitted the following:

I do impeach John Tyler, Vice-President, acting as President of the United States, of the following high crimes and misdemeanors:

First. I charge him with gross usurpation of power and violation of law in attempting to exercise a controlling influence over the accounting officers of the Treasury Department by ordering the payment of accounts of long standing that had been rejected for want of legal authority to pay, etc.

[The arraignment continues at considerable length, there being nine charges in all.]

Mr. Horace Everett, of Vermont, submitted that the proposition of Mr. Botts did not take precedence on the ground of privilege, and therefore was not in order according to the routine of business as established by the rule.

The Speaker[2] decided that as by the Constitution it was a privilege of the House of Representatives to institute proceedings against the President, he considered that the present was a privileged proceeding and should take precedence of all other proceedings.

The record of debates gives the Speaker's explanation for his ruling. He said that since the present Speaker had been in the chair there had been no case of this kind before the House, and only two cases since the beginning of the Government. The first was that of Chief Justice Chase,[3] in which no question like the one now raised was presented. That case was then considered and acted upon by the House as a privileged question. Mr. Randolph rose in his seat, and, without any resolution or specific charges, after some remarks on the conduct of Judge Chase, moved for a committee to take into consideration the propriety of impeaching him. The matter went on day after day, and by the universal acquiescence of the House took preference of all other business as a privileged question. In addition to this the Chair considered this a high constitutional question, paramount to all others, without reference to the rules of the House.[4]

2046. On January 7, 1867,[1] Mr. James M. Ashley, of Ohio, as a question of privilege, submitted the following:

I do impeach Andrew Johnson, Vice-President and Acting President of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors.

I charge him with a usurpation of power and violation of law—

In that he has corruptly used the appointing power;

In that he has corruptly used the pardoning power;

In that he has corruptly used the veto power;

In that he has corruptly disposed of public property of the United States;

[4] The Constitution provides: "The House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment." (Art. I, section 2.)

"The President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors." (Art. II, section 4.)

[5] Second session, Thirty-ninth Congress, Journal, p. 121; Globe, p. 320.

In that he has corruptly interfered in elections, and committed acts which, in contemplation of the Constitution, are high crimes and misdemeanors: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and they are hereby, authorized to inquire into the official conduct of Andrew Johnson, Vice-President of the United States, discharging the powers and duties of the office of President of the United States, and to report to the House whether, in their opinion, the said Andrew Johnson, while in said office, has been guilty of acts which were designed or calculated to overthrow, subvert, or corrupt the Government of the United States, or any Department or officer thereof; and whether the said Andrew Johnson has been guilty of any act, or has conspired with others to do acts, which, in contemplation of the Constitution, are high crimes or misdemeanors, requiring the interposition of the constitutional powers of this House; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers and to administer the customary oaths to witnesses.

Mr. William E. Finck, of Ohio, made a point of order, questioning whether the matter was privileged.

The Speaker [1] ruled that it was privileged, saying that in the Twenty-seventh Congress, by the then Speaker, it was decided, on the point raised by Horace Everett, of Vermont, that it was a question of privilege.[2]

2047. On December 2, 1884,[3] Mr. John F. Follett, of Ohio, submitted as a matter of privilege the following:

I do impeach Lot Wright, United States marshal of the southern district of Ohio, of high crimes and misdemeanors.

I charge him with usurpation of power and violation of law—

In that he appointed a large number of general and special deputy marshals to serve at the several voting precincts in the city of Cincinnati, in the State of Ohio, at an election for Members of Congress held in said city on the 14th day of October, A. D. 1884, and armed said deputy marshals with pistols and other deadly weapons, said to have been furnished by the War Department of the United States Government, etc., * * * Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice be required and directed, as soon as the same can reasonably be done, to investigate such charges and report to this House—

First. How many deputy marshals, general and special, were appointed and authorized by said United States marshal for the southern district of Ohio, etc. * * *

Resolved, That in making such investigation the said committee be empowered to appoint a subcommittee of three, consisting of the chairman of said committee and such other two members thereof as he may select, which subcommittee shall have full power to meet and hold its sessions at such times and places as may seem proper, to send for persons and papers, to compel the attendance of witnesses and to require them to testify, to employ a stenographer, and to incur any and all such necessary and reasonable expenditures as may be deemed requisite for the purposes of such investigation, such expenditures to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. J. Warren Keifer, of Ohio, made the point of order that the resolutions were not in order.

After debate the Speaker [4] said:

The present occupant of the chair decided during the last session of Congress that a mere proposition to investigate the conduct of a public officer, without proposing to impeach him, was not a matter of privilege under the rules of the House or under the Constitution of the United States; and the Chair has seen no reason to change that opinion. But the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. Keifer) is mistaken in his statement that the resolution now offered does not contain a proposition for impeachment. The resolution begins with an impeachment of this officer; and all that follows is a mere specification under the general charge made, together with a direction to a committee to make the investigation usual in such cases. The proceeding corresponds precisely with that adpoted in the Twenty-seventh Congress, when an attempt was made to impeach the then President, John Tyler, and adopted afterwards in the Thirty-ninth Congress, when Mr. Ashley, then a Member from Ohio, rose in his place on the floor, made charges against the then President, Andrew Johnson, and asked for an investigation. * * * It is admitted that the resolution now offered does contain a proposition to impeach a public officer who is impeachable under the Constitution; but it is insisted that it does not present a matter of privilege under the Constitution or rules of the House, because, in the first place, it contains other matter; that is to say, it directs the committee to take certain evidence in the case which it is claimed is not pertinent to the charges made.

It may be, or it may not be, that the resolution does direct the committee to take what the House might afterwards decide to be incompetent evidence upon a charge of this character. But that, of course, is not a question for the Chair to determine. It is the province of the House to decide, when the resolution comes before it, how far it shall direct the committee to proceed in the investigation or as to what charges it shall investigate.

Again, it is objected that this inquiry should be made by the Committee on the Judiciary, and not by the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice. Of course, if a proposition to impeach a public officer should be submitted to the Chair for reference, the Chair, under the rules of the House, would send it to the Committee on the Judiciary; but it is always in the power of the House itself to determine what committee shall conduct an investigation or consider and report upon any matter. So it seems to the Chair that under all of the rulings heretofore made this presents a matter of privilege, and the House can determine for itself how far the committee shall proceed in the investigation, what committee shall have charge of it, and what matters shall be investigated.

2048. On December 10, 1895,[1] Mr. William E. Barrett, of Massachusetts, presented as a question of privilege the following:

I do impeach Thomas F. Bayard, United States ambassador to Great Britain, of high crimes and misdemeanors on the following grounds:

Whereas the following report of a speech, delivered before the Edinburgh Philosophic Institution, by Hon. Thomas F. Bayard, ambassador of the United States of America at the Court of Great Britain, is published in the London News under date of November 8, 1895:

"The opening address of the Edinburgh Philosophic Institution was delivered last night by Mr. Bayard, ambassador of the United States of America, who selected for the subject 'Individual freedom the germ of national progress and permanence.' In his own country, he said, he had witnessed the insatiable growth of that form of State socialism styled 'protection' which he believed had done more to foster class legislation and create inequality of fortune, to corrupt public life, to banish men of independent mind and character from the public councils, to lower the tone of national representation, blunt public conscience, create false standards in the popular mind, to familiarize it with reliance upon State aid and guardianship in private affairs, divorce ethics from politics, and place politics upon the low level of a mercenary scramble than any other single cause," etc. [The extract is quoted at length.]

And whereas such reflections on the Government's policy and people of the United States by an ambassador of the United States to a foreign country and before a foreign audience is manifestly in serious disregard of the proprieties and obligations which should be observed by an official representative of the United States abroad, and calculated to injure our national reputation.

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be directed to ascertain whether such statements have been publicly made; and, if so, to report to the House such action, by impeachment or otherwise, as shall be proper in the premises. For the purpose of this inquiry the committee is authorized to send for persons and papers.

Mr. Charles F. Crisp, of Georgia, made the point of order that this did not constitute a question of privilege.

[1] First session Fifty-fourth Congress, Journal, p. 37; Record, p. 115.

During the debate the precedents of February 4 and December 2, 1884,[1] were cited. The Speaker,[2] in ruling, said:

It seems to the Chair that there is a great distinction between the two cases. The Chair has examined the decision of the Speaker of the House made on the 2d day of December, 1884, and sees no reason why he should not adopt that opinion. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.[3]

2049. Although a report as to an impeachment be laid on the table, the right to move again an impeachment in the same case is not precluded.—On December 6, 1867,[4] the House was considering the report of the Judiciary Committee recommending the impeachment of Andrew Johnson.

Mr. John F. Farnsworth, of Illinois, rising to a parliamentary inquiry, asked whether, if the subject be laid on the table, it would prevent any gentleman from calling it up as a question of privilege and moving the impeachment of the President.

The Speaker[5] said:

If this subject be laid on the table, no gentleman can call up this report. He can propose to impeach the President or any other officer of the Government on any day during the session, and that could be done even though the President should have been impeached and acquitted by the Senate.

2050. A mere proposition to investigate the conduct of a civil officer is not presented as a matter of constitutional privilege, even though impeachment may be contemplated as a possibility.—On February 4, 1884,[6] Mr. William M. Springer, of Illinois, presented the following resolution, claiming it to be a question of privilege:

Resolved, That the petition of Richard W. Webb, and accompanying statement of charges against Samuel B. Axtell, chief justice of the supreme court of the Territory of New Mexico and judge of the first judicial district thereof, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and printed, and that the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire and ascertain whether the allegations * * * be true, * * * and report thereon to the House such action, to be taken by impeachment or otherwise, as they may advise; and in making such examination and investigation the said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. John A. Kasson, of Iowa, made the point that this was not such a question as enabled the memorial to have present consideration. If it were entitled to consideration, one person who might or might not be responsible might spread before the country charges which had not been examined by any committee.

In sustaining the point of order the Speaker[7] said:

The Chair will state that, having looked at the memorial, he finds that it does contain charges against a judge of the United States court in the Territory of New Mexico. Upon that the gentleman from Illinois offers a resolution that the memorial and charges be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary for investigation. The question is made that this is not a matter of privilege. * * * If a Member on the floor should prefer articles of impeachment against a public officer the Chair has no doubt that it would be a privileged matter under the Constitution, because the House possesses the power of impeachment. But this is not a resolution proposing to impeach anyone. It simply instructs the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into the truth or falsity of certain charges made against a public officer in a memorial which has been presented. The inquiry may result in an impeachment or it may not.

2051. A resolution directly proposing impeachment is privileged; but the same is not true of one proposing investigation with a view to impeachment.—On December 2, 1867,[1] Mr. William E. Robinson, of New York, claiming the floor for a question of privilege, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be instructed to inquire into the conduct of William B. West, American consul at Dublin, in Ireland, regrading American prisoners in that city and to report thereon forthwith, to the end that if he has been guilty of conduct which would be liable to impeachment this House may take measures to have articles of impeachment presented to the Senate.

Mr. John F. Farnsworth, of Illinois, made the point of order that this did not involve a question of privilege.

The Speaker[2] said:

The gentleman from Illinois rises to a question of order, that as the resolution does not positively propose impeachment of this consul it is not a question of privilege. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Thereupon Mr. Robinson modified his resolution to read as follows:

Resolved, That William B. West, consul of the United States at Dublin, Ireland, be impeached before the Senate.

The Speaker said:

That is a question of privilege, and can be introduced for reference or action.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

2052. On November 21, 1867,[3] Mr. William E. Robinson, of New York, as a question of privilege, submitted the following resolution:

Whereas Charles Francis Adams, United States minister to Great Britain, has been charged with neglect of duty toward American citizens in England and Ireland by failing to secure their rights as such citizens: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be instructed to inquire into the foregoing charge and to report thereon forthwith, to the end that, if the charge be true, articles of impeachment against said Charles Francis Adams may be presented by this House to the Senate of the United States; that the President of the United States be requested to telegraph to the said Charles Francis Adams immediately to demand his passports and to return home; that the Secretary of State be instructed to communicate to this House all correspondence to and from the Department for the two years last past on the arrest, imprisonment, trial, or conviction of any American citizen, or any person claiming to be such, in Great Britain and Ireland, without reference to its public effect, to be considered, if need be, in secret session of this House.

The resolution having been read, the Speaker[4] said:

The Chair rules that this resolution is a question of privilege, as it proposes an impeachment of an officer of the Government.

2053. Impeachment is a question of constitutional privilege which may be presented at any time irrespective of previous action of the House.—On March 3, 1879,[1] the regular order of business was the report of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department proposing articles of impeachment against George F. Seward, late consul-general at Shanghai, China, and now minister plenipotentiary to China.

Mr. Omar D. Conger, of Michigan, made the point of order that the House having referred the subject-matter of the investigation of charges against Mr. Seward to the Committee on the Judiciary it was not in order for the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department to take further action on the case.

The Speaker[2] overruled the point of order on the ground that the subject referred to the Committee on the Judiciary was the answer of the said Seward in response to the order of the House requiring him to show cause why he should not be declared in contempt of the House, and also on the further ground that the question of impeachment was one of constitutional privilege which could be raised or presented at any time by any Member of the House.

2054. A resolution for discontinuing impeachment proceedings, but not respectful to the House, was ruled not to be privileged.—On May 18, 1868,[3] Mr. Alexander H. Jones, of North Carolina, offered as involving a question of privilege, the following:

Whereas this House did in bad judgment and hot haste pass a resolution and articles of impeachment against Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, and appointed managers to conduct the suit before the high court of the Senate; and whereas it has been abundantly proven that there was no cause or plausible pretext for the same; and whereas the Senate and the country labor under great excitement and embarrassment: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That said managers be instructed forthwith to withdraw said suit, that the House may be redeemed, the Senate relieved, and the country given repose.

Mr. Elihu Washburne, of Illinois, having objected, the Speaker[4] held:

The Chair will rule on the question. He thinks this is not a question of privilege. The preamble contains a reflection on the House. It is unparliamentary on the part of any Member to reflect upon the action of the House in the language used in the preamble. * * * It is not a parliamentary preamble and resolution for the consideration of the House, not being respectful in its terms to the House.

FUNCTION OF THE SENATE IN IMPEACHMENT.

1. Provision of the Constitution. Section 2055.[1]
2. English precedents as to function of House of Lords. Section 2056.[2]
3. Does the Senate sit as a court. Sections 2057, 2058.[3]

7. The quorum. Section 2063.
8. Relations to the House. Section 2064.
9. The presiding officer. Sections 2065, 2067.[4]
10. Duration of trial. Section 2068.

2055. The sole power of trying impeachments is conferred on the Senate by the Constitution.

Senators sitting for an impeachment trial are required by the Constitution to be on oath or affirmation.

The Constitution requires the Chief Justice to preside when the President of the United States is tried before the Senate.

"Two-thirds of the Members present" are required by the Constitution for conviction on impeachment.

The Constitution limits judgment in impeachment cases to removal from office and disqualification to hold office.

A person convicted in an impeachment trial is still liable, under the Constitution, to the punishment of the courts of law.

The Constitution, in Article I, section 3, provides:

The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. When sitting for that purpose, they shall be on oath or affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside; and no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the Members present.

Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States. But the party convicted shall, nevertheless, be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law.

2056. Under the parliamentary law the Lords are the judges and may not impeach or join in the accusation.

The Lords may not, under the parliamentary law, proceed by impeachment against a Commoner, except on complaint of the Commons.

Provisions of parliamentary law as to trial by impeachment of a Commoner for a capital offense.

In Chapter LIII, of Jefferson's Manual, the following is given in the "sketch of some of the principles and practices of England" on the subject of impeachments:

Jurisdiction. The Lords can not impeach any to themselves, nor join in the accusation, because they are the judges. (Seld. Judic. in Parl., 12, 63.) Nor can they proceed against a Commoner but on complaint of the Commons. (Ib., 84.) The Lords may not, by the law, try a Commoner for a capital offense, on the information of the King or a private person, because the accused is entitled to a trial by his peers generally; but on accusation by the House of Commons they may proceed against the delinquent, of whatsoever degree and whatsoever be the nature of the offense; for there they do not assume to themselves trial at common law. The Commons are then instead of a jury, and the judgment is given on their demand, which is instead of a verdict. So the Lords do only judge, but not try the delinquent. (Ib., 6, 7.) But Wooddeson denies that a Commoner can now be charged capitally before the Lords, even by the Commons, and cites Fitzharris's case, 1681, impeached for high treason, where the lords remitted the prosecution to the inferior court. (8 Grey's Deb., 325–327; 2 Wooddeson, 576, 601; 3 Seld., 1604, 1610, 1618, 1619, 1641; 4 Blackst., 25; 9 Seld., 1656; 73 Seld.,1604–1618.)

2057. In 1868, after mature consideration, the Senate decided that it sat for impeachment trials as the Senate and not as a court.

An anxiety lest the Chief Justice might have a vote seems to have led the Senate to drop the words "high court of impeachment" from its rules.

The Senate, as a Senate and not as a court, adopted rules for the Johnson trial; but on the insistence of the Chief Justice adopted them when organized for the trial.

In the Johnson trial the articles of impeachment were presented before the Chief Justice had taken his seat, although he had filed his written dissent from such procedure.

Written dissent of the Chief Justice from views taken by the Senate as to its constitutional functions in an impeachment trial.

Enunciation of Mr. Senator Sumner's theory that the Senate was not a court and the Senators were not constrained by the obligations of judges in an impeachment trial.

On February 29, 1868,[1] the Senate, in its legislative capacity and before its organization for impeachment proceedings, began the consideration of a series of rules reported[1] by a select committee composed of Messrs. Jacob M. Howard, of Michigan; Lyman Trumbull, of Illinois; Roscoe Conkling, of New York; George F. Edmunds, of Vermont; Oliver P. Morton, of Indiana; Stephen C. Pomeroy, of Kansas, and Reverdy Johnson, of Maryland. The caption of this report was "Rules of Procedure and Practice in the Senate when Sitting as a High Court of Impeachment." At the outset of the discussion[2] Mr. Thomas A. Hendricks, of Indiana, made the objection that the rules not only proposed the method for organizing the Senate into a court, but also proposed regulations for the court itself. He conceived that it was not proper for the Senate as such to adopt rules to control the action of the court upon any question whatever that might become material during the trial.

During the discussion of the rules themselves, Mr. Oliver P. Morton, of Indiana, acting upon suggestions received since he had concurred in the report, called attention[3] to the use of the words "high court of impeachment" in Rules III and IV as submitted:

> They both used language which may, perhaps, lead to trouble, and give rise to a different theory in regard to the character of the body that is to try this impeachment. It is provided that the Senate shall resolve itself into a high court of impeachment. Is there any authority in the Constitution for that, or is there any propriety in it? Is not this impeachment to be tried simply by the Senate of the United States? While the Senate is engaged in the trial, does it lose the character of the Senate and become a court? If we shall allow ourselves to contemplate that idea, may it not lead to consequences that we do not desire, and to difficulties? The Constitution seems to contemplate that this impeachment shall be tried by the Senate. It says: "The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments;" and "when sitting"—that is, the Senate, when sitting—"for that purpose they shall be on oath or affirmation." That is all that is required, that the Senate, when sitting for that purpose, shall be on oath or affirmation. But we are here proposing to resolve ourselves into another character; we are to cease to be a Senate and become a court. If we follow out that theory, there may be many little consequences attaching to it before we get done with it that we do not anticipate. Why not preserve the simple idea that this impeachment is to be tried by the Senate of the United States as the Senate and nothing else? What use have we got for the phraseology "resolving itself into a high court of impeachment?" I object to the use of the word "high," in that connection, anyhow. But the argument made by my colleague suggests that the theory which we thus seem to recognize may involve other consequences that we do not now contemplate; and although I assented to these rules, and would regret now to find fault, yet it occurs to me, from the suggestion made and from looking at the Constitution itself, that this impeachment, after all, is to be tried simply by the Senate of the United States.

Debate at once arose[4] and there was a citation of precedents to show that in former impeachment trials the words "high court of impeachment" had been used, although Mr. Conkling argued that these words had been used rather by the Secretary in recording the proceedings than by the Senate itself.

Mr. Orris S. Ferry, of Connecticut, moved to strike out the word "high," and announced that if that should be agreed to, he would propose further amendments with the object of removing the idea that the Senate was in such proceedings a distinct court.

Mr. Ferry's motion was disagreed to,[5] yeas 16, nays 21.

The question was not settled by this vote, however, but recurred again and again. On March 2[1] Mr. Hendricks proposed an additional rule, as follows:

When the Senate sits as a high court of impeachment in a case in which the Chief Justice must preside, such of the foregoing rules as apply to the trial shall be considered and adopted by the court before they shall have force.

In support of his motion Mr. Hendricks argued:

I am not able to see that there ought to be a doubt on this question. If the Chief Justice must preside when the Senate shall try the case, he ought to preside when the Senate decides how it will try the case, what forms of proceeding shall be observed, what rights shall be secured to counsel, what rights shall be reserved to Senators. Many of these rules are exceedingly important.

* * * If the Constitution provides that the Chief Justice must preside here, and that this must be a court with the Chief Justice as the presiding officer when the trial takes place, ought we not to decide how the case shall be tried when he is in his seat? In a case where the Chief Justice must preside, is it proper that the Senate, in his absence, when the Vice-President or President pro tempore is occupying the chair, who may succeed in case the impeachment is successful—is it right with that organization of the Senate to prescribe the rules which shall govern the court which the Constitution itself provides for?

* * * These rules, among other things, confer upon the Chief Justice presiding the power to decide certain questions, questions of the admissibility of evidence. These may be very important. It is conferring upon him a power which he would not possess in the absence of the rule. Now, that is a power which he is to exercise in the court, which we confer upon him when not organized into the court and not under oath.

In reply Mr. Timothy O. Howe, of Wisconsin, suggested that the Chief Justice would have no vote in adopting the rules, and as to his decisions on the admissibility of evidence, he said:

We confer that power upon him in pursuance of the authority of the Senate to make rules for its government in any particular in which the Senate may be called upon to act, as the Constitution says we may. Now, in any possible contingency, if we have the authority at any time to confer the power mentioned in the seventh rule upon the presiding officer, does it make any possible difference whether we do it to-day or to-morrow, whether we do it when the Chief Justice is here or when he is absent. If I could see that it did, I might hesitate upon the point; but as the same identical individuals are to do the thing whenever it is done, I can not for my life see what difference it can make whether it is done on one day or another.

The amendment proposed by Mr. Hendricks was disagreed to without division.

Immediately thereafter[2] Rule XXIV was read, prescribing forms for subpœnas of witnesses and of the summons to the person impeached. In these forms occurred the words "Senate of the United States, sitting as a high court of impeachment." Mr. Conkling moved to strike out the words "sitting as a high court of impeachment" wherever they occurred.

This motion was agreed to without very extended debate, Mr. Conkling stating that if his amendment should be adopted it would restore the forms to what they were in the trials of 1804, 1830, and 1862. Mr. Edmunds explained that the words objected to had been introduced to get a form applicable to all conditions, whether the Chief Justice, a Vice-President, or a President pro tempore should preside.

Mr. Conkling's motion was agreed to, yeas 23, nays 12. This was not, however, regarded as very significant on the question as to the nature of the court. Mr.

[1] Senate Journal, p. 244; Globe, pp. 1589, 1590.

[2] Senate Journal, p. 246; Globe, pp. 1591, 1592.

John Sherman, of Ohio, who voted for the motion, but championed the idea that the words high court should be retained as descriptive of the body, said that he did not consider it necessary, in summoning a witness, to inform him that the Senate was sitting as a high court of impeachment.

But on Rule XXV Mr. Conkling brought the question to issue[1] by moving an amendment which struck out the word "court."

Mr. Sherman said:

That this Senate is a court when it proceeds to try a case I think it does not need any very long speech to prove. We examine witnesses; we convict or acquit; we try a case; we are sworn; and if there is any element of a trial or any idea of a court that does not enter into our organization I do not know what it can be.

Mr. Conkling said:

The Constitution says that the Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. It does not say that the Senate shall become a court ex officio; it does not say that there shall be a high court for the trial of impeachment, to be composed of the Senate and of the Chief Justice sitting ex officio. It says nothing of that kind, but simply that the Senate shall try all impeachments. Why not leave it there? If it is a court we do not destroy that character by omitting these superfluities from our rules. If it is not a court we do not clothe it with the ermine or the attributes of a court by putting in the rules that it is so

Then why not take the thing precisely as we find it?

Mr. Edmunds said:

It is a matter of some regret to me and to those of us who differed from my friend from New York in committee, where we thought we had settled the matter, that he is not willing to take the decision of the Senate on Saturday, when we were pretty full, upon this very question, instead of bringing it up again now, after we have gone through with this whole thing. Of course he is perfectly justified in doing so if he thinks the importance of it demands that course on his part; but I am a little afraid that his fear of the canal board in his State being turned into a court has led him to be a little touchy on this subject

On Saturday, it will be remembered, this very question was debated at great length, not an unnecessary length, but every gentleman expressed his views who chose to do so, and gave his reasons for them, and the precedents were referred to; and then upon the yeas and nays on the question of striking out the word "high" (in connection with which it was expressly stated by the Senator from Connecticut that if he succeeded in that he should follow it by the other motions which would leave the description of the body to be simply "the Senate," because it would be easier to get an affirmative vote upon striking out a word, which was, of course, a mere matter of form, than it would upon the whole) the proposition was voted down, and voted down upon a reference to the precedents.

I hold in my hand the Globe, showing those proceedings; and the first was the trial of Blount, in 1798, in which—I ask the attention of the Senator from New York to it—the formal resolution—not the entry of the Secretary, but the resolution of the Senate as offered and adopted—was "resolved, that at the next opening of the court of impeachment the president" shall do so and so. Then, when we come to the trial of Chase, which was referred to also in some parts of the proceedings, the expression "court of impeachment" appears only to be the entry of the Secretary, but in other parts of the proceedings it appears to be the judgment of the Senate itself. Then, when we come to the trial of Peck, on the question of the Senate's taking upon itself a judicial capacity the formal resolution offered on the part of the committee appointed by the Senate to report rules in that case was:

"Resolved, That at 12 o'clock to-morrow the Senate will resolve itself into a court of impeachment."[2]

So that we find ourselves from the beginning, in 1798, down to this time—and the case of Humphreys in 1862 is just the same—having adopted this phraseology as describing the Senate, when it was exercising this function, as sitting as a court, saying nothing now about the word "high." Then where is the use, after all the discussion we have had on this point and one decision of it in the face of these uniform precedents from the beginning to this time, of turning our faces back and oversetting the whole theory upon which these rules go?

[1] Senate Journal, p. 246; Globe, pp. 1593–1594. There is a discrepancy between the Journal and Globe, but the debate shows that the Globe must be correct.

Mr. Ferry said:

Whether the Senate, sitting for the trial of impeachments, be a court or not in ordinary language, whether that term as ordinarily used may properly enough be applied to it is one thing. Whether the Constitution calls it a court and designates it as a court is another thing. If that tribunal be a court according to the Constitution, I would like to have Senators who desire to retain this phraseology point out to me a statute on the face of the earth designating the presiding officer of the court in which a presiding officer has not somewhat more functions than Senators seem to be willing to attribute to the presiding officer of this court of impeachment. And I feel thus because I wish to preserve simply to the Senate—not in relation to this particular case; I care nothing about it in this particular case one way or the other—but to preserve to the Senate, and the Members of the Senate only, their constitutional functions without interference from outside. As I suggested before, it is not worth while for me to go over the argument again, because, using this language in the rules which we are prescribing, we ourselves prejudge the question and estop ourselves. As it seems to me, by declaring that the Constitution makes this tribunal a court in the legal, constitutional signification of the term, we estop ourselves from claiming that none other than a Senator is a member of that court.[1]

To this Mr. Edmunds retorted:

I ask him if he does not know that the House of Lords in England from time immemorial has always been called the high court of Parliament; and if he does not know that in proceedings in impeachment in that court the lord chancellor or lord high steward, the president of the court, has no vote unless he be a member of that court by being a peer, by the constant practice and frequent decision of that body?

Mr. Conkling's motion was then agreed to—yeas 16, nays 13.

Then the rules were generally amended, on motion of Mr. Ferry, in such a way as to remove the word "court" or "high court of impeachment" wherever occurring,[2] and were agreed to.

On March 4[3] the Senate met, and the President pro tempore laid before them the following communication:

To the Senate of the United States:

Inasmuch as the sole power to try impeachments is vested by the Constitution in the Senate, and it is made the duty of the Chief Justice to preside when the President is on trial, I take the liberty of submitting, very respectfully, some observations in respect to the proper mode of proceeding upon the impeachment which has been preferred by the House of Representatives against the President now in office.

That when the Senate sits for the trial of an impeachment it sits as a court seems unquestionable.

That for the trial of an impeachment of the President, this court must be constituted of the Members of the Senate, with the Chief Justice presiding, seems equally unquestionable.

The Federalist is regarded as the highest contemporary authority on the construction of the Constitution; and in the sixty-fourth number the functions of the Senate "sitting in their judicial capacity as a court for the trial of impeachments" are examined.

In a paragraph explaining the reasons for not uniting "the Supreme Court with the Senate in the formation of the court of impeachments" it is observed that "to a certain extent the benefits of that

[1] The discussion as to whether the Chief Justice would have a vote in the proceedings had already taken place (Globe, pp. 1585–1588) and had suggested the allied question of the nature of the Senate in this function.

[2] Senate Journal, p. 248; Globe, p. 1602.

[3] Senate Journal, pp. 798–800; Globe, p. 1644.

union will be obtained from making the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court the president of the court of impeachments, as is proposed in the plan of the convention, while the inconveniences of an entire incorporation of the former into the latter will be substantially avoided. This was, perhaps, the prudent mean."

This authority seems to leave no doubt upon either of the propositions just stated. And the statement of them will serve to introduce the question upon which I think it my duty to state the result of my reflections to the Senate, namely, at what period, in the case of an impeachment of the President, should the court of impeachment be organized under oath as directed by the Constitution?

It will readily suggest itself to anyone who reflects upon the abilities and the learning in the law which distinguish so many Senators that besides the reason assigned in the Federalist there must have been still another for the provision requiring the Chief Justice to preside in the court of impeachment. Under the Constitution, in case of a vacancy in the office of President, the Vice President succeeds; and it was doubtless thought prudent and befitting that the next in succession should not preside in a proceeding through which a vacancy might be created.

It is not doubted that the Senate, while sitting in its ordinary capacity, must necessarily receive from the House of Representatives some notice of its intention to impeach the President at its bar; but it does not seem to me an unwarranted opinion, in view of this constitutional provision, that the organization of the Senate as a court of impeachment, under the Constitution, should precede the actual announcement of the impeachment on the part of the House.

And it may perhaps be thought a still less unwarranted opinion that articles of impeachment should only be presented to a court of impeachment; that no summons or other process should issue except from the organized court, and that rules for the government of the proceedings of such a court should be framed only by the court itself.

I have found myself unable to come to any other conclusions than these. I can assign no reason for requiring the Senate to organize as a court under any other than its ordinary presiding officer for the later proceedings upon an impeachment of the President which does not seem to me to apply equally to the earlier.

I am informed that the Senate has proceeded upon other views; and it is not my purpose to contest what its superior wisdom may have directed.

All good citizens will fervently pray that no occasion may ever arise when the grave proceedings now in progress will be cited as a precedent; but it is not impossible that such an occasion may come.

Inasmuch, therefore, as the Constitution has charged the Chief Justice with an important function in the trial of an impeachment of the President, it has seemed to me fitting and obligatory, where he is unable to concur in the views of the Senate concerning matters essential to the trial, that his respectful dissent should appear.

S. P. CHASE,
Chief Justice of the United States.

WASHINGTON, March 4, 1868.

This letter was referred to the select committee of which Mr. Howard was chairman.

Soon thereafter the managers presented themselves with the articles of impeachment, and delivered them to the Senate, the President pro tempore presiding.[1]

Then,[2] after the intervention of legislative business, the Senate agreed to the necessary resolutions for notifying the House of Representatives and the Chief Justice that on the following day " the Senate will proceed to consider the impeachment of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States," etc.

A resolution providing that a printed copy of the rules be furnished to the House of Representatives was agreed to, although Mr. Charles R. Buckalew, of Pennsylvania, objected that this should not be done until after the court had been organized and had determined on rules.

On March 6,[1] after the organization for the trial of the articles of impeachment, the Chief Justice said, before putting the question on a resolution notifying the House of Representatives of the organization:

The Chair feels it his duty to submit a question to the Senate relative to the rules of proceeding. In the judgment of the Chief Justice the Senate is now organized as a distinct body from the Senate sitting in its legislative capacity. It performs a distinct function; the members are under a different oath; and the presiding officer is not the President pro tempore of the Senate, but the Chief Justice of the United States. Under these circumstances, the Chair conceives that rules adopted by the Senate in its legislative capacity are not rules for the government of the Senate sitting for the trial of an impeachment unless they be also adopted by that body. In this judgment of the Chair, if it be an erroneous one, he desires to be corrected by the judgment of the court, or of the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment of the President, which in his judgment are synonymous terms, and therefore, if he may be permitted to do so, he will take the sense of the Senate upon this question, whether the rules adopted on the 2d of March, a copy of which is now lying before him, shall be considered the rules of proceeding in this body. ["Question!"] Senators, you who think that the rules of proceeding adopted on the 2d of March should be considered as the rules of proceeding of this body will say "ay;" contrary opinion, "no." [The Senators having answered.] The ayes have it by the sound. The rules will be considered as the rules of proceeding in this body.

The journal of the Senate, in referring to proceedings in the trial, also refrains from the use of the words "high court of impeachment."[2]

The Chief Justice, however, in opening the daily sittings, directed the Sergeant-at-Arms to "open the court by proclamation."[3]

The answer of the President was also addressed to the "Senate of the United States, sitting as a court of impeachment."[4]

On June 3, 1868,[5] after the trial of the President had been concluded, Mr. Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts, presented to the Senate the following resolutions declaring the constitutional responsibility of Senators for their votes on impeachment:

Whereas a pretension has been put forth to the effect that the vote of a Senator on an impeachment is so far different in character from his vote on any other question that the people have no right to criticise or consider it; and whereas such pretension, if not discountenanced, is calculated to impair that freedom of judgment which belongs to the people on all that is done by their Representatives: Therefore, in order to remove all doubts on this question and to declare the constitutional right of the people in cases of impeachment—

1. Resolved, That, even assuming that the Senate is a court in the exercise of judicial power, Senators can not claim that their votes are exempt from the judgment of the people; that the Supreme Court, when it has undertaken to act on questions essentially political in character, has not escaped this judgment; that the decisions of this high tribunal in support of slavery have been openly condemned; that the memorable utterance known as the Dred Scott decision was indignantly denounced and repudiated, while the Chief Justice who pronounced it became a mark for censure and rebuke; and that plainly the votes of Senators on an impeachment can not enjoy an immunity from popular judgment which has been denied to the Supreme Court, with Taney as Chief Justice.

2. Resolved, That the Senate is not at any time a court invested with judicial power, but that it is always a Senate with specific functions, declared by the Constitution; that according to express words, "the judicial power of the United States is vested in one Supreme Court and such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time ordain and establish," while it is further provided that "the Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments," thus positively making a distinction between the judicial power and the power to try impeachments; that the Senate on an impeachment does not exercise any portion of the judicial power, but another and different power, exclusively delegated to the Senate, having for its sole object removal from office and disqualification therefor; that, by the terms of the Constitution, there may be, after conviction on impeachment, a further trial and punishment "according to law," thus making a discrimination between a proceeding by impeachment and a proceeding "according to law;" that the proceeding by impeachment is not "according to law," and is not attended by legal punishment, but is of an opposite character, and from beginning to end political, being instituted by a political body, on account of political offenses, being conducted before another political body having political power only, and ending in a judgment which is political only; and therefore the vote of a Senator on impeachment, though different in form, is not different in responsibility from his vote on any other political question; nor can any Senator on such an occasion claim immunity from that just accountability which the Representative at all times owes to his constituents.

3. Resolved, That Senators in all that they do are under the constant obligation of an oath, binding them to the strictest rectitude; that on an impeachment they take a further oath, according to the requirement of the Constitution, which says, "Senators, when sitting to try impeachment, shall be on oath or affirmation;" that this simple requirement was never intended to change the character of the Senate as a political body and can not have any such operation; and therefore, Senators, whether before or after the supplementary oath, are equally responsible to the people for their votes, it being the constitutional right of the people at all times to sit in judgment on their Representatives.

It does not appear that this resolution was ever acted on.

2058. During the Johnson trial the functions of the Senate sitting for an impeachment trial were discussed by managers and counsel for respondent.—In the course of the arguments during the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, the question as to whether or not the Senate sitting for the trial had the attributes of a court was discussed at length. Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts, argued[1] that it did not. Of the Senators who filed written opinions, Mr. Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts, sustained at length the view that impeachment was a political and not a judicial proceeding.[2]

Mr. Benjamin R. Curtis, of Massachusetts, of counsel for the President, argued that the Senate was a court,[3] and Mr. Thomas A. R. Nelson, of Tennessee, also of counsel for the President, took the same view, arguing at length,[4] as did Mr. William S. Groesbeck, of Ohio, also of counsel for the President.[5] Mr. William M. Evarts, of counsel for the President, argued from both English and American precedents, that the Senate sat as a court.[6] Of the Senators who filed written opinions in the case, this view was sustained by Mr. Garrett Davis, of Kentucky.[7]

2059. The Senate, by majority vote, assumed jurisdiction to try the Belknap impeachment, although protest was made that a two-thirds vote was required.—On June 6, 1876,[8] in the Senate, sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Mr. Jeremiah S. Black, of counsel for the respondent, presented the following:

Senate of the United States sitting as a court of impeachment.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA v. WILLIAM W. BELKNAP.

Here in court comes the said William W. Belknap and moves the court now here to vacate the order entered of record in this cause setting aside and holding as naught the plea of him, said Belknap, by him first above in this cause pleaded, for the reason that said order was not passed with the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senators present and voting upon the question of adopting and passing said order, as appears by the record in this cause.

WILLIAM W. BELKNAP.
J. S. BLACK,
MONTGOMERY BLAIR,
MATT. H. CARPENTER,
Of Counsel.

The plea referred to was that the Senate had no jurisdiction to try the case, since Mr. Belknap had resigned before the impeachment was made.

At the previous sitting, on June 1, Mr. Carpenter had said:[1]

Speaking for myself only (not having consulted with my colleagues), I maintain that upon the whole record the order is void, for the reason that it was not concurred in by two-thirds of the Senators present and voting. Suppose a case in the Supreme Court, where only a majority of the judges need concur in the judgment; and suppose the record to show that only four judges concurred in the judgment while five dissented, but the minority directed the clerk to enter the judgment or order as the act of the court, and he should do so and certify it as such under the seal of the court. It is manifest, I think, that such judgment, if the dissent of the majority appeared of record, would be absolutely void, and would be so declared by any court where the judgment should come in question collaterally. I think this judgment is in the same category.

* * * * * * *

That we can raise these questions on a final hearing, is clear, because it can not be maintained that any question upon which conviction depends can be eliminated from such final determination by the action of less than the constitutional majority of two-thirds. Otherwise a mere majority of the Senate might defeat the constitutional provision.

In these cases of impeachment, if a mere majority can settle the question of jurisdiction, so a mere majority, by overruling a demurrer to the articles, can determine that the acts alleged to have been done or omitted by the respondent constitute in law a high crime or misdemeanor within the meaning of the Constitution; leaving the final judgment to rest only upon questions of fact or at the final hearing, none of these questions having been disposed of, some master tactician might first move a resolution declaring that the respondent had done or omitted the acts charged, and if sustained by a mere majority, might claim that the facts were settled, and that the final judgment must rest upon the question of law whether such facts amounted to a high crime or misdemeanor.

In briefer and plainer terms, no conviction can take place under this provision of the Constitution, unless two-thirds of the Senators concur in regard to every element necessary to conviction, and first and conspicuous among these, must be the question of jurisdiction.

Mr. Manager Scott Lord had said:[2]

On the point which the counsel has suggested, practically that a two-thirds vote is necessary on the question of jurisdiction, that Senators who voted that this court had not jurisdiction must therefore on the final vote, when the question is put, "Did this defendant take $1,500 on a given occasion and for such a purpose?" say "Not guilty," because of their views in regard to jurisdiction—on this point I say we shall be prepared to show that there is nothing whatever in the suggestion; in fact, that the whole practice of courts of impeachment has been in contravention of it; that the Constitution itself prevents any such possibility. Therefore when this question is raised in some proper form we shall desire to be heard upon it.

[1] Record of trial, pp. 159, 161.

[2] Pages 159, 160

Mr. Allen G. Thurman, a Senator from Ohio, said:[1]

That question can be argued on the motion submitted by the counsel for the respondent. I suppose it can be argued at almost any time or in any way. In my judgment it never can be decided until we come to the final decision, but it can be argued on the motion submitted; although I think it is pretty clear, for reasons that I am not at liberty to state now, that it can not be decided on any such motion as that submitted by the counsel.

And Mr. Black, of counsel for the respondent, concurred:

I will say now that, so far as I can see, the statement of the law upon this point as made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Thurman] is what meets with my view. I have not had time to consult with the other counsel in the case and do not know how they feel about it; but I think, whatever may be done with this motion or whenever it may be argued, it can not really be directly decided until the final determination of the case, and that we ought to have, therefore, the privilege of arguing the point at any time. It is a question that arises and will arise at every step of this case as we go on.

Mr. William Pinkney Whyte, a Senator from Maryland, proposed this order:

Ordered, That the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment adjourn until to-morrow at one o'clock p. m., when argument shall be heard upon the motion offered by the counsel for the respondent.

The order was disagreed to, yeas 18, nays 23.

On June 16[2] Mr. Black, of counsel for the respondent, presented the following paper:

In the Senate of the United States sitting as a court of impeachment.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA v. WILLIAM W. BELKNAP.

And now, to wit, this 16th day of June, 1876, the said William W. Belknap comes into court, and being called upon to plead further to the said articles of impeachment, doth most humbly and with profoundest respect represent and show to this honorable court that on the 17th day of April last past he did plead to the said articles of impeachment, and in his said plea did allege that at the time when the House of Representatives of the United States ordered the said impeachment, and at the time when the said articles of impeachment were exhibited at the bar of the Senate against him, the said Belknap, he, the said Belknap, was and ever thereafter had been not a public officer of the United States, but a private citizen of the United States and of the State of Iowa; and that the plea aforesaid and all the matters and things therein contained were by him, said Belknap, fully verified by proofs, namely, by admissions of the said House of Representatives before said court; and the said Belknap further represents and shows to the court here that the truth and sufficiency of the plea pleaded by him as aforesaid were thereupon debated by the managers of the said House of Representatives and the counsel of this respondent, and thereupon submitted to this court for its determination and judgment thereon; and that such proceedings were thereupon had in this court on that behalf in this cause; that afterwards, to wit, on the 29th day of May last past, the members of this court, to wit, the Senators of the United States sitting as a court of impeachment as aforesaid, did severally deliver their several judgments, opinions, and votes on the truth and sufficiency in law of the said plea, when and whereby it was made duly to appear that only thirty-seven Senators concurred in pronouncing said plea insufficient or untrue; whereas twenty-nine Senators sitting in said court, by their opinions and votes, affirmed and declared their opinion to be that said plea was sufficient in law and true in point of law; so that the said Belknap in fact saith that, on the day and year last aforesaid, twenty-nine Senators sitting in said court declared therein that the said Belknap having ceased to be a public officer of the United States by reason of his resignation of the office of Secretary of War of the United States before proceedings in impeachment were commenced against him by the House of Representatives of the United States, the Senate cannot take jurisdiction of this cause; and that seven Senators did not vote upon said question, and only thirty-seven Senators, by their votes, declared their opinion to be that the Senate could take jurisdiction of said cause. And afterwards thirty-seven Senators sitting in said court, and no more, concurred in a resolution declaring that "in the opinion of the Senate William W. Belknap is amenable to trial on impeachment for acts done as Secretary of War, notwithstanding his resignation of said office," and that twenty-nine of said Senators sitting in said court, by their votes, affirmed and declared their opinion to be to the contrary thereof. And afterwards, on the day and year last aforesaid, it was proposed in said court that the President pro tempore of the said Senate should declare the judgment of the said Senate, sitting as aforesaid, to be that said plea of said respondent should be held for naught, and a vote was taken upon said proposition; and, as said vote showed, two-thirds of the said Senators present did not concur therein; but, on the contrary thereof, only thirty-six Senators did concur therein, and twenty-seven Senators then and there present, and voting on said proposition, did by their votes dissent from and vote against said proposition. All of which appears more fully and at large upon the record of this court in this cause, to which record he, said Belknap, prays leave to refer.

Therefore the said Belknap, referring to the Constitution of the United States, article 1, section 3, clause 6, which provides that "no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present," (meaning on trial on impeachment,) avers that his said plea has not been overruled or held for naught by the Senate sitting as aforesaid, no such judgment having been concurred in by two-thirds of the Senators sitting in said court and voting thereon; but, on the contrary thereof, as the vote aforesaid fully shows, the said plea of the said respondent was sustained, and its truth in fact and sufficiency in law duly affirmed by the said Senate sitting as aforesaid, more than one-third of the Senators of said Senate, sitting as aforesaid, having by their votes so declared, to wit, twenty-seven Senators as aforesaid, and said twenty-seven Senators having by their votes declared and affirmed their opinion to be that said plea of said respondent was true in fact and was sufficient in law to prevent the Senate sitting as aforesaid from taking further cognizance of said articles of impeachment.

Wherefore the respondent avers that he has already been substantially acquitted by the Senate sitting as aforesaid; and that he, the said respondent, is not bound further to answer said articles of impeachment; the said order requiring this respondent to answer over not having been made with the concurrence of two-thirds of the said Senators sitting as aforesaid and voting upon the question of the passage of said order; and said order having been passed with the concurrence only of less than two-thirds of the said Senators sitting as aforesaid, and voting on the question of making and passing said order, the said order ought not to have been entered of record as an order of said court of impeachment in this cause; and said order appearing upon the whole record of said cause to be null and void as an order of said court.

And the said respondent prays the court now here, as he has before formally moved said court, to vacate said order; and the said respondent hereby prays said court that he may be hence dismissed.

WILLIAM W. BELKNAP.
MATT. H. CARPENTER,
J. S. BLACK,
MONTGOMERY BLAIR,
Of Counsel for said Respondent.

The Senate thereupon adopted the following order, the first clause being agreed to by a vote of yeas 26, nays 24, and the second by a vote of yeas 21, nays 16.

Ordered, That the paper presented by the defendant on the 16th instant be filed in this cause; and the defendant having failed to answer to the merits within ten days allowed by the order of the Senate of the 6th instant, the trial shall proceed on the 6th of July next as upon a plea of not guilty

This question was discussed somewhat at length during the final arguments in this case, Messrs. Montgomery Blair,[1] J. S. Black,[2] and Matt. H. Carpenter,[3] sustaining the contention already made by them, and Messrs. Managers William P. Lynde [1] and Scott Lord,[2] taking the opposing view.

The question had also been discussed briefly on July 6,[3] when the managers began to introduce testimony, Mr. Black having proposed the following:

The counsel for the accused object to the evidence now offered and to all evidence to support the opening of the managers, on the ground that there can be no legal conviction, the Senate having already determined the material and necessary fact that the defendant is not, and was not when impeached, a civil officer of the United States.

The question being submitted:

Shall the objection of counsel for the respondent be sustained?

it was decided in the negative without division.

2060. The Senate, in 1868, when certain States were without representation, declined to question its competency to try an impeachment case.—On February 29, 1868,[4] the Senate was proceeding to the consideration of rules of procedure for impeachments, the occasion being the proposed impeachment of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, when Mr. Garrett Davis, of Kentucky, moved to recommit the rules with instructions as follows:

That the committee report as a substitute for the rules just read the following:

"That the Constitution of the United States having appointed the Senate to be the court to try all impeachments, and having provided that the Senate shall be composed of two Senators from each State, and the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Arkansas, Texas, Louisiana, and Florida having each chosen two Senators, and those Senators not having been admitted to their seats in the Senate, while they continue to be excluded the Senate can not be formed into a constitutional and valid court of impeachment for the trial of articles of impeachment preferred against Andrew Johnson, President of the United States."

Mr. Davis argued elaborately in favor of his motion, saying in the course of his remarks:

The motion that I make is based upon the idea that while the present Members of the Senate exclude ten States from representation in the body the Senators representing the remaining States, which are not excluded, have no right to form a court of impeachment, and can not do so until the ten States whose Senators have been excluded are admitted as Senators. I think myself that the motion is properly made at this time to the Senate, not to the court of impeachment. Whether the Senate will form itself into a court of impeachment or not is a Senatorial question. It is not a question for the court of impeachment to decide. It does not come before the court of impeachment at all, according to my judgment of the matter. The Senate must be in such condition as to numbers and representation from all the States that it has the constitutional power to resolve itself into a court of impeachment. Whether it be in that condition or not is a question not for the court to decide, but for the Senate, before it resolves itself into a court of impeachment to decide. It seems to me that that is the correct position in relation to that point. Being of that opinion, I will proceed at no great length with my remarks.

If the ten excluded States had never been in the rebellion, if they were now represented upon the floor of the Senate, could the Senate or could the two Houses of Congress exclude from representation in both Houses ten other States; and having excluded ten other States, could the remaining Senators from twenty-seven instead of thirty-seven States resolve themselves into a court of impeachment for the trial of the President? I presume that no Senator will answer that question in the affirmative. If that is conceded, to my mind it concedes the whole principle and the whole proposition, and I will proceed to assign one or two reasons why I believe so.

Any State that was in rebellion, after the rebellion was suppressed and after the State submitted itself to the Constitution and laws and authorities of the United States, which fact was admitted by her representation in the Senate or in the House, was as much in the Union as though that State had never been in the rebellion. I will take the State of Virginia. The State of Virginia has had a representative in the Senate since the suppression of the rebellion and since the time when there was a single arm raised against the authority of the United States; that Senator has served two sessions here since the rebellion was entirely suppressed; he was recognized by the Senate as a representative of the State of Virginia, and the Senate in taking that course toward him admitted that State to be in the Union as a State with all the rights and privileges which she would be entitled to under the Constitution as if she had never been in the rebellion at all. In the case of Luther v. Borden that principle is decided, and I will read a passage from it. The honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. Morton] and the honorable Senator from Oregon [Mr. Williams] and all the Senators who support the Congressional policy of reconstruction seem to rely upon that case as their principal authority, at least the principal experiment of their authority. I will read one paragraph from that decision:

"Under this article of the Constitution it rests with Congress to decide what government is the established one in a State. For, as the United States guarantee to each State a republican government, Congress must necessarily decide what government is established in the State before it can determine whether it is republican or not. And when the Senators and Representatives of a State are admitted into the councils of the Union the authority of the government under which they are appointed, as well as its republican character, is recognized by the proper constitutional authority."

There is the plain principle. It is in conformity to the principle of the law of post limine, too; it is in conformity to our Constitution. It is a declaration of the principle of the Constitution in these few and simple words, that when Congress has admitted Senators and Representatives from a State both the existence and authority of the government under which they were appointed and its republican form have been recognized by the proper constitutional authority.

Sir, it seems to me that this decision settles the question as to Virginia and as to Tennessee. The Senators, or at least a Senator from Tennessee and Senators from Virginia, and Representatives from both States, have been admitted by Congress to their seats in both Houses. That, this decision says, is a recognition by the proper constitutional authority of the governments under which those Senators and Representatives were appointed and of the republican form of the governments under which they were appointed.

Mr. Oliver P. Morton, of Indiana, replied, saying, in the course of his remarks:

The Constitution requires no other Senate for the trial of an impeachment than what is required for any other purpose. The same Senate that can pass a bill can sit in the trial of an impeachment. The Senator can find no difference in the Constitution. There is nothing in the Constitution that says there shall be two Senators here from every State; it says that to convict on impeachment shall require the votes of two-thirds of the Members present—that is what it says.

But, Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky ignores one fact in his argument, which I think is of some importance in the consideration of this question; that is to say, he ignores the fact that there has been a rebellion. He treats the ten States which now have no representatives on this floor as being illegally and improperly excluded without cause. He omits any recognition of the fact that there has been a rebellion, that the people of those States have been in arms against the Government of the United States. He omits to mention the fact that they withdrew their Senators from this Chamber for a treasonable purpose, and that they engaged in hostility against the Government of the United States. These facts are material in the consideration of this question.

He says that every State in this Union is entitled to two Senators upon this floor. I controvert that proposition entirely. If the people of a State have destroyed their State government, if they have no legal State government that is authorized to elect Senators, I ask how they can have Senators upon this floor? If we regard these ten States as States in this Union, still the fact remains that they destroyed their loyal State governments, and they have no State governments that are legal and are recognized by the Government of the United States, and therefore they have no means under the Constitution of putting Senators upon this floor.

But, Mr. President, I do not think it worth while to undertake to follow the Senator in his argument. As I remarked before, I regard his presence here as a protest against his whole argument.

Mr. James A. Bayard, of Delaware, opposed the motion of Mr. Davis, but solely on the ground that the subject was not one for the decision of the Senate, but was for the court of impeachment to decide.

The motion to recommit was decided in the negative, yeas 2, nays 39.

On March 23, 1868,[1] after the Senate had organized for the trial of the President, after the articles of impeachment had been presented but before the reply had been made, Mr. Davis presented the following:

Mr. Davis, a Member of the Senate and of the Court of Impeachment, from the State of Kentucky, moves the court to make this order:

The Constitution having vested the Senate with the sole power to try the articles of impeachment of the President of the United States preferred by the House of Representatives, and having also declared that "the Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State chosen by the legislatures thereof," and the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Arkansas, Louisiana, and Texas having, each by its legislature, chosen two Senators who have been and continue to be excluded by the Senate from their seats, respectively, without any judgment by the Senate against them personally and individually on the points of their elections, returns, and qualifications, it is Ordered, That a court of impeachment for the trial of the President can not be legally and constitutionally formed while the Senators from the States aforesaid are thus excluded from the Senate; and this case is continued until the Senators from these States are permitted to take their seats in the Senate, subject to all constitutional exceptions to their elections, returns, and qualifications severally.

The question on agreeing to the order was taken without debate, and there appeared, yeas 2, nays 29. So the order was not agreed to.

2061. The doctrine of disqualifying personal interest as applied to a Senator sitting in an impeachment trial.

In 1868 the President pro tempore of the Senate voted on the final question at the Johnson trial, although a conviction would have made him the successor.

A Senator related to President Johnson by family ties voted on the final question of the impeachment without challenge.

A question as to the time when the competency of a Senator to sit in an impeachment trial should be challenged for disqualifying personal interest.

On March 5, 1868,[2] while the Senate was organizing for the trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, and after the Chief Justice had taken the chair, the administration of the oath to Senators proceeded until the name of Mr. Benjamin F. Wade, of Ohio, was called. As Mr. Wade arose from his seat and advanced to take the oath Mr. Thomas A. Hendricks, of Indiana, a Senator, entered an objection:

The Senator just called is the Presiding Officer of this body, and under the Constitution and laws will become the President of the United States should the proceeding of impeachment, now to be tried, be sustained. The Constitution providing that in such a case the possible successor can not even preside in the body during the trial, I submit for the consideration of the Presiding Officer and of the Senate the question whether, being a Senator, representing a State, it is competent for him, notwithstanding that, to take the oath and become thereby a part of the court? I submit that upon two grounds, first, the ground that the Constitution does not allow him to preside during these deliberations because of his possible succession, and, second, the parliamentary or legal ground that he is interested, in view of his possible connection with the office, in the result of the proceedings, he is not competent to sit as a member of the court.

An extended debate at once arose. Mr. John Sherman, of Ohio, urged that this tribunal was not to be tested by the ordinary rules of civil law. The State of Ohio had a right to send two Senators, and the Constitution gave them each a vote. Mr. Jacob M. Howard, of Michigan, made the point that Mr. Wade might not necessarily be President pro tempore at the end of the trial, and hence was not necessarily personally interested. Messrs. Lot M. Morrill, of Maine, and George H. Williams, of Oregon, urged that the question was premature, since the party interested to make the objection was not present, and no Senator should make it, and that the Senate should be organized before the question should be raised.

In the course of the debate Mr. Oliver P. Morton, of Indiana, said:

Mr. President, if it should now be determined that the Senator from Ohio shall not be sworn it would be an error, a blunder of which the accused would have just right to complain when he should come here. If a judge is interested in a case before him, or if a juror is interested in the result of the issue which he is called upon to try, it is an objection that the parties to the case have the right to waive; and they have always had that right under any system of practice that I have known anything about.

As was suggested by the Senator from Maine [Mr. Morrill] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. Williams], it is not an objection to be made by a fellow juror, by another member of the court, or by anybody except the parties to the case; and if we now, in the absence of the accused, say that the Senator from Ohio shall not be sworn, the President when he comes here to stand his trial will have a right to say "A Senator has been excluded that I would willingly accept; I have confidence in his integrity; I have confidence in his character and in his judgment, and I am willing to waive the question of interest; who had the right to make it in my absence?" The Senator from Indiana, my colleague, and the Senator from Kentucky have no right to make the question unless they should do it in the character of counsel for the accused, a character they do not maintain.

Mr. President, I desire to say one thing further, that this objection made here, in my judgment, proceeds upon a wrong theory. It is that we are now about putting off the character of the Senate of the United States and taking upon ourselves a new character; that we are about ceasing to be a Senate to become a court. Sir, I reject that idea entirely. This is the Senate when sworn, this will be the Senate when sitting upon the trial, and can have no other character. The idea that we are to become a court, invested with a new character, and possibly having new constituents, I reject as being in violation of the Constitution itself. What does that say? It says that "the Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments." The Senate shall have the sole power to try; it is the Senate that is to try; not a high court of impeachment—a phrase that is sometimes used—that is to be organized, to be created by the process through which we are now going; but, sir, it is simply the Senate of the United States. The Senate "when sitting for that purpose shall be on oath or affirmation." That does not change our character. We do not on account of this oath or affirmation cease to be a Senate, undergo a transformation, and become a high court of impeachment; but the Constitution simply provides that the Senate, while as a Senate, trying this case shall be under oath or affirmation. It is an exceptional obligation. The duty of trying an impeachment is an exceptional duty, just as is the ratification of a treaty; but it is still simply the Senate performing that duty. "When the President of the United States is tried the Chief Justice shall preside." Preside where? In some high court of impeachment, to be created by the transformation of an oath? No, sir. He is to preside in the Senate of the United States, and over the Senate; and that is all there is of it. "And no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the Members present." Two-thirds of the Members of the Senate.

Mr. President, if I am right in this view, it settles the whole question. The Senator from Ohio is a Member of the Senate. My colleague has argued this question as if we were about now to organize a new body, a court, and that the Senator from Ohio is not competent to become a member of that court. That is his theory. The theory is false. This impeachment is to be tried by the Senate, and he is already a Member of the Senate, and he has a constitutional right to sit here, and we have no power to take it from him. As to how far he shall participate, as to what part he shall take in our proceedings, as has been correctly said, that is a question for him to decide in his own mind. But, sir, he is already a Member of this body; he is here; he has his rights already conferred upon him as a Member of this body, and he has a constitutional right to take part in the performance of this business, as of any other business, whether the ratification of a treaty or the confirmation of an appointment or the passage of a bill, which may be devolved on this body by the Constitution of the United States. Because he has been elected President pro tempore of the Senate does that take from him any of his rights as a Senator? Those rights existed before, and he can not be robbed of them by any act of this Senate.

But, sir, aside from this question, which goes to the main argument, this entire action is premature. There is nobody here to make this challenge, even if it could be made legitimately. The Senators making it do not represent anybody but themselves. The accused might not want it made. He might, perhaps, prefer the Senator from Ohio to any other Member of this body to try his case. It is always the right of the defendant in a criminal proceeding and of the parties in a civil action to waive the interest that a juror or a member of the court may have in the case.

Mr. Reverdy Johnson, of Maryland, said:

While I am up, permit me to say a few words in reply to the honorable Member from Indiana [Mr. Morton] He tells us it is for the President of the United States—applying his remarks to the case which is to be and is before us—himself to make the objection, and that he may waive it. With all due deference to the honorable Member, that is an entire misapprehension of the question. The question involved in the inquiry is, what is the court to try the President? It is not to be such a tribunal as he chooses to try him. It is a question in which the people of the United States are interested, in which the country is interested; and by no conduct of the President, by no waiver of his, can he constitute this court in any other way than the way which the Constitution contemplates; that is to say, a court having all the qualities which the Constitution intends.

The honorable Member tells us that we are still a Senate and not a court, and that we can not be anything but a Senate and can not at any time become a court. Why, sir, the honorable Member is not treading in the footsteps of his fathers. The Constitution was adopted in 1789. There have been four or five cases of impeachment, and in every case the Senate has decided to resolve itself into a court, and the proceedings have been conducted before it as a court and not as a Senate. To be sure, these component elements of which the court is composed are Senators, but that is a mere descriptio personarum. They are members of the court because they are Senators, but not the less members of a court. The Constitution contemplated their assuming both capacities. As a Senate of the United States they have no judicial authority whatever; their powers are altogether legislative; they are to constitute and do constitute only a portion of the legislative department of the Government; but the Constitution for wise purposes says that in the contingency of an impeachment of a President of the United States or any other officer falling within the clause authorizing an impeachment they are to become, as I understand, a court. So have all our predecessors ruled in every case; and who were they? In the celebrated case of the impeachment against Mr. Chase, who was one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, there were men in the Senate at that time whose superiors have not been found since, nor at any time before, and they adopted the idea and acted upon the idea that the Senate in the trial of that impeachment acted as a court and not as a Senate.

I submit, therefore, that the honorable Member from Indiana [Mr. Morton] is altogether mistaken in supposing that we are not a court. But look at the power which we are to have. We are to pronounce judgment of guilty or not guilty; we are to answer upon our oaths whether the party impeached is guilty or not guilty of the articles of impeachment laid to his charge, and having pronounced him guilty or not guilty, we are then to award judgment. Who ever heard of the Senate of the United States in its legislative capacity awarding a judgment.

But besides that, why is it, Mr. Chief Justice, that you are called to preside over the court, or the Senate when acting as a court to try an impeachment? It is because it is a court. You have no legislative capacity; your functions are to construe the laws in cases coming before you; and the very fact that upon the trial of an impeachment of the President of the United States the Vice-President is to be laid aside, and the ordinary Presiding Officer, if the Vice-President himself does not exist, and you are to preside, shows that it is a court of the highest character, demanding the wisdom and the learning of the Chief Justice of the United States.

The honorable Member says, and other Members have said, that a question of interest or no interest is not involved in an inquiry of this description. Does the honorable Member mean to say that if the honorable Member from Ohio had a bill before the Senate awarding to him a sum of money upon the ground that it was due to him by the United States he could vote upon the question of the passage of the bill? Why not if the honorable Member from Indiana is right? He is a Senator. If he is right that the Constitution intends that each State shall have two votes upon every question coming before the body, then in the case supposed the honorable Member from Ohio would have a right to vote himself, and by his own vote to place money in his own possession. Who ever heard that that was a right that could be accorded anywhere?

Mr. President, courts have gone so far as to say that a judgment pronounced by a judge in a court of which he was the constitutional officer in a case in which he had a direct interest, was absolutely void upon general principles; not void because of any statutory regulation on this subject, but void upon the general ground that no man shall be a judge in his own case. Does it make any difference what may be the character of the interest? If the honorable Member from Ohio was the sole party under the Constitution to try this impeachment, could he try it? Would not everybody say it is a casus omissus? There can be no trial as long as he continues to be the sole Member of the court, because he has a direct and immediate interest in the result; because the judgment would be absolutely void as against the general principle founded in the nature of man, that no man should be permitted to adjudge a question in which he has a direct interest.

Mr. John Sherman, of Ohio, said:

Mr. President, I certainly do not appear here to represent my colleague on this question, but I represent the State of Ohio, which is entitled to two Senators on this floor. The Constitution declares that each Senator shall have a vote, and the Constitution further declares that each Senator shall take an oath in cases of impeachment. The right of my colleague to take the oath, his duty to take it, is as clear in my mind as any question that ever was presented to me as a Senator of the United States. The Constitution makes it plainly his duty to take the oath. He is a Senator, bound to take the oath, according to my reading of the Constitution; and every precedent that has been cited, and every precedent that has been referred to, bears out this construction. If after he has taken the oath as a Member of the Senate of the United States, for the purposes of this trial, anybody objects to his right to vote on any question that may be presented to this court or to the Senate hereafter, the objection can then be made and discussed; but his right in the preliminary stages to take the oath, and his duty to take it, is made plain by the Constitution itself. If hereafter, when the impeachment progresses, his right to vote on any question is challenged the question may be discussed and decided.

The case cited by my honorable friend from Maryland is directly in point. Mr. Stockton came here with a certificate from the State of New Jersey in due form; he presented it, and was sworn into office. Did anybody object to his being sworn? At the same time other papers were presented to the Senate challenging his right to be sworn, saying that the legislature of New Jersey had never elected Mr. Stockton; but because of that did anybody object to the oath being administered to Mr. Stockton? No one; although his right to take the oath was challenged, and a protest signed by a very large number of the members of the New Jersey legislature against his right to the seat, was presented. He was sworn in and took his seat here by our side, and voted and exercised the rights of a Senator. When the question of the legality of his own election came up, the Senate decided that he was not legally elected, and the question referred to arose upon his right to vote in that particular case. The question was whether he could vote, being interested in the subject-matter. The Senator from Massachusetts made the objection, and offered a resolution that he had not a right to vote in the particular case; and after debate that was decided in the affirmative, although by a very close vote. My own conviction then was and is yet that Mr. Stockton, as a Senator from the State of New Jersey, had a right to vote in his own case, although it might not be a proper exercise of the right.

So, sir, this question has been decided two or three times in the House of Representatives. In the celebrated New Jersey case, where a certificate of election was presented by certain Members from the State of New Jersey and they were excluded, public history has pronounced their exclusion to have been an unjustifiable wrong upon the great seal of the State of New Jersey. I believe that action is now generally admitted and conceded to have been wrong. Those men presented their credentials in the regular form, and they had the right to be sworn. So in many other cases where the right of persons to hold office is in dispute, those who have the prima facie right are sworn into office, and then the right is examined and finally settled. I had a matter presented to me once in which I was personally interested, and where I was sworn into office. I was directly and personally interested; but I took the oath of office, and I discharged my duties as a Member of the House of Representatives; and when the question came up whether I should vote on the election of a particular officer, I being a candidate for the office, I refused to vote. But it was my refusal which prevented my vote from being received. If I had chosen to vote, I had the right as a Member from the State of Ohio, even for myself. I have no doubt whatever of that. It is the right of the State; it is the right of the people; it is the right of representation. The power of the State and the power of the people must be exercised through their Senators and through their Representatives.

In the particular case here I do not suppose, I do not know at least, whether the question will ever arise. My colleague is required to take this oath as a Member of the Senate of the United States. You have no right to assume, nor have Senators the right to assume, that he will vote on questions which may affect his interest. That is a matter for him to decide; but the right of the State to be represented here on this trial of an impeachment is clear enough. Whether he will exercise the right, or whether he will waive it, is for him to determine. You have no right to assume that he will exercise the right or power to vote for himself where he is directly interested in the result.

It seems to me, therefore, that no Senator here has a right to challenge the voice of the State of Ohio, and the right of the State of Ohio to have two votes here is unquestionable unless when the question is raised in due form it shall be decided against my colleague. In the preliminary stages, when we are organizing this court, he ought to be sworn, and then if he is to be excluded by interest, unfitness, or any other reason, the question may be determined when raised hereafter; but no Senator has the right now to challenge his authority to appear here and be sworn as a Senator of the State of Ohio. His exclusion must come either by his own voluntary act, proceeding on what he deems to be just and right according to general principles, or it must be by the act of the Senate upon an objection made by the person accused in the trial of the impeachment. It seems to me that is clear and therefore I object to any waiver of the matter. I think my colleague has a right to present himself and be sworn precisely as I and other Senators have been sworn. Then let him decide for himself whether, in a case in which his interest is so deeply affected, he will vote on any question involved in the impeachment. If he decides to vote, when his vote is presented, then, not the Senator from Indiana, but the accused may make the objection, and we shall decide the question as a Senate or as a court, for I consider the terms convertible; we shall then decide the question of his right to vote.

Sir, several things have been introduced into this debate that I think ought not to have been introduced. The precise character of this tribunal, whether it is a court or a Senate, has nothing to do at present with this question. The only question before us is whether Benjamin F. Wade, acknowledged to be a Senator from the State of Ohio, has a right to present himself and take the oath prescribed by the Constitution and the laws in cases of impeachment. He is not the Vice-President; he is not excluded by the terms of the Constitution. He is the presiding officer of the Senate, holding that office at our will. You have no right to take away from him the power to take the oath of office and that to decide for himself as to whether, under all the circumstances, he ought to participate in this trial.

Mr. James A. Bayard, of Delaware, said:

Mr. President, I incline to the opinion that the objection made by the honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. Morrill] to the motion of the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. Hendricks], and also that made by the honorable Senator from Oregon [Mr. Williams], is correct. I can not see how a Senator is to object to another Senator being sworn in, although I think there may be some doubt raised on the question for this reason: The Constitution provides that in a case where the President of the United States is tried under an impeachment the Chief Justice of the United States, not the Vice-President, shall preside; and though that was intended originally to look to the Vice-President alone, yet if another person, from the death of the Vice-President, or from his absence or his acting as President, stands in precisely the same relation to the office of President under the law and the Constitution, whether he be a Senator or not, ought not the principle equally to apply?

It certainly excludes the Vice-President from being a member of the court. Does it not equally exclude the presiding officer of the Senate? It does not make him, being a Senator, less a Senator of the United States in his legislative capacity; but the clause of the Constitution prevents and is intended to prevent the influence of the man who would profit as the necessary result of the judgment of guilty in the case. It supposes that he can not be or may not be sufficiently impartial to sit as a judge in that case or to preside in the court trying it. That is the object, as I suppose.

But, sir, there is great force in the objection that that point must come by plea or motion, if you please, from the party accused; and I should not have thought for a moment of embarking in this discussion had it not been for the renewal by the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. Morton] of the endeavor to disprove the idea that the Senate must be organized into a court for the purpose of a judicial trial. Now, sir, whether it is to be a high court of impeachment or a court of impeachment, or to be called by the technical name court, is, in my judgment, immaterial; but the honorable Senator's argument did not touch the Constitution. The Senate is to constitute the court; the Senate is to try. Is there nothing in the provisions of that article which gives the judicial authority—for it is not legislative, it is judicial authority conferred, a judicial authority in special cases—is there nothing in that article which, of necessity, makes the body a judicial tribunal whenever it assumes these functions, and not a legislative body? Otherwise, how comes the presiding officer who now fills the chair to be in the seat which he occupies? When the Constitution says that the Senate shall have the sole authority to try impeachments is it necessary that it should say that the Senate shall be a court for the purpose of trying impeachments if every clause of the Constitution shows that it must be a judicial tribunal and must be a court, or else the language is meaningless which is applied to its organization? The members of the body are to be sworn specially in the particular case as between the accused and the impeachers. Is not that the action of a court? They are to try an individual in a criminal prosecution. Is not that judicial action? Is not the entire judicial power of the United States vested in the Supreme Court and the inferior courts, with that exception, by the very terms of the Constitution?

But, further, the body is to give judgment, to pronounce judgment, a judgment of removal from office always as the result of conviction; and if they please to carry it still further, they may pronounce judgment of disqualification from hereafter holding any office. Do not these terms of necessity constitute a court?

Mr. Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts, dissented from the view that the Chief Justice was made the presiding officer because the Vice-President would be an interested party, and argued from the literature contemporaneous with the Constitution that the Vice-President was expected to perform the duties of the President while the trial was going on. As to the question of personal interest, Mr. Sumner said:

There were other remarks made by Senators over the way to which I might reply. There was one that fell from my learned friend, the Senator from Maryland, in which he alluded to myself. He represented me as having cited many authorities from the House of Lords tending to show in the case of Mr. Stockton that this person at the time was not entitled to vote on the question of his seat. The Senator does not remember that debate, I think, as well as I do. The point which I tried to present to the Senate, and which, I believe, was affirmed by a vote of the body, was simply this: That a man can not sit as a judge in his own case. That was all, at least so far as I recollect, and I submitted that Mr. Stockton at that time was a judge undertaking to sit in his own case. Pray, sir, what is the pertinency of this citation? Is it applicable at all to the Senator from Ohio? Is his case under consideration? Is he impeached at the bar of the Senate? Is he in any way called in question? Is he to answer for himself? Not at all. How, then, does the principle of law, that no man shall sit as a judge in his own case, apply to him? How does the action of the Senate in the case of Mr. Stockton apply to him? Not at all. The two cases are as wide as the poles asunder. One has nothing to do with the other.

Something has been said of the "interest" of the Senator from Ohio on the present occasion. "Interest." This is the word used. We are reminded that in a certain event the Senator may become President, and that on this account he is under peculiar temptations which may swerve him from justice. The Senator from Maryland went so far as to remind us of the large salary to which he might succeed, not less than $25,000 a year, and thus added a pecuniary temptation to the other disturbing forces. Is not all this very technical? Does it not forget the character of this great proceeding? Sir, we are a Senate and not a court of nisi prius. This is not a case of assault and battery, but a trial involving the destinies of this Republic. I doubt if the question of "interest" is properly raised. I speak with all respect for others; but I submit that it is inapplicable. It does not belong here. Every Senator has his vote to be given on his conscience. If there be any "interest" to sway him, it must be that of justice and the safety of the country.

On March 6,[1] Mr. Hendricks, after discussing the various questions raised, withdrew his objection, saying:

But, Mr. President, I find that some Senators, among them the Senator from Delaware [Mr. Bayard], who agree with me upon this question on the merits, are of the opinion that the question ought more properly to be raised when the court shall be fully organized, when the party accused is here to answer. I do not believe that he can waive a question that goes to the organization of the body; I believe it is a question for the body itself. But upon that I find some difference of opinion; and when I find that difference of opinion among those who agree with me upon the merits, upon the main point, whether he shall participate in the proceedings and judgment who may be benefited by it—while I find some Senators, who agree with me upon that question, disagreeing with me upon the question whether it ought to be raised now or when the Senator from Ohio proposes to cast a material vote in the proceedings, I choose to yield my judgment—my judgment, not at all upon the merits; my judgment not at all upon the propriety and the duty of the Senate to decide upon its own organization; but I yield as to the time when the question shall be made in deference to the opinion of others; and for myself, sir, I withdraw the question which I presented for the consideration of the President of this body and of the Senate yesterday.

The oath was then administered to Mr. Wade.

It appears from the Journal of the proceedings of the trial that Mr. Wade did not vote on any record vote until at the close of the trial, on May 16,[2] when his name is recorded on a question relative to the order of passing judgment on the several articles of impeachment. Thereafter he voted both on incidental questions and on the question of guilty or not guilty.

It appeared from the debate on the question as to Mr. Wade that another Senator was related to President Johnson,[3] but no objection was made to him on the ground of affinity, nor did any Senator urge that this should be considered an objection.[4] This Senator was Mr. David T. Patterson, of Tennessee, and he was son-in-law of the respondent. Mr. Patterson participated in the trial throughout, and on May 16 [5] voted "not guilty" on the main question.

2062. Reference to a discussion as to the right to challenge the competency of a Senator to sit in an impeachment trial.—The right to challenge a Member of the Senate sitting for the trial of an impeachment case was discussed [6] at length by Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler during the impeachment of President Andrew Johnson.

2063. A quorum of the Senate sitting for an impeachment trial is a quorum of the Senate itself and not merely a quorum of the Senators sworn for the trial.—On February 23, 1905,[7] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Mr. William B. Allison, of Iowa, asked for a call of the Senate and there appeared forty-two Senators, and, the Presiding Officer,[1] said:

Upon the call of the Senate, forty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate sitting in the impeachment trial is not present.

Then, on motion of Mr. Knute Nelson, of Minnesota, the Sergeant-at-Arms was directed to send for absentees.

Later the Presiding Officer said:

A quorum of Senators who have been sworn in the impeachment trial is present—forty-three Senators.

The proceedings under the call were then dispensed with, and the Presiding Officer put the pending question on the admissibility of certain testimony.

There appeared yeas 10, nays 34—a total of 44 Senators responding, and the Presiding Officer announced that the evidence was not admitted.

Mr. Henry M. Teller, a Senator from Colorado, raised a question as to whether or not forty-four Senators constituted a quorum.

The Presiding Officer said:

Forty-three Senators make a quorum of the Senators who have been sworn in the impeachment trial.

Later Mr. Teller again raised the question:

Mr. President, I have been under the impression for a good many years that a majority of this body—in this instance forty-six Senators—made a quorum. I was somewhat surprised to find that a majority of the Senators sworn are held to be a quorum. I am not aware myself of any provision of the Constitution that allows this body to do business with less than a majority. You could not pass here a ten-dollar pension bill without a majority. Is it possible that less than a quorum can exercise the most important function that has been placed on the Senate by the Constitution? In my judgment, there is no court here present to-night. I raise that question.

The Presiding Officer said:

The Presiding Officer is of opinion that the point of order is well taken He will state in this connection, however, that it has not been observed in proceedings of the Senate hitherto.

Thereupon further proceedings were taken to secure a quorum, and the Presiding Officer announced:

On the call of the Senate forty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

The Presiding Officer thinks it becomes the duty of the Presiding Officer again to submit to the Senate the question with regard to the admission of evidence offered by counsel for respondent, which was submitted when a quorum of the Senate was not present, but when a quorum of the Senators sworn in the impeachment trial was present.

A little later the Presiding Officer said:

A short time ago the Presiding Officer stated that he thought in this trial there had been a call of the Senate and that business had been conducted when there was less than a quorum of the Senate. He finds upon examination that he was mistaken, and that on the two occasions when the roll call was had to determine the existence of a quorum there was on each occasion a quorum of the Senate present.

2064. An attempt of the House to investigate alleged corruption in connection with the votes of Senators during the Johnson trial was the subject of discussion and investigation in the Senate.—On May 21, 1868,[1] in the Senate sitting in legislative session, but at the time when the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, was pending, Mr. John B. Henderson, a Senator from Missouri, rising to a question of privilege, said:

On Saturday last after a vote had been taken in the court of impeachment on the eleventh article, and the Members of the House had retired to their own Chamber, one of the managers offered and the House adopted the following resolution:

"Whereas information has come to the managers which seems to them to furnish probable cause to believe that improper or corrupt means have been used to influence the determination of the Senate upon the articles of impeachment exhibited to the Senate by the House of Representatives against the President of the United States: Therefore,

"Be it resolved, That for the further and more efficient prosecution of the impeachment of the President the managers be directed and instructed to summon and examine witnesses under oath, to send for persons and papers, to employ a stenographer, and to appoint subcommittees to take testimony, the expenses thereof to be paid from the contingent fund of the House."

It was advocated by its mover, one of the managers, on the ground that base and corrupt motives had determined the judgment of the Senate; and another one of the managers being asked during a debate on Monday last in the House if he would have Senators perjure themselves, replied that "perjury would not hurt them much."

On Tuesday, the 19th instant, I received the following notice from the managers:

"FORTIETH CONGRESS UNITED STATES,
"HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
"Washington, D. C., May 19, 1868.

"SIR: A question has arisen in the course of our investigation wherein your testimony will tend to instruct the House of Representatives and aid its inquiry.

"Will you do the committee of managers the courtesy to attend at the earliest possible moment at the Judiciary Committee room of the House, where they are in waiting to receive you?

"By direction of the managers.

"Your obedient servant,

"B. D. WHITNEY, Clerk.

"Hon. J. B. HENDERSON."

To which I replied as follows—the reply not being delivered, however, till the next morning:

"WASHINGTON CITY, May, 1868.

"GENTLEMEN: Yours of this date is received. You say 'a question has arisen in the course of our investigations wherein your (my) testimony will tend to instruct the House of Representatives and aid its inquiry,' and thereupon you request my early attendance before the managers as a witness.

"This request, I take it, is intended to answer the purposes of a subpœna, and is issued under authority of a resolution adopted by the House on Saturday last in the following words, to wit:

"I have already read the resolution.

"A prosecution by impeachment against the President is set on foot, and now, when the evidence and arguments have been fully submitted and the Senate as a court is deliberating on its judgment, a second prosecution is instituted against the Senate itself. Whatever may be the purpose of this inquisition—and I use the word in no offensive sense—it is, in my judgment, not only a direct insult to the body of which I am a member, but a proceeding of most dangerous tendency in the future. A large part of our proceedings has been conducted in secret, the managers, counsel, and reporters being excluded. If a member of the court can now, before the rendition of judgment, be withdrawn from consultation and subjected to the inquisition of the prosecutors, that inquisition may reach to all proceedings, and thus subvert the dignity and independence of the Senate. If it be to purge corruption from the Senate, the Senate is the proper body to guard and protect its own honor.

"Personally, I have no objection to appearing and testifying before you to all matters within my knowledge on the subject of impeachment. And were I to refuse, I know a new shower of calumny, base and grievous enough already, would certainly be poured upon me. But in my judgment this proceeding rises above personal considerations. It concerns public justice and effects the character, honor, and dignity of the Senate.

"I am engaged to appear before another committee of your body to-day, and on the meeting of the Senate to-morrow I shall submit this question for its consideration and be governed accordingly.

"Yours, respectfully,

"J. B. HENDERSON.

"To the managers of impeachment on the part of the House of Representatives."

Mr. Henderson urged that the resolution under which the summons had issued contained a direct insult to the Senate, and that the summons was an invasion of the privileges of the Senate.

Mr. Henderson also presented another letter received later from the managers:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 20, 1868.

SIR: The managers have the honor to acknowledge your communication of 19th instant in answer to their request, which was not intended to serve the purpose of a subpœna, but as a courteous intimation to you that you could aid them in the investigation with which they have been charged.

If it had occurred to them to speculate upon the topic, they would have supposed you might do them the justice to believe that they would have asked no question indecorous or improper, certainly not as to anything which occurred in the secret sessions of the Senate. They were not aware at the time they sent their note to you that the Senate was in session for "deliberation on its judgment" or otherwise, and they also believed that if they so far transgressed the limits of propriety as to make any inquiry which you deemed improper you would certainly have the efficient remedy of declining to answer.

Accepting the theory of your note, that you are a judge, they do not perceive on that account any objection to your answering as to matters pertinent in a further prosecution of the respondent on trial before the Senate for other and different offenses, because it is well known among lawyers that in both civil and criminal trials the presiding judge may be, and when occasion requires is, sworn as a witness in the very case then pending.

Jurors, in likemanner, are called from their seats and sworn during the trial; and either, during the adjournment of the court, might legally and properly be called before a grand jury to give evidence on which to find an indictment against the prisoner at the bar for other and different offenses.

They bring these considerations to your notice in order that, seeing the theory upon which they have acted, you will acquit them of any discourtesy either personal to yourself or to the honorable Senate. Without indicating any opinion upon the question whether a Senator is liable to examination as a witness before a committee of the House, they desire to add that they did not intend to assert such claim in their communication to you of 19th instant. They had no purpose other than to avail themselves of your knowledge of facts, if agreeable to you, to give them the benefit of your knowledge, to aid them in pursuit of justice and right.

By direction of the managers.

Your obedient servant,

B. D. WHITNEY, Clerk.

Hon. J. B. HENDERSON.

In the course of the debate arising over the presentation made by Mr. Henderson, Mr. Timothy O. Howe, of Wisconsin, asked for the consideration of a resolution presented on a previous day by Mr. Garrett Davis, of Kentucky:

Whereas it is represented that some persons have been and are engaged in violating the rights and privileges of the Senate by the use of threats, intimidation, and other unlawful and improper means toward its Members to constrain them in their consideration, action, and judgment in the matter of the articles of impeachment against the President of the United States now pending before the Senate as a court of impeachment; therefore be it

Resolved, That a committee of three, to be appointed by the Chair, do proceed to inquire into the facts of such imputed threats, intimidation, and other unlawful means aforesaid, and the names of the persons, if any, using, or that have used, them; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers, to take evidence, employ a stenographer, and report the facts to the Senate.

To this Mr. Edmund G. Ross, of Kansas, proposed an amendment adding:

And that said committee be authorized to request the managers on the part of the House to furnish said committee a transcript of all the tetimony that has been or may be taken by them in the case of the impeachment of the President.

After debate the further consideration of the subject was postponed.

On May 27[1] the consideration of the resolution was resumed, when Mr. Davis was permitted to withdraw the resolution and submit it in the following modified form:

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed by the Chair to inquire into and report the facts in relation to any threats, intimidation, or other improper influences that were used or offered to be used, directly or indirectly, to control or influence the consideration or decision of the Senate or any Senator in the matter of the impeachment of the President of the United States lately pending before the Senate as a court of impeachment. Also, to inquire into and report the facts in relation to any overture or offer of an improper character to any person by or in the name of any Senator or other person in connection with said impeachment trial, and the names of any persons connected with said transactions or any of them. Said committee to have power to send for persons and papers, to summon witnesses, to take their evidence, and employ a stenographer, and to report as early as practicable.

Mr. Ross thereupon proposed an amendment in the nature of a substitute:

That a committee be appointed by the President of the Senate, to be composed of five Senators, whose duty it shall be to inquire whether improper or corrupt means have been used, or attempted to be used, to influence the votes of the Members of the Senate in the trial of the impeachment of the President; and that the said committee be authorized and empowered to send for persons and papers, and to do all things that in their judgment may be necessary for the furtherance of the object of the resolution.

The amendment was agreed to, after debate, and then the resolution as amended was agreed to.

2065. Title by which the Chief Justice is addressed while presiding at an impeachment trial.—In the course of the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, the Chief Justice, who was the Presiding Officer, was variously addressed as "Mr. President" and "Mr. Chief Justice." Mr. Manager Butler, in opening the case for the House of Representatives, used the former designation, while Mr. Benjamin R. Curtis, of counsel for the President, in his opening used the latter title. Mr. Thaddeus Stevens, of Pennsylvania, one of the managers, in his closing argument, addressed the Presiding Officer as "Mr. Chief Justice." This was the title used by Mr. William M. Evarts and other counsel for the President. In general the managers preferred the title "Mr. President," Messrs. Managers Benjamin F. Butler and John A. Bingham using it almost if not quite invariably. The Chief Justice in ruling usually said, "The Chief Justice thinks," etc., but sometimes said, "The Chair thinks." In the Journal and Record of Debates[2] the words "Chief Justice" are invariably used. The Senators used some one and some the other designation in addressing the Chair.

In the impeachment of William Blount, the Vice-President (Thomas Jefferson, of Virginia) presided, and we find this form of address, "Mr. President." [3]

2067. During the Johnson trial Chief Justice Chase gave a casting vote on incidental questions, and the Senate declined to declare his incapacity to vote.—On March 31, 1868,[4] during the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, a motion was made that the Senate retire for consultation, and there appeared on the vote. yeas 25, nays 25.

The Chief Justice thereupon said:

The Chief Justice votes in the affirmative. The Senate will retire for conference.

The Senate having retired, Mr. Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts, offered the following proposition as an amendment to the pending question:

That the Chief Justice of the United States, presiding in the Senate on the trial of the President of the United States, is not a member of the Senate, and has no authority under the Constitution to vote on any question during the trial, and he can pronounce decision only as the organ of the Senate, with its assent.

This was disagreed to, yeas 22, nays 26.

Later Mr. Sumner proposed the following:

Resolved, That the Chief Justice of the United States, presiding in the Senate on the trial of the President of the United States, is not a member of the Senate, and has no authority under the Constitution to vote on any question during the trial.

This was objected to as not relating to the subject for consideration of which the Senate had retired, and was not considered.

On April 1 Mr. Sumner offered the following:

It appearing from the reading of the Journal of yesterday that on a question where the Senate were equally divided the Chief Justice, presiding on the trial of the President, gave a casting vote, it is hereby declared that in the judgment of the Senate such vote was without authority under the Constitution of the United States.

This was rejected without debate, yeas 21, nays 27.

On April 2, 1868,[5] the question was taken as a motion that the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial adjourn, and there appeared yeas 22, nays 22. Thereupon the Chief Justice said "The Chief Justice votes in the affirmative," and so adjournment was voted.

Senate sitting in legislative session, Mr. Eugene Hale, a Senator from Maine, offered this resolution:

Resolved, That all proceedings in the impeachment trial now before the Senate sitting as a court shall be terminated on Saturday, February 25 next, and a final vote shall be taken on the afternoon of that day at 4 o'clock.

Later, on the same day, in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial, Mr. Hale introduced the same resolution, for action at a future time.

On February 22,[1] in the Senate in legislative session, Mr. Hale withdrew the resolution and submitted the following:

Ordered, That all proceedings before the Senate sitting in the trial of the impeachment against Charles Swayne, judge of the United States in and for the northern district of Florida, shall terminate on Saturday, February 25 next, and, in pursuance of this order, all testimony upon either side shall be closed on Friday, the 24th day of February next, and the Senate shall commence its session sitting for the trial of said impeachment proceedings at 12 o'clock meridian on said Saturday, the 25th day of February next; and, without any other motion or proceeding intervening, the counsel for the defense shall have until 2 o'clock of said day to present the case of the defendant, said time to be apportioned or divided as said counsel may determine; the managers on the part of the House of Representatives shall have, to present the case against said Charles Swayne, the time from 2 o'clock until 4 o'clock of said day, said time to be apportioned or divided as the managers may determine; at 4 o'clock, without further motion or proceeding intervening, the final vote shall be taken upon said impeachment proceedings.

In support of this resolution, Mr. Hale cited the backward condition of the legislative business.

Mr. Augustus O. Bacon, of Georgia, said in reply:

Mr. President, I quite agree with the Senator from Maine that the legislative business before this Senate is of extreme importance, but I do not think that anything is of more importance than that the Senate shall give such direction to any measures which it may deem necessary for expedition of the impeachment trial as will not bring into discredit and disrepute the very high and important function which we are now performing. In trying the impeachment presented by the House we are complying with the requirements of the Constitution, through which alone the purity and integrity of the public service can be guarded and secured.

The suggestion which I desire to make in this connection, in order that a wrong impression may not go abroad, is that everything which looks to expedition of the impeachment trial should, so far as necessary and practicable, be in the nature of additional time given by the Senate to this work in the interval which now remains at our command, and that it should not be directed to the arbitrary abridgment of the necessary presentation of this case by the House of Representatives, performing, as it does, a high constitutional function in bringing and presenting to the Senate its case. If we desire that the impeachment trial shall close by Saturday, then the proper course is to give more time to it each day, so that the managers on the part of the House and the counsel for the respondent may have before them full time in which to fully present their respective cases to the Senate. We all know that this session must end at noon on the 4th of March, and that we are limited in time by law; and the objection which I make to the suggestion of the Senator is not to his effort that we may by proper expedition in the disposition of the impeachment matter have sufficient time for the proper discharge of the important duties of another kind which devolve upon us. My objection is to the method proposed. I prefer that instead of that the direction should be given to this matter which will impose upon us, if it need be, additional labor by providing for additional time to be devoted to the trial each day, and that it be not disposed of by the suggestion of an arbitrary abridgment in the opportunity of the House of Representatives to present its case here, and of the time for the proper consideration by ourselves as to how this important matter shall be determined, and what final disposition shall be given to it.

[1] Record, pp. 3020, 3021.

Mr. William M. Stewart, of Nevada, said:

Mr. President, I should like to make one suggestion in regard to this matter. It is suggested that the Constitution restrains the Senate, and that to comply with the provisions of the Constitution no limitation should be put upon time. We have a constitutional right to trial by jury, we have a constitutional right to have cases heard by the courts, and the courts exercise in pursuance of that a reasonable discretion as to the time to be used. The Supreme Court of the United States have rules in regard to the time to be used in cases to be argued there, and in criminal proceedings the courts put a reasonable limit to the time to be allowed for argument. They have to facilitate a trial in order to comply with the Constitution at all.

This brought from Mr. John C. Spooner, of Wisconsin, this question:

Has the Senator ever known a court before which there was a criminal case to fix a limit of time within which limit testimony for the defense should be presented?

The matter went over.

An adjournment of the Senate sitting for an impeachment trial does not operate as an adjournment of the Senate.

Immediately upon the adjournment of the Senate sitting for an impeachment trial the ordinary business is resumed.

Present form and history of Rule XII of the Senate sitting for impeachment trials.

Rule XII of the "rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials" is as follows:

The hour of the day at which the Senate shall sit upon the trial of an impeachment shall be (unless otherwise ordered) 12 o'clock m., and when the hour for such thing [sitting?] shall arrive, the Presiding Officer of the Senate shall so announce, and thereupon the Presiding Officer upon such trial shall cause proclamation to be made, and the business of the trial shall proceed. The adjournment of the Senate sitting in said trial shall not operate as an adjournment of the Senate; but on such adjournment the Senate shall resume the consideration of its legislative and executive business.

This rule was first drafted by the committee appointed in 1868[1] to revise the rules preparatory to the trial of President Johnson. In the House, on March 2, the original form was modified by eliminating the words "high court of impeachment" wherever found and substituting the words "the trial." The form adopted in 1868 is identical with the present form, except that the word "thing" appears instead of "sitting."[2]

2070. At 12.30 p. m. of the day appointed for an impeachment trial the Senate suspends ordinary business and the Secretary notifies the House of Representatives that the Senate is ready to proceed.

Present form and history of Rule XI of the Senate sitting for impeachments.

Rule XI of the "Rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials" is as follows:

At 12.30 o'clock afternoon of the day appointed for the trial of an impeachment, the legislative and executive business of the Senate shall be suspended, and the Secretary shall give notice to the House of Representatives that the Senate is ready to proceed upon the impeachment of ——— ———, in the Senate Chamber, which chamber is prepared with accommodations for the reception of the House of Representatives.

This is the form reported and agreed to in the revision of 1868.[3] It was formed by uniting portions of rules 11 and 12, which had been framed in 1805[4] at the time of the trial of Judge Chase.

2071. The hour of meeting of the Senate sitting for an impeachment trial being fixed, a motion to adjourn to a different hour is not in order.—On March 30, 1868,[5] in the Senate, sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Mr. John Sherman moved an adjournment.

Mr. Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts, suggested that the adjournment be to 10 o'clock on the morrow.

The Chief Justice[1] said:

The hour of meeting is fixed by the rule, and the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts is not in order.

2072. In the Johnson trial the Chief Justice held that the motion to adjourn took precedence of a motion to fix the day to which the Senate should adjourn.—On April 3, 1868,[2] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Mr. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, moved that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. William Pitt Fessenden, of Maine, moved that when the court should adjourn, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. Edmunds made the point of order that the motion to adjourn took precedence.

The Chief Justice[1] said:

The Chair is of opinion that the motion to adjourn takes precedence of every other motion if it is not withdrawn.

2073. In the Senate sitting for an impeachment trial no debate is in order pending a question of adjournment.—On Saturday, April 4, 1868,[3] in the Senate, sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, a motion was made that when the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, should adjourn, it should be to meet on Thursday, April 9.

Debate having arisen, the Chief Justice[1] said:

The Chief Justice is of opinion that, pending the question of adjournment, no debate is in order from any quarter. It is a question exclusively for the Senate. Senators, you who are in favor of the adjournment of the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment until Thursday next will, as your names are called, answer "yea;" those of the contrary opinion, "nay."

And there appeared yeas 37, nays 10. So the motion was agreed to.

2074. The motion to adjourn to a certain time has been admitted in the Senate sitting for an impeachment trial.—On June 1, 1876,[4] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Mr. George G. Wright, a Senator from Iowa, proposed this inquiry:

Mr. President, I wish to inquire whether it would be in order now to move to adjourn to a day certain, or whether the order should be properly that when the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment adjourns, it be to a definite time?

The President pro tempore[5] said:

It would be in order to move to adjourn to a certain time.

2075. The Senate sits for an impeachment trial with open doors, but may deliberate on its decisions in secret.

Present form and history of Rule XIX of the Senate sitting in impeachment trials.

Rule XIX of the "Rules of procedure and practice for the Senate when sitting in impeachment trials," is as follows:

At all times while the Senate is sitting upon the trial of an impeachment the doors of the Senate shall be kept open, unless the Senate shall direct the doors to be closed while deliberating upon its decisions.

The first clause of this rule is in the form adopted in 1805,[1] for the trial of Judge Chase. The second clause, setting forth a contingency in which the doors may be closed, was added in the revision of 1868,[2] preparatory to the trial of President Johnson.

On July 31, 1876,[3] when the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, was about to proceed to judgment, Mr. Hannibal Hamlin, a Senator from Maine, proposed to amend the rule by striking off the qualifying clause, so that the proceedings should be held in open session. But the Senate by a vote of yeas 23, nays 32, declined to consider the proposition.

2076. If the Senate fail to sit in an impeachment trial on the day or hour fixed, it may fix a time for resuming the trial.

Present form and history of Rule XXV of the Senate sitting for impeachment trials.

Rule XXV of the "rules of procedure and practice for the Senate when sitting in impeachment trials," is as follows:

If the Senate shall at any time fail to sit for the consideration of articles of impeachment on the day or hour fixed therefor, the Senate may, by an order to be adopted without debate, fix a day and hour for resuming such consideration.

This rule was adopted in 1868,[4] preparatory to the proceedings for the trial of President Johnson.

2077. An order for postponement of an impeachment trial was held in order after the organization of the Senate for the trial.—On March 23, 1868,[5] in the Senate as organized for the trial of President Johnson, the Chief Justice of the United States presiding, Mr. Garrett Davis, a member of the Senate from Kentucky, proposed a preamble and order, reciting that the seats of Senators from several States were vacant, and declaring that the trial should be postponed until the Senators from those States should be permitted to take their seats.

Mr. Timothy O. Howe, of Wisconsin, a Senator, objected that the proposition was not in order.

The Chief Justice[1] said:

The motion comes before the Senate in the shape of an order submitted by a Member of the Senate and of the court of impeachment. The twenty-third rule requires that "all the orders and decisions shall be made and had by yeas and nays, which shall be entered on the record, and without debate, subject, however, to the operation of rule seven." The seventh rule requires the Presiding Officer of the Senate to "submit to the Senate, without a division, all questions of evidence and incidental questions; but the same shall on the demand of one-fifth of the Members present, be decided by yeas and nays." By amendment this rule has been applied to orders and decisions proposed by a Member of the Senate under the twenty-third rule. The Chair rules therefore that the motion of the Senator from Kentucky is in order.

Thereupon the proposition was entertained.

2078. When informed that managers are to present articles of impeachment, the Senate, by rule, requires its Secretary to inform the House of its readiness to receive the managers.

Present form and history of Senate Rule I as to impeachments.

Rule I, of the "Rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials,"[2] is as follows:

Whensoever the Senate shall receive notice from the House of Representatives that managers are appointed on their part to conduct an impeachment against any person and are directed to carry articles of impeachment to the Senate, the Secretary of the Senate shall immediately inform the House of Representatives that the Senate is ready to receive the managers for the purpose of exhibiting such articles of impeachment, agreeably to such notice.

This rule, with two immaterial verbal changes, is in the form adopted for the trial of Judge Chase in 1804.[3] It merely put in form of a permanent rule the practice followed in the trials of Senator Blount and Judge Pickering. In 1868,[4] for the trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, the rule received slight verbal changes, and was adopted in the form above, except the last two words, which read "said notice," instead of "such notice."

2079. Articles of impeachment being presented, the Senate is required by its rule to proceed to prompt consideration thereof.

Before consideration of articles of impeachment, the Presiding Officer is required by rule to administer the oath to the Senators present, and later to others as they may appear.

The Senate, in its rules, has refrained from prescribing an oath for the Chief Justice when he presides at an impeachment trial.

The Senate is required by rule to continue in session from day to day, Sundays excepted, during impeachment trials, unless otherwise ordered.

In 1868 the Senate eliminated from its rules all mention of itself as a "high court of impeachment."

Rule III, of the "Rules of procedure and practice of the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials," is as follows:

Upon such articles being presented to the Senate, the Senate shall, at 1 o'clock afternoon of the day (Sunday excepted) following such presentation or, sooner if ordered by the Senate, proceed to the consideration of such articles, and shall continue in session from day to day (Sundays excepted) after the trial shall commence (unless otherwise ordered by the Senate) until final judgment shall be rendered, and so much longer as may, in its judgment, be needful. Before proceeding to the consideration of the articles of impeachment, the Presiding Officer shall administer the oath hereinafter provided to the Members of the Senate then present and to the other Members of the Senate as they shall appear, whose duty it shall be to take the same.

This rule, which formulated the practice of previous trials, dates from 1868,[1] when a committee, of which Mr. Jacob M. Howard, of Michigan, was chairman, reported a series of rules for the proceedings incident to the impeachment of President Johnson. This rule was reported in form as follows:

III. Upon such articles being presented to the Senate, the Senate shall, at 1 o'clock afternoon of the day (Sunday excepted) following such presentation, or sooner if so ordered by the Senate, resolve itself into a high court of impeachment for proceeding thereon. A quorum of the Senate shall constitute a quorum of the court, and it shall continue in session from day to day (Sundays excepted) after the trial shall commence (unless otherwise ordered by the court) until final judgment shall be rendered, and so much longer as it may, in its judgment, be needful. Immediately upon the Senate resolving itself into such high court of impeachment the Secretary of the Senate shall administer to the Presiding Officer (unless he shall be the Chief Justice) the oath required by the Constitution of the United States in such cases, and in the form hereinafter prescribed, and thereupon the Presiding Officer shall administer such oath to the Members of the Senate then present, and to the other Members of the Senate as they shall appear, whose duty it shall be to take the same.

The wording of this language, with its references to the "high court of impeachment" and the quorum thereof, gave rise to a discussion[2] as to the constitutional status of the Senate in such procedure; and resulted in amendment[3] striking out those words, and bringing the rule in this respect to its present form. Another question arose over a proposition to strike out the words providing for administering the oath to the Presiding Officer. Mr. Charles R. Buckalew, of Pennsylvania, said:

I think the Presiding Officer of the court of impeachment should be under oath, but it should be an oath different from that taken by the Members who try the case. In the rule, as reported to us, it was contemplated that the same oath should be administered to him that was administered to the Members of the Senate. I believe in former impeachment trials the Presiding Officer was sworn. There may be some difficulty about our prescribing an oath for the Presiding Officer. I think it very clear that by an act of Congress the form of an oath to be taken by the Presiding Officer might be provided, and that it would be binding. It seems an anomaly that we should have a Presiding Officer sitting here and not under any legal obligation or any moral obligation such as an oath would impose I agree that the amendment already made excepting him from the operation of the general form of oath provided for Members of the Senate is eminently just and proper; and his exception becomes indispensable after the decision which has been made by the Senate on several occasions, withdrawing him altogether from any interference with our proceedings except on questions of order. I suppose, Mr. President, we have the same power to prescribe an oath for the Presiding Officer of the Senate that we have to prescribe an oath for the Members of the Senate, if, indeed, there be any authority to bind him by such an obligation.

[2] Globe, p. 1521 et seq.

[3] Globe, pp. 1602, 1603.

Mr. Stephen C. Pomeroy, of Kansas, said:

The Chief Justice of the United States is under oath. When he entered upon the discharge of his functions as Chief Justice, he took an oath to discharge all the duties that were incumbent upon him as such officer; and this duty is placed upon him by the Constitution of the United States, and was embraced in his oath to discharge his duties as Chief Justice of the United States; and any further oath than that I think would be unnecessary.

* * * I beg leave to say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that the reason why Senators have to be sworn, in addition to their usual oath as Senators, is that it is provided for by the Constitution, which says that "When sitting for that purpose they shall be on oath or affirmation;" and goes on, "When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside," but it does not say that the Chief Justice shall be sworn. In the same sentence in which the Constitution provides that the Senate shall be sworn when sitting to try an impeachment, it says that the Chief Justice shall preside, and, of course, in the absence of any requirement of a special oath, we are to understand that he is sworn to the discharge of his duties, and this duty among the rest, when he took his oath of office. I believe that is all the oath required of him.

The amendment was agreed to, bringing the latter portion of the rule into the form now existing.

2080. Form of oath to be administered to Senators sitting in impeachment trials.

The Senate declined to require that the Chief Justice be sworn when about to preside at an impeachment trial.

Present form and history of Senate Rule XXIV as to impeachments.

Rule XXIV of the "Rules of procedure and practice of the Senate when sitting in impeachment trials" provides:

FORM OF OATH TO BE ADMINISTERED TO THE MEMBERS OF THE SENATE SITTING IN THE TRIAL OF IMPEACHMENTS.

"I solemnly swear (or affirm, as the case may be) that in all things appertaining to the trial of the impeachment of ——— ———, now pending, I will do impartial justice according to the Constitution and laws: So help me God."

This is the form agreed to in 1868.[1]

As originally reported the form of oath for Members of the Senate had this heading:

Form of oath to be administered to the Presiding Officer and Members of the Senate.

Mr. Charles D. Drake, of Missouri, raised the point[2] that the Constitution did not require the Presiding Officer to be sworn, but only the Senators. Some discussion arose over this question. Mr. Charles R. Buckalew, of Pennsylvania, thought the Presiding Officer should be sworn.

Mr. Stephen C. Pomeroy, of Kansas, said that the Chief Justice was already sworn to perform his duties, and this was part of his duties as Chief Justice.

The Senate, without division, agreed to an amendment striking out the words "Presiding Officer and" from the heading.

2081. In 1876 the Senate doubted its authority to empower its Presiding Officer to administer to Senators the oath required for an impeachment trial.

In the Belknap trial the oath to Senators was administered by the Chief Justice until by law authority was conferred on the Presiding Officer of the Senate.

On April 5, 1876,[1] in the Senate pending proceedings for the impeachment of William W. Belknap, Secretary of War, Mr. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, said:

I wish to ask the attention of the Senate to a matter which I, after consultation with as many Senators as I could find, think it necessary to bring to the notice of the Senate respecting the matter of the impeachment to-day. The third rule of the Senate in regard to impeachments provides that on this day at one o'clock—

"The Presiding Officer shall administer the oath hereinafter provided to the Members of the Senate then present, and to the other Members of the Senate as they shall appear, whose duty it shall be to take the same."

But on examination we are unable to find any statute of the United States which authorizes the President of the Senate or the Presiding Officer to administer this oath. It stands upon the rule alone. The language of the statute about the authority of the Presiding Officer is that, when Senators appear to take their seats upon an election to this body, the Presiding Officer shall swear them in, and any Senator may administer a similar oath to the Vice-President, the President of the Senate, when he appears; and there the statute stops except in respect of witnesses who are by law to be sworn by the President of the Senate.

In this state of difficulty and in the very grave doubt, at least, that in the minds of all the gentlemen whom I have been able to consult there is about this being a constitutional compliance with that requirement which obliges us to be under oath (which, of course, implies a legal and binding oath), we have thought it best for this occasion, until provision can be made by law, to submit to the Senate a proposition that the Chief Justice of the United States be invited to attend at one o'clock to-day to administer these oaths, there being no question about his authority to do so. Therefore, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this portion of Rule 3 which I have read, respecting the administration of the oath by the Presiding Officer, shall be suspended for this day; and if that be unanimously agreed to, as of course it requires unanimous consent to suspend this rule, I shall then offer an order which will accomplish the next step in the matter.

In accordance with this suggestion the rule was suspended, and the order referred to by Mr. Edmunds was submitted and agreed to.

To remedy this difficulty a bill was prepared, passed both Houses, and was approved by the President on April 18, 1876.[2] This empowers the Presiding Officer of the Senate for the time being to administer all oaths or affirmations that are or may be required by the Constitution or by law to be taken by any Senator, officer of the Senate, witness, or other person, in respect to any matter within the jurisdiction of the Senate. Also the Secretary and Chief Clerk of the Senate are respectively empowered to administer any oath or affirmation required by law, or by the rules or orders of the Senate to be taken by any officer of the Senate, or by any witness produced before it.

In accordance with this law the President pro tempore, on April 27,[3] administered the oath required of Senators sitting for impeachment trials, to Mr. Bainbridge Wadleigh, of New Hampshire.

2082. When the President of the United States is impeached the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court presides.

When the Chief Justice is to preside at an impeachment trial the Presiding Officer of the Senate is required by rule to give him notice of time and place and request his attendance.

The Senate by rule have implied that the Chief Justice attends and presides only after the articles of impeachment have been presented.

In 1868 the Senate eliminated from its rules all mention of itself as a "high court of impeachment."

Present form and history of Rule IV of the Senate sitting for impeachment trials.

Rule IV of the "Rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials," provides:

When the President of the United States or the Vice-President of the United States, upon whom the powers and duties of the office of President shall have devolved, shall be impeached, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States shall preside; and in a case requiring the said Chief Justice to preside notice shall be given to him by the Presiding Officer of the Senate of the time and place fixed for the consideration of the articles of impeachment, as aforesaid, with a request to attend; and the said Chief Justice shall preside over the Senate during the consideration of said articles and upon the trial of the person impeached therein.

The discussion of the constitutional status of the Senate in impeachment proceedings, incident to the adoption of rules in 1868, resulted in the present form of the rule. The committee having the subject of rules under consideration at that time, reported [1] it as a new rule in form as follows:

IV. The Presiding Officer of the Senate shall be the presiding officer of the high court of impeachment, except when the President of the United States, or the Vice-President of the United States upon whom the powers and duties of the office of President shall have devolved, shall be impeached, in which case the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States shall preside; and in a case requiring the said Chief Justice to preside, notice shall be given to him by the Presiding Officer of the Senate of the time and place fixed for the organization of the high court of impeachment as aforesaid, with a request to attend, and he shall preside over said court until its final adjournment.

On March 2,[2] after the debate as to the use of the words "high court of impeachment," amendments were offered by Mr. Orris S. Ferry, of Connecticut, and agreed to, which brought the rule to its present form. The debate on this rule showed the understanding to be that the Chief Justice should not be notified to attend and preside until after the articles of impeachment had been presented.

2083. In impeachments the Presiding Officer of the Senate is empowered by rule to make and issue, by himself or by the Secretary, authorized orders, writs, precepts, and regulations.

Present form and history of Rule V of the Senate sitting for impeachment trials.

Rule V of the "Rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials," provides:

The Presiding Officer shall have power to make and issue, by himself or by the Secretary of the Senate, all orders, mandates, writs, and precepts authorized by these rules or by the Senate, and to make and enforce such other regulations and orders in the premises as the Senate may authorize or provide.

[2] Senate Journal, p. 812; Globe, pp. 1602, 1603.

This rule dates from 1868, when it was reported[1] in nearly its present form by the committee having in charge the rules to be adopted in view of the impeachment of President Johnson. It was changed to its present form by substituting the word "Senate" for "Court" in two places, in accordance with conclusions arrived at after discussion as to the constitutional status of the Senate.[2]

2084. The preparations in the Senate Chamber for an impeachment trial are directed by the Presiding Officer of the Senate.

During an impeachment trial the Presiding Officer on the trial directs all forms not otherwise specially provided for.

The Presiding Officer on an impeachment trial may make preliminary rulings on questions of evidence and incidental questions or may submit such questions to the Senate at once.

The preliminary rulings of the Presiding Officer on an impeacnment trial stand as the judgments of the Senate, unless some Senator requires a vote.

On questions of evidence and incidental questions arising during an impeachment trial the voting is without division unless the yeas and nays are demanded by one-fifth.

Discussion of the propriety of the Presiding Officer on an impeachment making a preliminary decision on questions of evidence.

Discussions of the functions of the Chief Justice in decisions as to evidence in an impeachment trial.

In the Johnson trial Chief Justice Chase held that the managers might not appeal from a decision of the Presiding Officer as to evidence.

Present form and history of Rule VII of the Senate sitting for impeachment trials.

Rule VII of the "Rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials," is as follows:

The Presiding Officer of the Senate shall direct all necessary preparations in the Senate Chamber, and the Presiding Officer on the trial shall direct all the forms of proceedings while the Senate is sitting for the purpose of trying an impeachment, and all forms during the trial not otherwise specially provided for. And the Presiding Officer on the trial may rule all questions of evidence and incidental questions, which ruling shall stand as the judgment of the Senate, unless some Member of the Senate shall ask that a formal vote be taken thereon, in which case it shall be submitted to the Senate for decision; or he may at his option, in the first instance, submit any such question to a vote of the Members of the Senate. Upon all such questions the vote shall be without a division, unless the yeas and nays be demanded by one-fifth of the Members present, when the same shall be taken.

The first sentence of the rule is the substance of Rule VII, adopted in 1805,[3] at the time of the trial of Judge Chase. In 1868, at the time of the proceedings for the impeachment of President Johnson, the committee of which Mr. Jacob M. Howard, of Michigan, was chairman, reported[4] it in substantially its present form. In the first draft the word "court" was generally used instead of "Senate;" but in accordance with a general principle established at that time that phraseology was changed.[1] Also the draft reported from the committee did not contain the last sentence of the present form.

On March 2,[2] while the report was under debate, Mr. Charles D. Drake, of Missouri, moved to strike out these words:

And the Presiding Officer of the court may rule all questions of evidence and incidental questions, which rulings shall stand as the judgment of the court, unless some member of the court shall ask that a formal vote be taken thereon, in which case it shall be submitted to the court for decision; or he may, at his option, in the first instance, submit any such question to a vote of the members of the court, and insert in lieu thereof:

The Presiding Officer may, in the first instance, submit to the Senate, without a division, all questions of evidence and incidental questions, but the same shall, on the demand of one-fifth of the Members present, be decided by yeas and nays.

The words to be inserted were suggested by Mr. Jacob M. Howard, of Michigan.

A long debate resulted on this motion.

Mr. Drake explained his reasons:

The Constitution simply says that when the President of the United States is tried the Chief Justice shall preside. In that position he has just exactly the same powers and functions that the Vice-President would have in any other case of impeachment, and no more. Now, sir, any man in the country, whether a lawyer or not, may, in the course of events, come to fill the position of Vice-President of the United States. Suppose that a man who had never been a lawyer, never made law his study, and did not know anything at all about the complex rules of evidence in the courts of justice were to be elevated to the Vice-Presidency, and the Senate should consist, as it does now, of a large majority of those who have made the law their study during a large portion of their lives, and he should be set up in the chair as the Presiding Officer of that body to decide questions of law I will venture to say that the Senate would regard it as quite preposterous.

Now, sir, why should we set the Chief Justice there to decide these questions? We can not do it, in my opinion, without a violation of the spirit of the Constitution, which does not entitle him to any more prerogatives as the Presiding Officer of the court than the Vice-President would have in other cases.

But, sir, there is a very grave objection to this. Even taking the distinguished Chief Justice of the United States, so justly distinguished for his great mind and his great knowledge of the law, it is not proper, it is not judicious, it is not for the purposes of justice expedient that the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, should ever be brought to the point of overruling a decision made by the Chief Justice of the United States sitting in the chair as the Presiding Officer of the court. It is not proper that the judgment of the Senate upon questions of law, which it must ultimately decide, if a single Senator demands its decision, should be warped, or if not warped, in any degree affected by the previous announcement of an opinion upon that question by so high a judicial officer as the Chief Justice.

Sir, it might be that, on some future occasion, when a President of the United States should be impeached again, the Chief Justice might be a very strong opponent of his, or a very strong advocate of his, and that his decisions might be influenced one way or the other by the personal considerations or the political considerations which bound him to the President or made him the President's opponent. Under these circumstances, it is not wise or judicious, in my opinion, that we should lay down a rule, not only for this trial but for all other trials, which might bring the Chief Justice, sitting as our Presiding Officer, in continual conflict with the Senate. Let the Senate decide its own questions of law. Let it not, by simple acquiescence, put the Chief Justice there to decide these questions of law. Let them come up to the work themselves and pronounce their own decision, without the necessity of appealing from his decision, and being brought into antagonism with him.

[6] Senate Journal, pp. 247, 248; Globe, pp. 1595–1602.

Mr. John Sherman, of Ohio, opposed this view on the ground that the trial would be unnecessarily prolonged were the preliminary decision taken from the Presiding Officer. That was the function of every presiding officer, and he considered that "a departure from the ordinary customs and courtesies extended to presiding officers, especially in a case where the Presiding Officer was made so by the Constitution of the United States," would be a very remarkable circumstance.

Mr. George H. Williams, of Oregon, argued elaborately in the same line:

I say that the Senators alone do not constitute a perfect Senate, but the Vice-President of the United States is a part of the Senate, and has certain functions to perform as a part of the Senate, and his right to vote as an officer of the Senate is recognized under certain circumstances. When the Senators are equally divided, he has a right to vote, for the language is:

"The Vice-President of the United States shall be President of the Senate, but shall have no vote unless they be equally divided."

That is, unless the Senators be equally divided he shall have no vote; but, if they are equally divided, then he is to have a vote. Certainly he could have no vote under any circumstances unless he did, for certain purposes at any rate, constitute a part of the Senate. Then the Constitution provides that—

"The Senate shall choose their other officers, and also a President pro tempore, in the absence of the Vice-President or when he shall exercise the office of President of the United States."

Then it says:

"The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments."

Does that mean solely and exclusively; that the Senators shall have the sole power to try all impeachments; or does it mean that the Senate as an organized body, constituted under the provisions of the Constitution, shall try an impeachment? I say that it means that the Senate, with the Vice-President of the United States presiding, and the Constitution contemplates that he is to participate in the trial of every impeachment, except where the President of the United States is upon trial.

"When sitting for that purpose they shall be on oath or affirmation."

Does that mean that the Senators alone shall be upon oath or affirmation, or does it mean that the Senate, that all the constituent Members of the Senate who participate in the trial, shall be upon oath or affirmation?

"When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside."

Now, sir, I understand the Constitution to make the Chief Justice of the United States a part of the Senate when it is engaged in trying an impeachment against the President of the United States. I do not undertake to say that he possesses the power to vote like a Senator; I will not make that declaration at this time; but he is a part of the Senate, and I maintain that the Senate, by its rules, may confer upon him such powers as it sees proper in the proceedings of the trial. He is not to be treated, when the Constitution requires him to come here and preside over this body, as a stranger and an interloper, because, under the Constitution, he has as much right to be here as any Member of this body. It is as much his duty to be here as it is the duty of any Member of this body to be here; and if he is here under the Constitution, he is here for certain purposes and must necessarily possess the powers of a presiding officer. Why should there be evinced a kind of jealousy, as it seems to me, on the part of the Senate, lest if the Chief Justice comes in here he may assume to exercise powers which do not belong to him? Are we to assume that position, and hence refuse to give to him those rights and powers and privileges which the Constitution contemplates he should have?

It seems to me that there is a perfect propriety, when the Constitution compels him to come here and preside upon the trial of the President, in allowing him, in the first instance, to decide in that court as he would in the other court where he presides as Chief Justice.

Mr. Thomas A. Hendricks, of Indiana, while not holding that the Chief Justice might vote, considered it eminently proper that he should exercise a preliminary decision:

In the first place, he is an eminent judge, because of his position. Is he not competent, in all probability, to correctly and safely decide the questions that are likely to arise during the progress of the trial? In his office as Chief Justice he participates in the greatest decisions that are made in any court in the world, and as a judge of one of the circuits he presides over the controversies incident to life and property. Shall he not be heard to express in the first place for the Senate a judgment, and if not agreeable, the Senate shall say it is not agreeable? What harm can come of it? It brings the question directly before the body, promptly, conveniently, safely, prudently, in my opinion.

But if he is not to participate that far, to say the least of it, in the business of the body, why has the Constitution been so careful to have him here? Certainly for the purpose merely of presiding and seeing that good order is preserved in the body the Constitution would not be so careful that he should preside. Some power, it is presumed, is to be exercised by him. The Constitution presumes that and what power? To decide questions as they arise in the progress of the case, as questions ordinarily are decided, though subject, of course, to the superior will of the Senate.

Mr. Roscoe Conkling, of New York, who took the view advanced by Mr. Drake, cited precedents:

We may gain information at this point from the practice and precedents under the British constitution. "The House of Lords," called at times "the court of the King in Parliament," was, like the Senate, an entirety; an ascertained, defined body. There was a presiding officer at all times, and his existence and ministration was derived from the constitution as much as from our Constitution proceeds the existence of a presiding officer here. This presiding officer was sometimes a member of the House of Lords—taken from the body to preside in it, as our Presiding Officer for several sessions has been taken from the Members of the Senate. Sometimes the presiding officer in the Lords was made a member of the body contemporaneously with his installment as presiding officer—not having been a peer before, he was ennobled at the time and thus became a member. Sometimes not being a peer, and therefore not a member of the Lords, he presided without a peerage being conferred, and thus he was presiding officer, with all the prerogatives appurtenant to the presiding chair, but still was not a member of the body. By turning to the powers accorded to the Lord Chancellor as presiding officer, and to the duties and prerogatives of the lord high steward of England in the trial of impeachments, we may be able to measure the force of the expression, "When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside." A distinction has been made between the right to vote and to decide of the lord high steward between a trial before the Lords in Parliament—that is to say before the House of Lords at large and a trial before a commission of the peers. It has been insisted that the lord steward never participated in the decision if the trial was before a chosen number of the peers, but that he did take part in judgment and decision when the trial was before the House of Lords in full. Lord Campbell, in his Lives of the Chancellors, refers to this distinction; so does May in his Law of Parliament. But the journal of the House of Lords affords no reason to believe that such a difference of practice in the two tribunals was observed. On the contrary, the question whether the lord steward had or had not a vote or a voice in giving judgment seems to have hinged entirely upon his being merely a presiding officer or being also a member of the House of Lords itself. In virtue of his place as presiding officer he seems in no case to have participated in voting or determining the cause. His right and power and designation to preside seems never to have been supposed to carry with it any permission or obligation to join in deciding questions submitted to the tribunal. In many instances the lord high steward did vote, however, in trials of impeachment, but always in virtue of his being a member of the House, independent of the fact that he was also its presiding officer.

To substantiate this I refer, first, to the case of the Earl of Ferrers, brought to the bar in 1760. The case is reported at length by Sir Michael Foster, one of the judges of the court of king's bench. The earl having been convicted, the House propounded to the judges two questions, one of which went to the power of the presiding officer and of the House without the presiding officer. The judges answered the questions after deliberation, in writing, and the reasoning appears in Foster's Crown Law at page 138 and onward. I read from page 143. Having discussed some matters incident to a trial of a peer before a commission of peers he proceeds:

"But in a trial of a peer in full Parliament, or, to speak with legal precision, before the King in Parliament, of a capital offense, whether upon impeachment or indictment, the case is quite otherwise. Every peer present at the trial (and every temporal peer hath a right to be present in every part of the proceeding) voteth upon every question of law and fact, and the question is carried by the major vote, the high steward himself voting merely as a peer and member of that court in common with the rest of the peers, and in no other right.

"It hath indeed been usual, and very expedient it is in point of order and regularity, and for the solemnity of the proceeding, to appoint an officer for presiding during the time of the trial and until judgment, and to give him the style and title of steward of England. But this maketh no sort of alteration in the constitution of the court. It is the same court founded in immemorial usage, in the law and custom of Parliament, whether such appointment be made or not.

"It acteth in its judicial capacity in every order made touching the time and place of the trial, the postponing the trial from time to time upon petition according to the nature and circumstance of the case, the allowance or nonallowance of counsel to the prisoner, and other matters relative to the trial, and all this before an high steward hath been appointed; and so little was it apprehended in some cases which I shall mention presently, that the existence of the court depended on the appointment of an high steward, that the court itself directed in what manner and by what form of words he should be appointed. It hath likewise received and recorded the prisoner's confession, which amounteth to a conviction, before the appointment of an high steward, and hath allowed to prisoners the benefit of acts of general pardon, where they appeared entitled to it, as well without the appointment of an high steward as after his commission dissolved."

On the next page, referring to the case of the Earl of Danby, he states certain proceedings between the two Houses of Parliament, and remarks—

"That the Lords' committees said 'The High Steward is but Speaker pro tempore, and giveth his vote as well as the other Lords.' "

And upon this appears the following entry:

"In the Commons' Journal of the 15th of May it standeth thus: Their lordships farther declared to the committee that a Lord High Steward was made hac vice only, that notwithstanding the making of a Lord High Steward the court remained the same and was not thereby altered, but still remained the court of peers in Parliament; that the Lord High Steward was but as a speaker or chairman for the more orderly proceeding at the trials."

This the Commons wished entered on the Lords' Journal.

On page 147, speaking of the law as laid down by the Lords, Sir Michael says:

"The letter of the resolution, it is admitted, goeth no farther, but this is easily accounted for. A proceeding by impeachment was the subject-matter of the conference, and the Commons had no pretense to interpose any other. But what say the Lords? The High Steward is but as a speaker or chairman pro tempore for the more orderly proceeding at the trials; the appointment of him doth not alter the nature of the court, which still remaineth the court of the peers in Parliament. From these premises they draw the conclusion I have mentioned. Are not these premises equally true in the case of a proceeding upon indictment? They undoubtedly are."

This case and the authorities referred to in stating it seem to make it clear that the immemorial understanding in England has been that the officer whose duty it is to preside at trials of impeachment has definite functions, convenient and conducive to order, and the dispatch of business, and that the duty to vote or to decide is not among his duties or his powers. The fact of his presiding or of his being authorized or commissioned to preside, according to these cases, carries with it no right to act as a trier or a member. The same doctrine will be found in Sharswood's Blackstone, at pages 261 and 262 of the second volume. Lord Campbell, in the third volume of his Lives of the Chancellors, page 557, refers to the case of Lord Dellamere, tried in 1686 for complicity with Monmouth. Jeffries was Lord High Steward and seems to have conducted himself with all the brutality to have been expected of him. He began by a harangue to the culprit, urging him, in the presence of the king, to confess. Dellamere interposed to inquire if he was to be one of his judges, to which the Lord High Steward replied, "No, my Lord; I am judge of the court, but I am none of your triers." This trial was not before the House of Lords, but before a commission of peers, and in so far it is not a literal precedent. Here are other cases of antiquity and of note, more or less instructive, cases in which the presiding officer voted, not apparently sui juris, but by reason of his peerage.

In the trial of Lord Lovat, impeached by the Commons for high treason in 1746:

"The Lord High Steward, by a list, called every peer by his name, beginning with the lowest baron, and asked them, 'If Simon, Lord Lovat, was guilty of the high treason whereof he stands impeached or not guilty?'

"And thereupon every Lord, standing up uncovered, answered: 'Guilty, upon my honor,' laying his right hand upon his breast.

Which done, the Lord High Steward, standing uncovered at the chair, as he did when he put the question to the other Lords, declared his opinion to the same effect and in the same manner." (27 Lords' Journals, p. 76.)

In the trial of the Earl of Oxford and of Earl Mortimer, impeached in 1717:

"The Lord High Steward stated the question before agreed on, and asked every Lord present severally, 'Whether content or not content?'

"And they all answering in the affirmative, as did the Lord High Steward declare his opinion also:

"The Lord High Steward declared that Robert, Earl of Oxford and Earl Mortimer, was, by the unanimous vote of all the Lords present, acquitted of the articles of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Commons for high treason and other high crimes and misdemeanors, and of all things therein contained." * * * "And then the Lord High Steward stood up uncovered; and, declaring 'that there was nothing more to be done by virtue of the present commission,' broke the staff and pronounced the commission of Lord High Steward dissolved." (20 Lords' Journals, p. 525.)

The same form was observed in the case of Earls Derwentwater et al, impeached for high treason, in 1715.

In Viscount Melville's trial on an impeachment, in 1806, according to the Journal of the House of Lords—

"The Lord Chancellor having asked every Lord present, beginning with the junior baron, 'What says your lordship on this first article?' and the Lords having severally answered thereto, and the Lord Chancellor having declared his opinion also, the said several other questions were in like manner stated, and each Lord was severally asked in manner aforesaid touching the same. And the Lords having severally answered to the same, and the Lord Chancellor having declared his opinion also on each of the said questions, the Lord Chancellor declared that the answer of a majority of the Lords to each of the said questions, respectively, was 'not guilty.'"

Here are cases decided by the Lords without the vote or voice of the presiding officer—cases in which there was a presiding officer with every right as such, but without any participation in the decisions made.

In the case of Lord Chancellor Bacon, in 1621—

"The House (of Lords) being resumed, and the Lord Chief Justice returned to his place, it was put to the question whether the Lord Viscount St. Albans (Lord Chancellor) shall be suspended from all his titles of nobility during his life or no? and it was agreed per plures that he should not be suspended thereof." (40 Lords' Journals, p. 302.)

In Sacheverell's case, impeached in 1709—

"Then his lordship put the question, beginning at the junior baron first, as follows: 'Is Doctor Henry Sacheverell guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors, charged upon him by the impeachment of the House of Commons?'

"And having asked every Lord present, and they having declared guilty or not guilty,

"His lordship having cast up the votes, declared him guilty." (Ibid.)

In the case of the Earl of Macclesfield, in 1725—

"It was agreed that the question to be put to each Lord, severally, shall be, 'Is Thomas, Earl of Macclesfield, guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors charged on him by the impeachment of the House of Commons, or not guilty?'

"And every Lord present shall declare his opinion, 'guilty or not guilty, upon his honor', laying his right hand upon his breast.

"When the Lord Chief Justice, Speaker of this House, directed the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod to bring thither the Earl of Macclesfield, who, after low obeisances made, kneeled until the said Lord Chief Justice acquainted him he might rise. (Judgment pronounced. Record of mode of obtaining the votes of the Lords on each resolution is, 'The question was put thereupon; and it was resolved in the affirmative.'") (Ibid.)

Mr. President, there may be arguments on this point which these precedents do not answer, but. it seems to me, they confront the view presented by the Senator from Oregon. The Lord Chancellor and the Lord High Steward of England, by the British constitution, were invested with the prerogatives and powers of presiding officers. Their attributes were more potential, their sway was greater, the examples of their supremacy were more copious, than the genius of our Constitution would tolerate, And if we ascertain the full measure in the less liberal days of British monarchy of what a presiding officer might do, surrounded by peers and commissioned by the King, we shall not fall short at least of the intention of those who adopted the language to which the Senator referred. The framers of our Constitution were profoundly learned in the practice and the meaning of British law, and the word "preside," when used by them, may well be supposed not to have been selected to convey a greater meaning than had been attached to it in the great struggles of privilege and power from which they had derived the philosophy of government.

The amendment proposed by Mr. Drake was agreed to, yeas 21, nays 7.

On March 31, 1868,[1] at the outset of the trial, on the objection of Mr. Henry Stanbery, counsel for the President, to certain testimony, the Chief Justice ruled that the testimony was competent.

Mr. Charles D. Drake, of Missouri, a Senator, at once objected that the question of the competency of evidence should be determined by the Senate and not by the Presiding Officer.

The Chief Justice[2] thereupon said:

The Chief Justice states to the Senate that in his judgment it is his duty to decide upon questions of evidence in the first instance, and that if any Senator desires that the question shall then be submitted to the Senate it is his duty to submit it. So far as he is aware that has been the usual course of practice in trials of persons impeached in the House of Lords and in the Senate of the United States.

Thereupon Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler, seconded by Messrs. John A. Bingham and George S. Boutwell, urged on behalf of the House of Representatives, (a) that the Chief Justice might not make such preliminary decision, and (b) that such decision having been made by the Chief Justice the managers as well as any Senator might call for a decision of the Senate. In presenting their views the managers quoted at length from English precedents.

The Chief Justice, stating his position more fully, said:

The Chief Justice will state the rule which he conceives to be applicable once more. In this body he is the Presiding Officer; he is so in virtue of his high office under the Constitution. He is Chief Justice of the United States, and therefore, when the President of the United States is tried by the Senate, it is his duty to preside in that body; and, as he understands, he is therefore the President of the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment. The rule of the Senate which applies to this question is the seventh rule, which declares that "the Presiding Officer may, in the first instance, submit to the Senate, without a division, all questions of evidence and incidental questions." He is not required by that rule so to submit those questions in the first instance; but for the dispatch of business, as is usual in the Supreme Court, he expresses his opinion in the first instance. If the Senate, who constitute the court, or any Member of it, desires the opinion of the Senate to be taken, it is his duty then to ask for the opinion of the court.

Mr. Manager Butler having asked whether the right to ask the opinion of the Senate would extend to a manager, the Chief Justice replied:

The Chief Justice thinks not. It must be by the action of the court or a member of it.

The Senate having retired for consultation, Mr. John B. Henderson, of Missouri, proposed an amendment to Rule VII which in effect struck out all after the first sentence of the present draft of the rule and inserted what is now the second sentence. This amendment was agreed to, yeas 31, nays 19, after the Senate had by a vote of yeas 20, nays 30, disagreed to the following declaration proposed by Mr. Drake:

It is the judgment of the Senate that under the Constitution the Chief Justice presiding over the Senate in the pending trial has no privilege of ruling questions of law arising thereon, but that all such questions should be submitted to a decision by the Senate alone.

The last sentence of the rule relating to method of voting was not included by the above proceedings, and on April 1, 1868,[1] when a vote was about to be taken on a question of evidence, Mr. Drake insisted that, under Rule XXIII, and in the absence of a provision in Rule VII, the vote should be taken by yeas and nays. But the Chief Justice decided:

Upon the question of order raised by the Senator from Missouri, the Chair is of opinion that he may submit this question to the Senate without having the yeas and nays taken, unless the yeas and nays are demanded by one-fifth of the Members present.

On April 2, 1868,[2] Mr. Drake proposed the following addition to the rule:

Upon all such questions the vote shall be without a division, unless the yeas and nays be demanded by one-fifth of the Members present or requested by the Presiding Officer, when the same shall be taken.

When the proposition came up for action on the next day, on motion of Mr. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, the words "or requested by the Presiding Officer" were stricken out, and then the amendment as amended was agreed to without division.

Thus the rule attained its present form.

2085. The Presiding Officer during an impeachment trial sometimes rules preliminarily on evidence and cautions or interrogates witnesses.— In the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, the President pro tempore[3] of the Senate presided. On questions arising over the admissibility of testimony he usually submitted the questions directly to the Senate for decision, without expressing a preliminary judgment.[4] In five instances, on questions wherein the principles had already been passed on by the Senate, he ruled.[5] In two cases he ruled on questions not already determined by the Senate, but announced that if counsel requested he would submit the matter.[6]

2086. On February 13, 1805,[7] in the high court of impeachment, during the trial of the case of the United States v. Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, a witness, John Basset, was testifying, when the following occurred:

The WITNESS. The court considered me a good juror, and I was sworn accordingly. After the trial had been gone through, the jury retired to their room. I informed the jury that I thought we should have the book read through.

The President [1] here stopped the witness, and informed him that it was useless waste of time to relate what took place in the room of the jury.

The witness, however, continuing the statement he had previously begun, the President desired him to go on, if it were necessary for the purpose of connecting the testimony he had to give; but to pass over what occurred among the jury as briefly as possible.

2087. On April 1, 1868,[2] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, while Mr. Manager Butler was examining a witness, the Chief Justice,[3] who was presiding, interposed and asked a question of the witness.

Also again, on April 2,[4] the Chief Justice interrogated William E. Chandler, a witness.

2088. An instance wherein a President pro tempore presiding at an impeachment trial declined to entertain an appeal from his decision on a point of order.

Rigid enforcement of the rule that decisions of the Senate sitting for an impeachment trial shall be without debate.

On June 26, 1862,[5] in the high court of impeachment, during the trial of the cause of the United States v. West H. Humphreys, a question arose as to the form in which the court should pronounce judgment, and debate was going on, when Mr. Garrett Davis, of Kentucky, was called to order by Mr. Benjamin F. Wade, of Ohio, who insisted that the rule that "all decisions shall be had by ayes and noes and without debate," should be enforced.

The President pro tempore [6] said:

The rule is very explicit, leaves no room for doubt that these questions are to be decided without debate.[7]

Mr. Davis then proposed an appeal from the decision.

The President pro tempore declined to entertain the appeal.

The President pro tempore did not explain this decision, but when Mr. John P. Hale, of New Hampshire, questioned it, Mr. O. H. Browning, of Illinois, said:

I think an appeal can not be taken from the judgment of the presiding officer of a court.

2089. The Senate elected a presiding officer for the Swayne trial, and gave him the powers of the President of the Senate for signing orders, writs, etc.—On January 24, 1905,[8] the President pro tempore (William P. Frye, of Maine) in the Senate sitting in legislative session, requested that he be relieved of the duty of presiding at the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne. Thereupon the Senate chose Mr. Orville H. Platt, of Connecticut, as presiding officer for the trial.

[8] Third session Fifty-eighth Congress, Record, pp. 1289, 1291.

On the same day Mr. John C. Spooner, of Wisconsin, chairman of the Committee on Rules, made a statement as follows:

Mr. President, the rules of the Senate governing the sessions of the Senate when it is sitting in the trial of impeachments seems to draw a distinction between the Presiding Officer of the Senate and the presiding officer on the trial. Rule V provides:

"The Presiding Officer shall have power to make and issue, by himself or by the Secretary of the Senate, all orders, mandates, writs, and precepts authorized by these rules, or by the Senate, and to make and enforce such other regulations and orders in the premises as the Senate may authorize or provide."

The forms of summonses and subpœnas are all signed by the Presiding Officer of the Senate. In order to remove all possible question as to who shall sign the mandates of the Senate, including subpœnas, I offer the regulation which I send to the desk. * * *

The Constitution invests each House with the power, without limit, to make ts own rules of procedure. Under the Constitution the function of trying impeachment cases devolves upon the Senate, and the provision of the Constitution must be construed as authorizing the Senate to make the rules which it may deem necessary for the proper discharge of all of the duties and functions devolved upon it by the Constitution. The Senate has, I think, within its power and with perfect propriety under the circumstances, appointed a Senator to preside, using the language of the rule to be, "the presiding officer on the trial." That clearly vests in him the functions, as I think, of passing upon the admissibility of evidence and upon the various questions which may arise in the course of the trial.

This question is one which must be determined at once, for a summons is to be issued to Judge Swayne to appear, and it is important, of course, that there shall be no doubt that the officer signing the summons has the power to do so.

Mr. Spooner offered the following resolution, which was agreed to by the Senate:

Resolved, That the presiding officer on the trial of the impeachment of Charles Swayne, judge of the United States in and for the northern district of Florida, be, and is hereby, authorized to sign all orders, mandates, writs, and precepts authorized by the rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials and by the Senate.

2090. The Secretary of the Senate records proceedings in impeachments as he records legislative proceedings.

The proceedings of an impeachment trial are reported like the legislative proceedings.

Present form and history of Rule XIII of the Senate sitting for impeachments.

Rule XIII of the "Rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials" is as follows:

The Secretary of the Senate shall record the proceedings in cases of impeachment as in the case of legislative proceedings, and the same shall be reported in the same manner as the legislative proceedings of the Senate.

This rule was framed in 1868,[1] preparatory to the impeachment of President Johnson.

2091. In an impeachment trial all preliminary or interlocutory questions and all motions are argued not over an hour on a side.

The Senate, by order, may extend the time for the argument of motions and interlocutory questions in impeachment trials.

In arguing interlocutory questions in impeachment trials the opening and closing belong to the side making the motion or objection.

[1] Second session Fortieth Congress, Senate Report No. 59; Senate Journal, p. 813; Globe, p. 1568.

The Senate declined to sanction unlimited argument on interlocutory questions in impeachment trials.

The rule limiting the time of arguments on interlocutory questions in impeachment trials does not limit the number of persons speaking.

Present form and history of Rule XX of the Senate sitting for the trial of an impeachment.

Rule XX of the "rules of procedure and practice for the Senate when sitting in impeachment trials" is as follows:

All preliminary or interlocutory questions and all motions shall be argued for not exceeding one hour on each side, unless the Senate shall, by order, extend the time.

This rule dates from 1868, when the rules were revised preparatory to the trial of President Johnson. The committee, of which Mr. Jacob M. Howard, of Michigan, was chairman, reported [1] the rule in this form:

XX. All preliminary or interlocutory questions and all motions shall be argued by one person only on each side, and for not exceeding one hour on each side, unless the court shall, by order, extend the time.

This rule was debated at great length and amended to its present form on March 2.[2] It was first objected by Mr. Charles D. Drake, of Missouri, that there should be a provision giving the opening and closing to the one making the motion or objection, and also dividing the time. Mr. Roscoe Conkling, however, answered this satisfactorily by saying that the committee had considered the question, and concluded that the provisions would be unnecessary, since it was habitual for the counsel making the motion or raising the objection to yield after taking a portion of his time, and then conclude after his opponent. The committee conceived that this would be the practice under this rule.

Mr. Frederick T. Frelinghuysen, of New Jersey, moved an amendment striking out the provision limiting the argument to one person on each side, which was agreed to without division. A motion by Mr. Frelinghuysen to change the time limit from one to two hours was disagreed to, yeas 20, nays 24, and a third amendment proposed by him, to add at the end the words "before the argument commences," was disagreed to—yeas 10, nays 33.

Mr. James W. Grimes, of Iowa, proposed to strike out the rule altogether, as contrary to the Senate's practice of unlimited debate, and as an innovation on the practice of all preceding impeachment trials. It was argued that interlocutory questions might be of the greatest importance, and that the argument thus limited might be one on which the result hinged. On the other hand, it was urged that impeachment trials, notably in England, were often prolonged, and that the Senate should provide against this at the outset. The motion to strike out was disagreed to—yeas 19, nays 23.

So the rule was left in its present form.

2092. On April 1, 1868,[1] during the trial of President Johnson, a question arose, and the Chief Justice[2] said:

Senators, the Chair will state the question to the Senate. The twentieth rule provides that—

"All preliminary or interlocutory questions and all motions shall be argued for not exceeding one hour on each side, unless the Senate shall, by order, extend the time."

The twenty-first rule provides:

"The case on each side shall be opened by one person. The final argument on the merits may be made by two persons on each side (unless otherwise ordered by the Senate upon application for that purpose), and the argument shall be opened and closed on the part of the House of Representatives."

On looking at these two rules together, the Chief Justice was under the impression that it was intended by the twentieth rule to limit the time, and not limit the persons; whereas, by the twenty-first rule, it was intended to limit the number of persons and leave the time unlimited; and he has acted upon that construction. He will now, with the leave of the Senate, submit to them the question: Does the twentieth rule limit the time without respect to the number of persons? Upon that question the Chair will take the sense of the Senate.

The question being put, it was decided in the affirmative nem. con.

The Chief Justice then said:

The Senate decides that the limitation of one hour has reference to the whole number of persons to speak on each side, and not to each person severally; and will apply the rule as thus construed.

2093. On April 27, 1876,[3] during the proceedings in the trial of W. W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, the counsel for the respondent moved a postponement of the further hearing of the case until the first Monday of the next December, and for the discussion of this motion Mr. Matt H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, asked that the Senate make an order temporarily modifying the rule, so as to admit of two hours on a side. This request was granted by the Senate by a vote of yeas 48, nays 13, an order to that effect being offered and acted on at the same sitting.

2094. In impeachment trials all orders and decisions of the Senate, with certain specified exceptions, are by the yeas and nays.

During impeachment trials in the Senate the yeas and nays on adjournment are procured by one-fifth and not by rule.

The orders and decisions of the Senate in impeachment cases are without debate, unles in secret session.

Debate in secret session of the Senate sitting on impeachment trials is limited by rule.

On the decision of the final question in an impeachment case, debate in secret session of the Senate is limited to fifteen minutes to each Senator.

Present form and history of Rule XXIII of the Senate sitting for impeachment trials.

Rule XXIII of the "rules of procedure and practice for the Senate when sitting in impeachment trials" provides:

All the orders and decisions shall be made and had by yeas and nays, which shall be entered on the record, and without debate, subject, however, to the operation of Rule VII, except when the doors shall be closed for deliberation, and in that case no Member shall speak more than once on one question, and for not more than ten minutes on an interlocutory question, and for not more than fifteen minutes on the final question, unless by consent of the Senate, to be had without debate; but a motion to adjourn may be decided without the yeas and nays, unless they be demanded by one-fifth of the members present. The fifteen minutes herein allowed shall be for the whole deliberation on the final question, and not to the final question on each article of impeachment.

[1] Globe Supplement, p. 70.

This rule dates from 1868,[1] when a committee reported a revision in preparation for the trial of President Johnson. The rule was debated on March 2[2] and was amended in matters of detail, so it stood practically in its present form as far as the last sentence, which had not at that time been added.

On March 13,[3] in the Senate as organized for the trial, Mr. Roscoe Conkling, of New York, arose and said:

To correct a clerical error in the rules or a mistake of the types which has introduced a repugnance into the rules, I offer the following resolution by direction of the committee which reported the rules:

"Ordered, That the twenty-third rule, respecting proceedings on trial of impeachments, be amended by inserting after the word 'debate' the words 'subject, however, to the operation of rule seven.'"

If thus amended the rule will read:

"All orders and decisions shall be made and had by yeas and nays, which shall be entered on the record and without debate, subject, however, to the operation of rule seven, except when the doors shall be closed, etc."

The whole object is to commit to the Presiding Officer the option to submit a question without the call of the yeas and nays, unless they be demanded. That was the intention originally, but the qualifying words were dropped out in the print.

The order was agreed to without division.

The last sentence of the rule, "the fifteen minutes herein allowed," etc., was added on March 7, 1868, on motion of Mr. Charles Drake, of Missouri, immediately before the Senate proceeded to pronounce judgment in the case of President Johnson.[4]

On July 31, 1876,[5] when the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, was about to proceed to judgment, Mr. Hannibal Hamlin, a Senator from Maine, proposed an amendment which would have stricken out the words "except when the doors shall be closed for deliberation." This amendment was proposed in connection with one to Rule XIX, which would have abolished secret sessions in impeachment trials. The Senate, by a vote of yeas 23, nays 32, declined to consider either amendment.

2095. In the Senate, sitting for impeachment trials, the doors may be closed for consultation on motion put and carried.—On February 16, 1905,[6] in the Senate, sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, a question arose as to the admissibility of certain evidence, and Mr. Joseph W. Bailey, a Senator from Texas, moved that the doors be closed for deliberation, or, in case the motion should be otherwise, that the Senate retire to its conference chamber.

A question arose as to the interpretation of the rule, and the Presiding Officer said:

The rule is as follows:

"All the orders and decisions shall be made and had by yeas and nays, which shall be entered on the record, and without debate, subject, however, to the operation of Rule VII, except when the doors shall be closed for deliberation, and in that case no Member shall speak more than once on one question, and for not more than ten minutes on an interlocutory question, and for not more than fifteen minutes on the final question, unless by consent of the Senate, to be had without debate."

The Presiding Officer is of the opinion that the consent of the Senate applies to the time during which a Senator may speak upon a question, and not to the question whether the Senate may proceed in the Senate Chamber as a court without closing the doors.

Mr. Bailey thereupon asked unanimous consent that the doors be closed. There being objection, he made a motion.

The Presiding Officer said:

The Presiding Offier will submit the motion to the Senate. Will the Senate order the doors to be closed for the purpose of deliberating upon the question?

There appeared yeas 53, nays 18. So the doors were closed.

2096. Secret sessions of the Senate to discuss incidental questions arising during an impeachment trial.—On May 14, 1876,[1] in the Senate, sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, the doors were closed and the galleries cleared, while deliberation was going on as to the question of the jurisdiction of the Senate to try a civil officer who had resigned and whose resignation had been accepted. And the Senate continued to deliberate with closed doors until the decision of the question, on May 29.

2097. On July 19, 1876,[2] in the Senate, sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, it was ordered that the floor and galleries be cleared, and that the doors be closed. The session thereupon was held in secret, while determination was reached as to certain propositions relating to the time of beginning the taking of testimony, to the filing of a paper presented by counsel for respondent, and to the propriety of continuing the trial at a time when the House of Representatives was not in session.

2098. On the final question whether an impeachment is sustained, the yeas and nays are taken on each article separately.

If an impeachment is not sustained by a two-thirds vote on any article a judgment of acquittal shall be entered.

If the respondent be convicted by a two-thirds vote on any article of impeachment the Senate shall pronounce judgment.

A certified copy of the judgment in an impeachment case is deposited with the Secretary of State.

[2] First session Forty-fourth Congress, Journal of Senate, p. 954; Record of trial, p. 172.

Rule XXII of the "rules of procedure and practice for the Senate when sitting in impeachment trials" is as follows:

On the final question whether the impeachment is sustained, the yeas and nays shall be taken on each article of impeachment separately; and if the impeachment shall not, upon any of the articles presented, be sustained by the votes of two-thirds of the Members present, a judgment of acquittal shall be entered; but if the person accused in such articles of impeachment shall be convicted upon any of said articles by the votes of two-thirds of the Members present, the Senate shall proceed to pronounce judgment, and a certified copy of such judgment shall be deposited in the office of the Secretary of State.

This rule was framed in 1868,[1] when a committee, of which Mr. Jacob M. Howard, of Michigan, was chairman, reported a revision of the rules in view of the approaching trial of President Johnson. As reported the rule was as follows:

XXII. If the impeachment shall not be sustained by the votes of two-thirds of the Members of said high court of impeachment present and voting a judgment of acquittal shall be entered; but if the person accused in such articles of impeachment shall be convicted by the votes of two-thirds of the Members of such court present the court, by its Presiding Officer, shall proceed to pronounce judgment, and a certified copy of such judgment shall be deposited in the office of the Secretary of State.

On motion of Mr. Frederick T. Frelinghuysen, of New Jersey, and without division, an amendment was inserted[2] at the beginning, in the following words:

On the final question, whether the impeachment is sustained, the yeas and nays shall be taken on each article of impeachment separately and;

Then Mr. Lot M. Morrill, of Maine, proposed an amendment[3] so changing the first clause of the rule that it would read:

On the final question, whether the impeachment is sustained, the yeas and nays shall be taken on each article of impeachment separately, and if the impeachment shall not be sustained by the votes of two-thirds of the Senators present a judgment of acquittal shall be entered.

This proposition, by substituting the words "Senators" for "high court of impeachment," brought up the question as to whether or not the Chief Justice would have a vote. Mr. John Sherman, of Ohio, said:

Now, if a Presiding Officer is elected by the Senate, either on account of the sickness or absence or inability of the Vice-President to preside, he would undoubtedly have a right to vote. The Presiding Officer would undoubtedly have a right to vote, because he is not only a Senator having a personal right to his seat as a Senator, but he is a representative of a State, and that State would have a right to vote; and his mere election as Presiding Officer would not disfranchise him from voting.

Under these circumstances, when the President is to be tried, the Constitution declares, the Senate still having the sole power to try all impeachments, that the Chief Justice shall preside over that tribunal. What does that mean? That he shall be here simply as a figurehead? No, sir. In every case where a man is made the presiding officer of any tribunal, of any convention, of any political body, it necessarily implies the right to vote, unless that implication is excluded by the instrument itself. There is no doubt whatever but that the Vice-President of the United States could vote every day in our proceedings but for one thing; and that is, that the Constitution carefully excludes him from the right to vote except in case of a tie. But who doubts that but for that single clause of the Constitution which declares that the Vice-President of the United States shall not vote except in case of a tie he could do it? Suppose the clause read "the Vice-President of the United States shall be President of the Senate;" suppose it stopped there; would not the Vice-President have a right to vote? The very implication drawn from the fact that he is the Presiding Officer of the Senate would give him a vote; but it goes on and says, "but shall have no vote unless they be equally divided." The very fact that this language was used to exclude him from the right to vote shows that in the absence of that language he would have the right to vote.

And, sir, when the Chief Justice is substituted in the place of the Presiding Officer of this body, without any exclusion from the right to vote, without any exception made as against him, he is made a member of this court, to participate in the proceedings of this court; and it does seem to me, in the absence of all other precedents of exclusion or constitutional provision, he would have a right to vote. I do not know that the Chief Justice would take the same view of it or desire to vote, but it does seem to me that the Constitution, by substituting this high officer here as the Presiding Officer of this body, did not intend to make him a mere instrument or medium to put a question to the body, but intended to make him a part of the tribunal or court to try the case.

Mr. Howard, of Michigan, said:

The amendment of the Senator from Maine adopts, in effect, the language of the Constitution itself, as I understand it; and so far I think it entirely proper to be adopted. I must, however, now and at all times, so far as I can see my way, repel the idea that the Chief Justice is a member of the so-called court of impeachment, or has any right to vote during the deliberations of that court, or upon any question arising during the trial. I do not propose to go into it further now, although I see the gravity of the question, and have for some time been entirely sensible of it.

I will say, however, before I take my seat, that if we regard the analogies presented to us in the constitutional history of England, the same result which I claim to be the truth here will be arrived at. The House of Lords sit as a high court of impeachment. They are presided over when thus sitting either by the Lord Chancellor or the Lord High Steward; and the precedents are numerous and clear that the Lord Chancellor, although thus presiding, or the Lord Steward thus presiding, has no vote in the House of Lords in virtue of his presidency of the body; but if he be a peer he has, in right of his peerage, the right to vote; but it is put upon that ground, and that ground only. As president of the body he has no right even to decide questions where the body is equally divided.

Mr. Roscoe Conkling, of New York, referred to the important question raised and suggested that, to avoid that question, the amendment be modified so as to read "members present" instead of "Senators present." That would be the very language of the Constitution.

Mr. Morrill finally yielded to that request and the modified amendment was agreed to without division.

A little later the Senate recurred to Rule VII again, and after discussion of the powers of the Chief Justice in presiding, determined upon such amendment of that and other rules as to eliminate the words "high court of impeachment" wherever they occurred, the object evidently being to remove all idea that the Chief Justice had any other function than to preside.[1] In fact, the Chief Justice did vote on an occasion when the vote of the Senate was a tie,[2] on March 31, but did not vote in the final judgment.[3]

Mr. Peter G. VanWinkle, of West Virginia, then proposed[4] an amendment to the second clause so it should read as follows:

But if the person accused in such articles of impeachment shall be convicted by the votes of two-thirds of the members of such court present, the court shall proceed to ascertain what judgment shall be rendered in the case, which judgment, being rendered, shall be pronounced by the Presiding Officer, etc.

This was in view of the fact that the Constitution does not say that the punishment shall necessarily extend to disqualification to hold office. Mr. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, suggested that the same result could be attained by striking out the words "of such court" and "by its Presiding Officer." Mr. VanWinkle accepted the amendment, which was agreed to without division.

Mr. George H. Williams, of Oregon, next proposed to insert after the words "impeachment shall not" the words "upon any of the articles be presented," and after the word "convicted" the words "upon any of said articles." [1]

The object of this amendment was to make it certain that a conviction on one article, as on one count of an indictment, should be sufficient for judgment, after the analogy of the criminal law. The amendment was agreed to without division.

So the rule received its present form.

2099. In 1804 the Senate, sitting as a high court of impeachment, considered and adopted rules for the trial.—On December 10, 1804,[2] the Senate, sitting as a high court of impeachment, took into consideration the report of the committee appointed on November 30 to prepare and report proper rules of proceedings, to be observed by the Senate in cases of impeachments.

This report consisted of a series of rules, prescribing forms and methods of procedure. On this day the high court agreed to a portion of the rules, and then postponed the consideration of the remainder.

On December 24 the high court resumed consideration of the report, and agreed to the remaining portion.

In the meanwhile, on December 14, action had been taken in accordance with the rules agreed to on December 10.

2100. Where the special rules for impeachment trials are silent, the general rules of the Senate are regarded as applicable.

At the Johnson trial the Chief Justice felt constrained to submit to the Senate for decision a question of order affecting the organization.

At the Johnson trial the Chief Justice ruled that one point of order might not be made while another was pending.

The Chief Justice ruled in the Johnson trial that debate must be confined to the pending question.

Rule XXIII, prohibiting debate in open Senate sitting for an impeachment trial, was held by the Chief Justice not to apply to a question arising during organization.

Instance of an appeal from the decision of the Chief Justice on a question of order arising during the Johnson trial.

In the Johnson trial the Chief Justice ruled that a proposed rule or order should lie over for one day.

On March 6, 1868,[3] while the Senate was organizing for the trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, after the Chief Justice had taken the chair as presiding officer, and while the oath was being administered to the Senators, an objection was made to the competency of Mr. Benjamin F. Wade, of Ohio, to take the oath.

Discussion having arisen, Mr. Jacob M. Howard, of Michigan, submitted a question of order.

The Chief Justice [1] said:

The Senator from Connecticut is called to order. The Senator from Michigan has submitted a point of order for the consideration of the body. During the proceedings for the organization of the Senate for the trial of an impeachment of the President the Chair regards the general rules of the Senate as applicable and that the Senate must determine for itself every question which arises, unless the Chair is permitted to determine it. In a case of this sort affecting so nearly the organization of this body the Chair feels himself constrained to submit the question of order to the Senate. Will the Senator from Michigan state his point of order in writing?

While the point of order raised by Mr. Howard was being reduced to writing at the desk, Mr. James Dixon, of Connecticut, submitted as a point of order whether a question of order such as was pending could be raised.

The Chief Justice said: [2]

A point of order is already pending, and a second point of order can not be made until that is disposed of.

Mr. Howard's question was then submitted in writing, as follows:

That the objection raised to administering the oath to Mr. Wade is out of order, and that the motion of the Senator from Maryland, to postpone the administering of the oath to Mr. Wade until other Senators are sworn, is also out of order under the rules adopted by the Senate on the 2d of March, instant, and under the Constitution of the United States.

The Chief Justice announced that this question was open to debate.

Mr. Dixon having proceeded in debate, was discussing the competency of Mr. Wade to participate in the trial, when Mr. John Sherman, of Ohio, called him to order for not confining himself to the question under consideration.

Thereupon the Chief Justice held:

The Senator from Ohio makes the point of order that the Senator from Connecticut, in discussing the pending question of order, must confine himself strictly to that question, and not discuss the main question before the Senate. In that point of order the Chair conceives that the Senator from Ohio is correct, and that the Senator from Connecticut must confine himself strictly to the discussion of the point of order before the House.

Mr. Dixon having proceeded, was again called to order by Mr. Howard, who objected that no debate was in order under Rule XXIII of "the rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials." This rule he quoted as follows:

All the orders and decisions shall be made and had by yeas and nays, which shall be entered on the record, and without debate, except when the doors shall be closed for deliberation, and in that case no Member shall speak, etc.

The Chief Justice overruled the point of order, saying:

The twenty-third rule is a rule for the proceeding of the Senate when organized for the trial of an impeachment. It is not yet organized; and in the opinion of the Chair the twenty-third rule does not apply at present.

Mr. Charles D. Drake, of Missouri, having appealed, the Chief Justice put the question:

As many Senators as are of opinion that the decision of the Chair shall stand as the judgment of the Senate will, when their names are called, answer "yea;" as many as are of the contrary opinion will answer "nay."

And there were yeas 24, nays 20; so the decision of the Chief Justice was sustained.

2101. On April 11, 1868,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, the Chief Justice,[2] in ruling on a question of order said:

The Chief Justice in conducting the business of the court adopts for his general guidance the rules of the Senate sitting in legislative session as far as they are applicable. That is the ground of his decision.

2102. On April 14, 1868,[3] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Mr. Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts, proposed the following:

Ordered, In answer to the motion of the managers, that under the rule limiting the argument to two on a side unless otherwise ordered, such other managers and counsel as choose may print and file arguments at any time before the argument of the closing manager.

Objection being made to the immediate consideration of the order, and Mr. Sumner having demanded its consideration, the Chief Justice[1] said:

The Chief Justice stated on Saturday that in conducting the business of the court he applied, as far as they were applicable, the general rules of the Senate. This has been done upon several occasions, and when objection has been made orders have been laid over to the next day for consideration.

2103. In the Johnson trial the Chief Justice admitted a motion to lay a pending proposition on the table.—On April 13, 1868,[4] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, an order relating to the final arguments in the trial, was under consideration.

Mr. George H. Williams, of Oregon, moved that the resolution lie on the table.

Mr. Charles D. Drake, of Missouri, said:

I raise a question of order, Mr. President, that in this Senate sitting for the trial of an impeachment there is no authority for moving to lay any proposition on the table. We must come to a direct vote, I think, one way or the other.

The Chief Justice[1] said:

The Chief Justice can not undertake to limit the Senate in respect to its mode of disposing of a question; and as the Senator from Oregon [Mr. Williams] announced his purpose to test the sense of the Senate in regard to whether they will alter the rule at all the Chief Justice conceives his motion to be in order.

Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, a question arose as to the sufficiency of the pleadings. After the arguments had been concluded, but before the Senate had rendered a decision, Mr. James L. Alcorn, a Senator from Mississippi, attended and took the oath prescribed for Senators sitting in impeachment trials.

Having taken the oath, Mr. Alcorn rose and stated that he had been unavoidably absent from the sessions of the Senate sitting for the trial of impeachment heretofore held, and for that reason he asked to be excused from voting upon the question now under consideration presented by the pleadings.

Thereupon Mr. John Sherman moved that Mr. Alcorn, for the reasons stated, be excused from voting on the question as presented by the pleadings and now before the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

2105. Instances of a call for a quorum in the Senate sitting for an impeachment trial.

The Presiding Officer of the Senate sitting in an impeachment trial directed the counting of the Senate to ascertain the presence of a quorum.

On April 22, 1868,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, during the argument of Mr. Manager George S. Boutwell, the attendance after a recess was so scanty that Mr. John Sherman, of Ohio, moved a call of the Senate under the then existing Rule 16 of the Senate. The motion was carried and the roll was called.

2106. On May 4, 1876,[2] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Mr. Aaron A. Sargent, of California, commented on the fact that less than a quorum were present, and moved a call of the Senate.

And thereupon the roll was called.

2107. On June 16, 1876,[3] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Mr. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, suggested that there was no quorum present, and asked the President pro tempore to ascertain.

The President pro tempore [4] said:

The Secretary will count the Senate.

The Chief Clerk having counted the Senators present, the President pro tempore announced that the Senators present did not constitute a quorum.

Thereupon, on motion of Mr. Edmunds, the Sergeant-at-Arms was directed to request the attendance of absentees.

This having failed to secure sufficient attendance, the Senate thereupon adjourned.

2108. Instances of temporary suspensions of the sitting of the Senate in an impeachment trial.—On July 10, 1876,[5] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, the President pro tempore[1] said:

The Chair is informed that there is a message to be submitted from the House of Representatives. If there be no objection the proceedings of the trial will be temporarily suspended for that purpose.

A message was received from the House of Representatives.

After which, the President pro tempore said:

The Senate resumes its session sitting for the trial of the impeachment.

Later another message was received in the same way.[2]

2109. On July 19, 1876,[3] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Mr. William Windom, a Senator from Minnesota, asked that the proceedings might be suspended in order that he might make a report from the committee of conference on the sundry civil bill.

The President pro tempore[4] said:

If there be no objection proceedings will be suspended for that purpose.

After some time spent in legislative session, the Senate resumed the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap.

2110. Admission to the Senate galleries during the Johnson trial was regulated by tickets.

On March 4, 1868,[5] Mr. Henry B. Anthony, of Rhode Island, during the proceedings preliminary to the trial of President Andrew Johnson, proposed the following:

Ordered, That during the trial of the impeachment now pending no person besides those who now have the privilege of the floor shall be admitted to the galleries, or to that portion of the Capitol set apart for the use of the Senate and its officers, except upon tickets to be issued by the Sergeant-at-Arms. Such tickets shall be numbered, and shall be good only for the day on which they are dated. The number of tickets issued shall not exceed the number of persons who can be comfortably seated in the galleries, leaving the steps and passages entirely free. The portion of the gallery set apart for the diplomatic corps shall be exclusively appropriated to it, and tickets of admission thereto shall be issued to the foreign legations. Four tickets shall be issued to each Senator, 2 tickets to each Member of the House of Representatives, 2 tickets to the Chief Justice and to each justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, 2 tickets to the chief justice and to each justice of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and 2 tickets to the chief justice and to each judge of the Court of Claims. Sixty tickets shall be issued by the Presiding Officer to the reporters for the press, and the remaining tickets shall be distributed under his direction.

The Sergeant-at-Arms, under the direction of the Presiding Officer of the Senate, shall carry out these regulations, and, with the approbation of the Committee on Contingent Expenses, shall be authorized to employ such additional force as may be necessary for the preservation of order.

On March 6[6] this proposition was referred to the select committee, of which Mr. Jacob M. Howard, of Michigan, was chairman, and which had in charge the forms of procedure and arrangements for the trial.

On March 10[1] Mr. Howard reported the order with amendment. There was considerable debate as to the propriety of making any rule, the argument being that the public should not be excluded. On the other hand it was urged that order and decorum during the trial were of great importance, and that there should be arrangements which would secure an audience disposed to preserve order.

Another question that was discussed at length was the provision for seating Senators. At the Humphries trial the Senators had occupied benches placed at the right and left of the presiding officer. Senators who had sat during those proceedings objected to such arrangement as uncomfortable and also as inconvenient because of difficulty in hearing. It was pointed out that the attendance of Members of the House was not likely to be large, as already in the preliminary proceedings not over fifty had attended at any one time. Finally, on motion of Mr. Anthony, an amendment was agreed to providing that the Senators should occupy their usual seats during the trial. The order as amended was agreed to as follows:

That during the trial of the impeachment now pending no persons besides those who have the privilege of the floor and clerks of the standing committees of the Senate shall be admitted to that portion of the Capitol set apart for the use of the Senate and its officers, except upon tickets to be issued by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The number of tickets shall not exceed 1,000.

Tickets shall be numbered and dated, and be good only for the day on which they are dated.

The portion of the gallery set apart for the diplomatic corps shall be exclusively appropriated to it, and 40 tickets of admission thereto shall be issued to the Baron Gerolt for the foreign legations.

Four tickets shall be issued to each Senator, 4 tickets each to the Chief Justice of the United States and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, 2 tickets to each Member of the House of Representatives, 2 tickets each to the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, 2 tickets each to the chief justice and associate justices of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, 2 tickets to the chief justice and each judge of the Court of Claims, 2 tickets to each Cabinet officer, 2 tickets to the General commanding the Army, 20 tickets to the Private Secretary of the President of the United States, for the use of the President, and 60 tickets shall be issued by the President pro tempore of the Senate to the reporters of the press. The residue of the tickets to be issued shall be distributed among the Members of the Senate in proportion to the representation of their respective States in the House of Representatives, and the seats now occupied by the Senators shall be reserved for them.

On March 24,[2] during the trial, Mr. John Sherman, of Ohio, proposed the following:

Ordered, That after to-morrow the order of the 15th of March ultimo, relative to admission to the gallery, be suspended until further order, and that the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate shall take special care that order shall be observed in the galleries during the trial of the impeachment now pending, and he is hereby authorized to arrest and bring before the Senate any person who violates the orders of the Senate, and he shall take effective measures to secure admission to the diplomatic gallery, the ladies' gallery, and the reporters' gallery to those only who are entitled to admission thereto under the rules.

On April 2[3] the resolution was debated briefly. Mr. Sherman intimated that the audiences had not been very orderly, and that the people who would attend with open galleries would do as well.

On April 4[4] the proposition was debated, principally as to the conduct of the audiences, but was not acted on and apparently did not come before the Senate again.

On May 5[1] a proposition to give seats in the gallery to the members of the United States Medical Association was discouraged in debate, and did not come to a vote, it being urged that they could seek admission by tickets in the usual way.

2111. According to the best considered practice, the Senate sitting for an impeachment trial does not obtain the use of Senate archives without an order made in legislative session.—On April 4, 1868,[2] in the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment for the trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler, in the course of the production of testimony on behalf of the House of Representatives, asked that the Executive Journal of the Senate for a certain date might be produced, and he asked that the Senate direct its production.

Mr. John Sherman, of Ohio, a Senator, moved that the Journal be furnished.

The motion was agreed to.

2112. On April 15, 1868,[3] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Mr. Benjamin R. Curtis, of counsel for the respondent, moved for an order on the proper officer of the Senate to furnish a statement of the dates of the beginning and end of each session of the Senate.

The Chief Justice[4] said:

The Chief Justice is of opinion that that is an application which can only be addressed to the Senate in legislative session. If the court desire it, he will vacate the chair in order that the President pro tempore may take it.

Very soon thereafter, on motion of Mr. Reverdy Johnson, of Maryland, "the Senate sitting for the trial of the President upon articles of impeachment adjourned to 12 o'clock m. to-morrow."

Thereupon the President pro tempore resumed the Chair, and in the course of legislative business, on motion of Mr. Johnson, it was:

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to furnish to the counsel for the President a statement of the beginning and end of each executive and legislative session from 1789 to 1868.

2113. During the trial of President Johnson the Senate voted to receive resolutions of a State constitutional convention on the subject of the impeachment.—On March 25, 1868,[5] while proceedings for the impeachment of President Johnson were going on before the Senate, the President pro tempore[6] laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the constitutional convention of North Carolina, returning thanks for the vigilance with which the House and Senate had proceeded in the matter of impeachment.

Mr. Willard Saulsbury, of Delaware, said:

I object, Mr. President, to the reception of that paper, and for this reason: It purports to be addressed to the Senate of the United States, and the Members of the Senate of the United States compose the court of impeachment, and any communication addressed to the Members of that court upon the pending subject is improper to be entertained by the Senate, the Senate composing that court, as being an attempt to exercise an influence upon the minds of the judges.

The President pro tempore put the question on the reception of the resolutions, and the Senate voted to receive them.

The resolutions were then laid on the table.

2114. In the Swayne trial a Senator who had not heard the evidence was excused from voting on the question of guilt.—On February 27, 1905,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, as the vote was about to be taken on the first article, Mr. P. C. Knox, of Pennsylvania, said:

Mr. President, having been prevented by illness from attending the sessions of the Senate sitting in this impeachment trial at which the testimony was produced, and also having been prevented by the effects of the illness from reading the testimony, I ask that the Senate may excuse me from voting upon this and all subsequent roll calls taken to ascertain the judgment of the Senate upon the charges against the respondent.

The Presiding Officer said:

Senators, you have heard the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Knox]. Those who would excuse him from voting will say "aye;" opposed, "no." [Putting the question.] The "ayes" have it. The Senator from Pennsylvania is excused.

2115. The expenses of the Senate in the Swayne trial was defrayed from the Treasury.—On January 24. 1905.[2] the Senate, in legislative session, agreed to this resolution:

Resolved, etc., That there be appropriated from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $40,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to defray the expenses of the Senate in the impeachment trial of Charles Swayne.

Mr. Blount thereupon named his sureties, who were satisfactory to the Senate, and the recognizance was approved by the Senate and executed in its presence as follows:

Be it remembered, That on the 7th day of July, in the year of our Lord 1797, personally appeared before the President pro tempore and Senate of the United States William Blount, esq., Senator of the State of Tennessee; Thomas Blount, esq., Member of the House of Representatives of the United States from the State of North Carolina, and Pierce Butler, esq., of South Carolina, who severally acknowledged themselves to owe to the United States of America the following sums, that is to say: The said William Blount the sum of $20,000, and the said Thomas Blount and Pierce Butler each the sum of $15,000, to be levied on their respective goods and chattels, lands, and tenements, on the condition following, that is to say:

The condition of the foregoing recognizance is such that if the said William Blount shall appear before the Senate of the United States to answer to certain charges of impeachment to be exhibited against him by the House of Representatives of the United States, and not depart therefrom without leave, that then the above recognizance shall cease to exist, otherwise be and remain in full force and virtue.

You, the said ——— ———, are therefore hereby summoned to be and appear before the Senate of the United States of America, at their Chamber in the city of Washington, on the —— day of ———, at 12.30 o'clock p. m., then and there to answer to the said articles of impeachment, and then and there to abide by, obey, and perform such orders, directions, and judgments as the Senate of the United States shall make in the premises according to the Constitution and laws of the United States.

Hereof you are not to fail.

Witness ——— ———, and [Presiding Officer of the said Senate], at the city of Washington, this —— day of ———, in the year of our Lord ———, and of the Independence of the United States the ———.

———— ————,

Presiding Officer of the Senate.

FORM OF PRECEPT TO BE INDORSED ON SAID WRIT OF SUMMONS.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, ss:

The Senate of the United States to ——— — ———, greeting:

You are hereby commanded to deliver to and leave with ——— ———, if conveniently to be found, or, if not, to leave at his usual place of abode, or at his usual place of business in some conspicuous place, a true and attested copy of the within writ of summons, together with a like copy of this precept; and in whichsoever way you perform the service, let it be done at least —— days before the appearance day mentioned in the said writ of summons.

Fail not, and make return of this writ of summons and precept, with your proceedings thereon indorsed, on or before the appearance day mentioned in the said writ of summons.

Witness ——— ———, and Presiding Officer of the Senate, at the city of Washington, this —— day of ———, in the year of our Lord ———, and of the Independence of the United States the ———.

———— ————,

Presiding Officer of the Senate.

All process shall be served by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, unless otherwise ordered by the court.

This is the form agreed to in 1868.[1]

2120. Under the parliamentary law the respondent answers the summons in custody if the case be capital and the accusation be special, but not if it be general.

The accusation being of misdemeanor only, the respondent, under the English usage, does not answer the summons in custody, but the Lords may commit him until he find sureties for his future appearance.

Under the parliamentary law the respondent, if a Lord, answers the summons in his place; if a Commoner, at the bar.

Under the English practice a copy of the articles is furnished to the respondent and a day is fixed for his answer.

According to the parliamentary law the respondent, on accusation for misdemeanor, may answer the articles by person or by writing or by attorney.

A respondent in a case of impeachment for misdemeanor answers the articles before the Lords in such a state of liberty or restraint as he was in when the Commons complained of him.

In English impeachments the respondent has counsel in accusation for misdemeanor, but not in capital cases.

In Chapter LIII of Jefferson's Manual the following is given in the "sketch of some of the principles and practices of England" on the subject of impeachments:

Appearance. If he appear, and the case be capital, he answers in custody; though not if the accusation be general. He is not to be committed but on special accusations. If it be for a misdemeanor only, he answers, a Lord in his place, a Commoner at the bar, and not in custody, unless on the answer the Lords find cause to commit him till he finds sureties to attend and lest he should fly. (Seld. Jud., 98, 99.) A copy of the articles is given him and a day fixed for his answer. (T. Ray.; 1 Rushw. 268; Fost., 232; 1 Clar. Hist. of the Reb., 379.) On a misdemeanor his appearance may be in person or he may answer in writing or by attorney. (Seld. Jud., 100.) The general rule on accusation for a misdemeanor is that in such a state of liberty or restraint as the party is when the Commons complain of him, in such he is to answer. (Ib., 101.) If previously committed by the Commons, he answers as a prisoner. But this may be called in some sort judicium parium suorum. (Ib.) In misdemeanors the party has a right to counsel by the common law, but not in capital cases. (Seld. Jud., 102, 105).

2121. Under the parliamentary law the answer of the respondent to impeachment need not observe great strictness of form.

The respondent in an impeachment case may not, under the English law, plead in his answer a pardon as bar to the impeachment.

In Chapter LIII of Jefferson's Manual the following is given in the "sketch of some of the principles and practices of England" on the subject of impeachments:

Answer. The answer need not observe great strictness of form. He may plead guilty as to part and defend as to the residue; or, saving all exceptions, deny the whole, or give a particular answer to each article separately. (1 Rush., 274; 2 Rush., 1374, 12 Parl. Hist., 442; 3 Lords' Journ., 13 Nov., 1643; 2 Wood., 607.) But he can not plead a pardon in bar to the impeachment. (2 Wood., 615; 2 St. Tr., 735.)

2122. Under the parliamentary law of impeachments the pleadings may include a replication, rejoinder, etc.—In Chapter LIII of Jefferson's Manual the following is given in the "sketch of some of the principles and practices of England" on the subject of impeachments:

Replication, rejoinder, etc. There may be a replication, rejoinder, etc. (Seld. Jud , 114; 8 Grey's Deb., 233; Sach. Tr., 15; Journ. House of Commons, 6 March, 1640–41.)

2123. The pleadings were the subject of full discussion during the Belknap trial.

The extent of dilatory pleadings in the Belknap trial was commented on as an innovation on American and English precedents.

In the Belknap trial the House was sustained in averring in pleadings as to jurisdiction matters not averred in the articles.

The articles of impeachment in the Belknap case were held sufficient although attacked for not describing the respondent as one subject to impeachment.

The Senate having assumed jurisdiction in the Belknap impeachment, declined to permit the respondent to plead further, but gave leave to answer the articles.

On May 4, 1876,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, the President pro tempore announced that the Senate had adopted the following:

That the Senate proceed first to hear and determine the question whether W. W. Belknap, the respondent, is amenable to trial by impeachment for acts done as Secretary of War, notwithstanding his resignation of said office; and that the managers and counsel in such arguments discuss the question whether the issues of fact are material, and whether the matters in support of the jurisdiction alleged by the House of Representatives in the pleadings subsequent to the articles of impeachment can be thus alleged if the same are not averred in said articles.

As to the second question referred to, Mr. Matt H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, summarized thus:[2]

Briefly, the attitude of the case is this.

The articles of impeachment charge that the respondent, Belknap, was at one time Secretary of War, and while holding that office did certain things which are declared by said articles to be high crimes and misdemeanors.

The respondent pleads to the jurisdiction of the court that when this proceeding was commenced he was not an officer of the United States, but was a private citizen.

The first replication avers that he was Secretary of War when he committed the acts complained of, and the respondent has demurred.

A second replication by the House charges that after the acts were committed the House had commenced an investigation, with a view to impeachment, and that the respondent with full knowledge of the fact resigned his office, with intent to evade impeachment. This replication has closed in issues of fact which are pending for trial.

The court has ordered an argument in regard to the sufficiency of the plea in abatement, the materiality of the issues of fact, and also whether the House can support the jurisdiction by matters alleged in subsequent pleadings, but not alleged in the articles of impeachment.

Mr. Manager Scott Lord summarized[3] more at length:

For the proper consideration of these questions it is expedient that at this stage of the case I call your attention precisely to what the issues are. I do not intend to read the pleadings in full, but only such parts of them as may be necessary for the understanding of this point. Article 1 presents as follows:

"That William W. Belknap, while he was in office as Secretary of War of the United States of America, to wit, on the 8th day of October, 1870, had the power and authority, under the laws of the United States, as Secretary of War as aforesaid, to appoint a person to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill, a military post of the United States; that said Belknap, as Secretary of War as aforesaid, on the day and year aforesaid, promised to appoint one Caleb P. Marsh to maintain said trading establishment at said military post.

[3] Pages 31, 32.

* * * * * * *

"That thereafter, to wit, on the 10th day of October, 1870, said Belknap, as Secretary of War aforesaid, did, at the instance and request of said Marsh, at the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, appoint said John S. Evans to maintain said trading establishment at Fort Sill, the military post aforesaid, and in consideration of said appointment of said Evans, so made by him as Secretary of War as aforesaid, the said Belknap did, on or about the 2d day of November, 1870, unlawfully and corruptly receive from said Caleb P. Marsh the sum of $1,500, and that at divers times thereafter, to wit, on or about the 17th day of January, 1871, and at or about the end of each three months during the term of one whole year, the said William W. Belknap, while still in office as Secretary of War as aforesaid, did unlawfully receive from said Caleb P. Marsh like sums of $1,500 in consideration of the appointment of said John S. Evans by him, the said Belknap, as Secretary of War as aforesaid, and in consideration of his permitting said Evans to continue to maintain the said trading establishment at said military post during that time."

Then in article 3.

"Yet the said Belknap, well knowing these facts, and having the power to remove said Evans from said position at any time and to appoint some other person to maintain said trading establishment, but criminally disregarding his duty as Secretary of War and basely prostituting his high office to his lust for private gain, did unlawfully and corruptly continue said Evans in said position and permit him to maintain said establishment at said military post during all of said time, to the great injury and damage of the officers and soldiers of the Army of the United States stationed at said post, as well as of emigrants, freighters, and other citizens of the United States, against public policy, and to the great disgrace and detriment of the public service.

"Whereby the said William W. Belknap was, as Secretary of War as aforesaid, guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors in office."

The defendant in this case answered to these articles:

"And the said William W. Belknap, etc., says, that before and at the time when the said House of Representatives ordered and directed that he, the said Belknap, should be impeached at the bar of the Senate, and at the time when the said articles of impeachment were exhibited and presented against him, the said Belknap, by the said House of Representatives, he, the said Belknap, was not, nor hath he since been, nor is he now, an officer of the United States."

The House of Representatives duly adopted and filed a general and special replication. A part of the latter is as follows.

"The House of Representatives of the United States say that the said William W. Belknap, after the commission of each one of the acts alleged in the said articles, was and continued t. be such officer, as alleged in said articles, until and including the 2d day of March, A. D. 1876, and until the House of Representatives, by its proper committee, had completed its investigation of his official conduct as such officer in regard to the matters and things set forth as official misconduct in the said articles, and the said committee was considering the report it should make to the House of Representatives upon the same, the said Belknap being at the time aware of such investigation and of the evidence taken and of such proposed report.

"And the House of Representatives further say that while its said committee was considering and preparing its said report to the House of Representatives recommending the impeachment of the said William W. Belknap for the matters and things set forth in the said articles, the said William W. Belknap, with full knowledge thereof, resigned his position as such officer on the said 2d day of March, A. D. 1876, with intent to evade the proceedings of impeachment against him. And the House of Representatives resolved to impeach the said William W. Belknap for said matters as in said articles set forth on said 2d day of March, A. D. 1876."

To this replication the defendant rejoins, among other things, that the—

"Chairman of said committee then declared to said Belknap that he, said Clymer, should move in the said House of Representatives, upon the statement of said Marsh, for the impeachment of him, said Belknap, unless the said Belknap should resign his position as Secretary of War before noon of the next day, to wit, March the 2d, A. D. 1876; and said Belknap regarding this statement of said Clymer, chairman as aforesaid, as an intimation that he, said Belknap, could, by thus resigning, avoid the affliction inseparable from a protracted trial in a forum which would attract the greatest degree of public attention and the humiliation of availing himself of the defense disclosed in said statement itself which would cast blame upon said other persons, he yielded to the suggestion made by said Clymer, chairman as aforesaid."

There is a joinder in demurrer and a surrejoinder by the House of Representatives, a portion of which surrejoinder I will read:

"And the said House of Representatives, as to the first and second subdivisions of the rejoinder to the second replication of the House of Representatives to the plea of the defendant to the said articles of impeachment, wherein the said defendant demands trial according to law, the said House of Representatives, in behalf of themselves and all the people of the United States, do the like."

Now, I call the attention of this court to the fact that in regard to two of the allegations made in the second replication by the House the defendant tendered issues and the House of Representatives joined in such issues, and I shall argue to this court and produce authorities presently to show that the defendant, having thus tendered issues joined in by the House, he can not go behind them, and can not question the right of this tribunal to hear and determine the matters thus brought before it.

Then there are four special rejoinders which the defendant made. One of them I have read to this court. In regard to each of the other three not read, the House of Representatives tendered an issue to be tried by this court; and what does the defendant do? Does he say that these matters are improperly before this court? Does he say that any injury will result to him in having these facts fully and fairly and truthfully investigated by this tribunal? Not at all. So far from it, with great formality he tenders a similiter in the following words:

"And the said Belknap, as the surrejoinders of said House of Representatives to the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth rejoinders of the said Belknap to the second replication of said House of Representatives above pleaded, whereof said House of Representatives have demanded trial, the said Belknap doth the like."

We say that they are estopped upon every principle known to legal proceedings, known to the trial of cases in court, from attempting now to evade these issues. It was very proper on the part of this tribunal to raise this question, if it saw fit; but I apprehend, when the authorities are reviewed upon this point it will be seen that it was too late for anybody to raise this question. Of course any question involving the jurisdiction of this court may be raised at any time, but on questions which do not involve its jurisdiction, but only facts pertaining thereto, no matter in what form of pleading these facts get before it, it is too late, when both parties have so tendered issues to be tried by this tribunal, for the defendant or for any member of this court to prevent such trial; and this I shall show abundantly by the authorities. If otherwise this tribunal, the most august in the land, supposed above all others capable of reaching to the direct truth regardless of forms and ceremonies, has not the power of a court of a justice of the peace; for I affirm that on the other side not one authority can be found, in the whole range of authorities, showing that when issues are joined on questions of fact before the most inferior court it has not the power to try and determine them; and therefore the question amounts to this: Has this tribunal less authority than the most inferior court in the United States or in any other land?

The first authority I introduce upon this point affirms this doctrine, that the plaintiff in his replication may introduce new matter to fortify his declaration. Now what is the question before this court? The very resolution gives us the victory in this regard; it assumes that such facts are in aid of a pertinent question before this court in support of its jurisdiction. I admit we could allege no new offense in this way; we could tender no new or distinct issue upon the merits as to the crime or misdemeanor which this defendant committed; but the question which he raises is a dilatory one, it is not one relating at all to his guilt or his innocence. It is a question of jurisdiction. He raises that question and affirms certain facts relating thereto; and we, in aid of that jurisdiction, bring in certain other facts relating thereto. This is the true statement of the case; we did what we have done in aid of the jurisdiction, and this the pleader may always do.

After the citation of various authorities, Mr. Manager Lord continued:[1]

[1] Page 33.

I call the attention of the court now to the report of a committee of the British House of Commons, a learned and intelligent committee, a committee which has made a report that will go down with the ages, and I apprehend be received as the law on this subject so long as civilization exists. I call attention to Burke's Works, seventh volume, page 490, where the committee consider the "rules of pleading in courts of impeachment." I never have heard yet of any rule as to pleadings in a criminal court besides the indictment and the plea. Sometimes a defendant puts in what we call a special plea. If a question of jurisdiction is raised it is usually raised ore tenus. But what are the rules of pleading in this court? Such committee say:

"Your committee do not find that any rules of pleading, as observed in the inferior courts, have ever obtained in the proceedings of the high court of Parliament, in a cause or matter in which the whole procedure has been within their original jurisdiction. Nor does your committee find that any demurrer or exception as of false or erroneous pleading hath been ever admitted to any impeachment in Parliament as not coming within the form of the pleading."

The members of this court know the distinguished character of Mr. Walpole not only as a lawyer but as a statesman.

Mr. Walpole said—

Page 497—

"Those learned gentlemen (Lord Wintoun's counsel) seem to forget in what court they are. The have taken up so much of your lordship's time in quoting of authorities and using arguments to show your lordships what would quash an indictment in the courts below that they seem to forget they are now in a court of Parliament and on an impeachment of the Commons of Great Britain."

"A great writer on the criminal law, Justice Foster, in one of his discourses, fully recognizes those principles for which your managers have contended, and which have to this time been uniformly observed in Parliament. In a very elaborate reasoning on the case of a trial in Parliament (the trial of those who had murdered Edward the II) he observes this: 'It is well known that in parliamentary proceedings of this kind it is, and ever was, sufficient that matters appear with proper light and certainly to a common understanding, without that minute exactness which is required in criminal proceedings in Westminster Hall. In these cases the rule has always been loquendum et vulgus."

We say, therefore, if the articles are defective and the second replication not of strict right, all is cured by rejoinder, surrejoinder, and similiter. And in regard to the main question presented by the second replication—not the most conclusive question perhaps, but it may be called the main question of the second replication—namely, whether this defendant has the right to evade the Constitution and defeat its operations by his own will, he confesses and avoids. He admits on the record that he resigned for the purpose of evading this impeachment. It is true he says he was not guilty, and resigned for other purposes; but that is utterly immaterial to this question, because he does admit, I repeat, that he resigned for the purpose of defeating this impeachment.

I will not stop, Senators, to answer the suggestion of counsel that the chairman of that committee had the right, in behalf of this nation, and in behalf of the House of Representatives of the United States of America, to make a contract with the defendant that if he would get out of the office of Secretary of War before a certain hour he should not be impeached for these high crimes and misdemeanors, which, if these articles are true, had polluted him for years, and made him of all men that have ever appeared in a court of impeachment the most unfit to hold civil office. I deny such a right. I am astonished that counsel of respectability and of high standing should stand in this court and assume for a moment that the chairman of a committee had a right to make any such infamous contract; but that is one of the issues. I was surprised the more to hear it stated here, because it is one of the issues. The allegation of such agreement we absolutely deny; we deny that any such contract was made. By our surrejoinder we tender an issue upon that question, and it is accepted by the other side by filing their similiter.

Reference has been made also to the fact that the Constitution leaves the defendant subject to an indictment, and that an indictment may be found against him. The two proceedings, Senators, are entirely and absolutely distinct. One has nothing to do with the other, for the statute to which the counsel referred (sec. 1781 of the Revised Statutes) does not pretend to change the law or rules of impeachment.

Now I wish to call the attention of this tribunal to another consideration, and that is that on this question you are not to give the defendant the benefit of any of those rules which are provided for criminal cases. Assuming, for the sake of the argument, that he is accused as a criminal, and that this proceeding is a criminal proceeding, so that when we get to the merits he may say that he is entitled to the presumption of innocence, that he is entitled to be defended by counsel—and certainly he has illustrious counsel—that he would be entitled to the right of challenge before a jury, and is entitled to confront the witnesses; assuming that this was an indictment and he was before one of the courts of the land and should stand up and claim all these privileges, they of course would be given to him, and we do not care about challenging them here. For the sake of the argument, we admit that here upon the merits he has all these privileges, so far as applicable in this court. What I say is that on this question of jurisdiction he has no such privilege; on the contrary, he has not as many privileges, as the authorities will show, as he would have in a civil action.

This is not one of the questions over which the law watches with such jealousy to guard the rights of a defendant. So long as it is true that no case of fact can be made, no evidence can be offered under which speculation may not peer; so long as it is true that sometimes innocent men suffer; so long as that maxim exists in our law that it is better that ninety-nine guilty men go free than that one innocent man suffer, the common law will allow a person accused of crime the presumption and privileges we have referred to. But what have these questions to do with a mere abstract question of law? The question now presented to you has nothing to do with his guilt or innocence; it has nothing to do with his imprisonment; it has nothing to do with any question personal to himself. It is purely a legal one, and must be considered precisely as though it arose in a civil action, excepting, as before suggested, that he has not all the privileges in this regard that he would have in a civil action. When a defendant in a criminal action raises a dilatory plea it does not receive the consideration which it does in a civil action.

What is the object in pleading in criminal actions? Allow me to call the attention of the court to 2 Archbold's Criminal Practice and Pleadings, sixth edition, volume 2, page 206:

"The object of pleading, whether in civil or criminal actions, is to inform the parties of the facts alleged by each against the other with such clearness and distinctness as to enable them to prepare for the trial of disputed facts or for the application of the law to those which are admitted. In its application to criminal cases it is a statement of a crime imputed to the prisoner with such a particularity of circumstances only as will enable him to understand the charge and prepare for his defense, and as will authorize the court to give the appropriate judgment upon conviction."

At common law a defendant in a criminal action was not allowed to plead in abatement as in civil action (1 Archbold, p. 110; Barber's Criminal Law, p. 343), and can not tender a bill of exceptions. (Garbett's Criminal Law, vol. 2, p. 521.) Therefore you see, Senators, that while the law has always been watchful to protect life and liberty, intending that no innocent man should be falsely accused of crime, yet in regard to the surroundings of the case, in regard to the mere question of pleadings, he has certainly had no more privilege, and certainly has now no more privilege, than in a civil action.

Mr. Montgomery Blair, of counsel for the respondent, said:[1]

I pass now to the second branch of the question presented by the order of the Senate, and that is on the materiality of the allegations of the second replication and of our rejoinder. We did not regard the replication as tendering a material issue, and for that reason we might, and perhaps ought to have, demurred; but having, as we believed, a conclusive answer to it in the rejoinder which we made, we chose that course, preferring that in this maneuvering for position—that is all it amounts to—our friends on the other side should not have the advantage of us.

It needs no argument to show that if only persons holding office are amenable to impeachment it must be charged in the articles that they hold office; and describing the defendant as "late Secretary of War" does not bring him within the description of persons given in the Constitution as amenable to impeachment. It would not be sufficient for them to have alleged that "the defendant does not now hold office, but was an officer at one time, and resigned in order to avoid impeachment." That would not have been sufficient certainly, for, if so, an ordinary court of justice might entertain jurisdiction of a person who had not been served with process upon an allegation that the defendant, hearing that it was intended to serve process upon him, had incontinently taken himself out of the jurisdiction of the court. There is no imaginable difference between the cases. We heard that they intended to impeach us, and, as the Constitution limited the prosecution to persons in office, we stepped over the line, just as a citizen of the United States who happens to be in New York, and learns that somebody there wants to serve him with a writ, betakes himself to New Jersey.

A man has a right to avoid lawsuits. The defendant here had a right, however innocent he might have been, to avoid the ruin which the law-books tell him attend invariably the prosecution of a private person by this overwhelming power. No sensible man, unless he had ample means, would undertake a conflict of that sort if he could avoid it and character enough to stand before the country to justify his action. But the Supreme Court of the United States have settled again and again an analogous question, that a man residing in one State may convey his property to persons outside of it to give a court jurisdiction, provided he does it in good faith. That principle was decided in the case of McDonald v. Smalley (1 Peters, 120); also Smith v. Kernochen (7 Howard, 198); Jones v. Lee (18 Howard, 76); Briggs v. French (2 Sumner, 252).

The court also holds in those cases that a man may change his residence from a State in order to assert his title to property within that State in the Federal courts against persons holding it adversely provided he changes his residence in good faith. Does anybody doubt that we resigned in good faith? Does anybody suppose or suspect that the defendant's was a colorable resignation; that he is to be restored to office when this prosecution ceases? Certainly not. And therefore the case corresponds entirely in principle to the decision I have cited. If jurisdiction may be obtained by the voluntary act of a party done in good faith, no reason can be suggested why a jurisdiction may not be avoided by a voluntary act done also in good faith. We were inclined to demur to the original pleading, and the original pleading is defective in the point that I have already brought to the attention of the court in not describing this defendant as one subject to impeachment, and in describing him in fact as a person who is not subject to impeachment, because it says that he was "late Secretary of War."

On the third question which is presented for consideration by the order of the Senate I think little need be said. They can not amend their articles by a new assignment in a replication. Nobody ever heard of an amendment of an indictment; and I may add that the court in the case of Barnard held that articles of impeachment were not amendable. I could, by looking over the books, perhaps find some accidental decision of a refusal of a court to allow an indictment to be amended. Indictments are quashed for defects which could be amended at any stage of a civil action as of course, and a new indictment must be found before further proceedings can be had. This, with the decision in the case of Barnard, at page 192, volume 1, that there could be no amendment of articles of impeachment, will dispose of the question suggested by the order of the Senate as to whether a necessary allegation not made in the articles could be supplied in the subsequent pleadings.

Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, also of counsel for respondent, said:[1]

This court can only acquire jurisdiction, in a proceeding of impeachment, by articles presented by the House, showing a case of impeachable criminality; that is, a case where the act complained of is impeachable, and the actor subject to impeachment. In other words, the articles must be such as to require no aid from subsequent pleadings. In this case the articles describe the respondent as "late Secretary of War." Within the strictness of allegation required by common law criminal courts such descriptio personæ would not be equivalent to an allegation that he was no longer in that office. Therefore, and to meet the view sometimes entertained that a citizen holding one office may be impeached for misconduct in another, we interposed the plea to the jurisdiction, stating affirmatively that at the time of impeachment the respondent was not any officer of the United States. He was impeached at the bar of the Senate—if formal announcement that articles would be presented against him is an impeachment—on the 2d day of March, A. D. 1876. Some of the articles charge that he continued to be Secretary of War to or until (I forget which) the 2d day of March. This excludes the 2d day of March from his holding office; therefore, if we are right in contending that only a person holding office can be impeached, the articles fail to show a case within jurisdiction.

And I think it would have been safe for us to demur to the articles. But not wishing to take risks upon a technical construction, we thought it safer to plead affirmatively the fact that the respondent was not holding any office at the time of impeachment. Undoubtedly, to any plea of the respondent in confession and avoidance of the articles, the prosecution might have replied in confession and avoidance; but not so to a plea which, in substance, is a denial of any fact which should have been stated in the articles, to show jurisdiction. If the articles themselves are deficient in not stating any fact necessary to entire jurisdiction—jurisdiction of the offense and the offender—then this court never acquired jurisdiction.

It results from the fact that this court has only a special jurisdiction, that the first pleading must show a case within the jurisdiction. This was held with regard to jurisdiction of circuit courts of the United States in Brown v. Keene (8 Peters, 112); Jackson v. Ashton (8 Peters, 148); Hodgson v. Bowerbank (5 Cranch, 303); Mossman v. Higginson (4 Dallas, 12), and Jackson v. Twentyman (2 Peters 136).

The honorable manager [Mr. Lord] yesterday referred us to two cases—2 Chitty's Reports, 367, and 2 Maule & Selwyn, 75. These were actions of quo warranto—that is, civil suits to try the title to an office, to be followed by a judgment for damages and costs. The court held, what everybody would concede, that resignation did not preclude final judgment.

One Senator at least—Senator Howe—will remember a somewhat remarkable case of this kind in our own State, where he happened to be on the winning and myself on the losing side. I refer to the case State on the relation of Bashford v. Barstow. In this case, after the court had declared its jurisdiction, the attorney-general came into court and filed a discontinuance.

But the court held that the case was really a civil cause, in favor of the relator, against Barstow, who was in possession of the office; that the State had no interest in the question, and was only a formal party.

The learned manager also asserted that in a criminal cause there could be no such thing as a replication and rejoinder. If he will take the trouble to examine Wentworth's Pleadings he will find that he is in error; and if he will examine Archbold's Criminal Pleadings he will find the very forms from which we have drawn our pleadings subsequent to the plea in abatement.

On May 29[1] the Senate, after several days of deliberation, agreed to these resolutions, the first by a vote of yeas 37, nays 29, and the second by a vote of yeas 35, nays 22.

1. Resolved, That in the opinion of the Senate, William W. Belknap, the respondent, is amenable to trial by impeachment for acts done as Secretary of War, notwithstanding his resignation of said office before he was impeached.

2. Resolved, That at the time specified in the foregoing resolution [fixing the time for delivering this judgment] the President of the Senate shall pronounce the judgment of the Senate as follows: "It is ordered by the Senate sitting for the trial of the articles of impeachment preferred by the House of Representatives against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, that the demurrer of said William W. Belknap to the replication of the House of Representatives to the plea to the jurisdiction filed by said Belknap be, and the same hereby is, overruled; and it being the opinion of the Senate that said plea is insufficient in law, and that said articles of impeachment are sufficient in law, it is therefore further ordered and adjudged that said plea be, and the same hereby is, overruled and held for naught, which judgment thus pronounced shall be entered upon the Journal of the Senate sitting as aforesaid.

On June 1,[2] after the announcement of the decision, Mr. Matt H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, commented on the effect of the findings:

The defendant first pleaded to the jurisdiction of this court. The managers filed a replication, to which the respondent demurred; and the managers joined in the demurrer.

The rule is that each pleading must answer the preceding one. The replication, if sufficient in law, was a valid answer to the plea. The validity of the replication in matter of law was put in issue by our demurrer. And had the court upon the demurrer held the replication bad, then the court would have looked back to the plea itself to see whether or not it was sufficient in law; and if it had found the plea to be bad, then the court would have held in favor of the prosecution; upon the principle that a bad replication is as good as the bad plea to which it is a response. But in this case the court overruled our demurrer to the replication, thus holding the replication a sufficient answer to the plea.

[1] Senate Journal, pp. 944–947; Record of trial, p. 76. [2] Record of trial, pp. 159, 160, 163.

Was there therefore any necessity for the court to go back through the record and pass upon the sufficiency of prior pleadings? The plea to the jurisdiction having been answered by a replication which the court held good by overruling our demurrer to it, what was the necessity for the court to go back through the record? The only question raised by the plea was the jurisdiction of this court over the respondent; and whether or not the prosecution was entitled to a final judgment, or whether the judgment should be respondeat ouster, is a question to be examined.

But I submit with great confidence that the question of sufficiency in law of the articles of impeachment was not before the court; and that after judgment upon the question of jurisdiction, of respondeat ouster, the respondent was at liberty to begin his defense, as he might have done without questioning the jurisdiction.

In case on indictment, when the defendant challenges the jurisdiction of the court, and fails to make good his objection, he is remitted to every privilege he would have possessed if he had commenced his defense with questioning the jurisdiction: that is, he may move to quash, or he may plead in bar, or plead the general issue.

If I were compelled alone to take the responsibility in this case I should plead no further, but leave the managers to their own course; and in that case would not the managers be entitled to move for final judgment? This would be so, I think, had the issue been one of fact only. But here there was an issue of law and several issues of fact, all of which the court has disposed of by the order just entered.

We have appeared and pleaded, and if the court have held our defense insufficient, may we not stand upon it, without filing further pleadings? My impression is that the next step to be taken is for the managers to move for judgment, after which we could move for leave to plead further, which I have no doubt the court would grant.

All this, of course, is upon the supposition that the court has overruled the plea to the jurisdiction. The order declaring the jurisdiction was not concurred in by two-thirds of the Senators present. That is, less than two-thirds of the Senate think there is jurisdiction to convict the respondent.

Manifestly a court which has not jurisdiction to convict has no jurisdiction to try the respondent; and such pretended trial would be wholly extrajudicial. No witness could be indicted for false swearing at such trial, nor punished for contempt for not obeying a subpœna.

It therefore becomes a very important question to be settled by the respondent's counsel, whether any, and if any what, further steps should be taken on the part of the respondent. An order has been entered in the record, as an order of the court, overruling the plea to the jurisdiction. But the journal of the proceedings shows that thirty-five Senators concurred in the order, and twenty-two dissented.

Speaking for myself only (not having consulted with my colleagues), I maintain that upon the whole record the order is void, for the reason that it was not concurred in by two-thirds of the Senators.

Mr. Manager Scott Lord said:

One question which the learned counsel has discussed before you the managers do not feel authorized to discuss while the order of this Senate remains. By its order the demurrer to the replication of the House of Representatives is overruled, the plea of the defendant is overruled and held for naught, and the articles of impeachment are held sufficient. Now, apprehending that this order has been made upon due consideration, that the Senators understood all these pleadings and made this order in that view, we do not feel called upon, I repeat, to discuss the questions pertaining thereto until some motion is made to change the order; and if such a motion should be made, if the Senate, after this deliberation and after this carefully prepared order, takes into consideration the question whether it will change its order, then the managers will desire to be heard.

And on June 6,[1] when the Senate was determining the length of time to be allowed to the respondent to answer on the merits, Mr. Manager William P. Lynde said:

We have already been occupied for several weeks with dilatory pleadings. We have had a plea to the jurisdiction of the Senate. It has been suggested by the counsel for the respondent that they would yet demur, or ask leave of the Senate to demur, to the articles of impeachment. The managers believe that these dilatory pleadings have been indulged in by this Senate quite too long and without a precedent. I find no precedent either in England or in this country for dilatory pleadings on impeachment. In the first case tried under our Constitution against Senator Blount, it is true, the respondent filed a plea to the jurisdiction which is regarded as a dilatory pleading; but that was without authority and without precedent. There never had been a case in England where a plea of that kind had been allowed to be put into articles of impeachment, and it stands alone in this country.

The time which has already been occupied in this case must satisfy the Senate that it is not right that these dilatory pleadings should be introduced or allowed. In the case of Judge Barnard in New York, where the counsel for the respondent applied to the court for leave to file a demurrer or leave to move to quash certain articles of impeachment, the court refused the request and required the defendant to plead to the merits, stating that in the course of the trial of the case all those questions of law could be availed of by the parties and would be decided by the court.

Now, we think that if a precedent of this kind is established, if this Senate will go on and hear dilatory plea after dilatory plea, first a plea to the jurisdiction, a plea in abatement, then a demurrer to the form, there is no end; and when shall we arrive at a trial of this case upon the merits? If there was an officer of this Government now in office who endangered the liberties of the people, who was engaged in a conspiracy against the Government, and he stood impeached before the Senate, if these dilatory pleas were allowed, the evil to be apprehended from his action might be carried into effect and realized. And yet it is claimed that it is a matter of right by the respondent, on the other side, and the courts of impeachment of this country have, by precedent at least if not by direct vote, decided that when an officer of the Government is impeached he can not be suspended from the functions of his office while the trial is progressing. No; it has been the aim and intention of the courts in all cases of impeachment that a speedy trial should be had, that the respondent should be required to answer to the merits, and then the court would consider the question, and the whole question, and protect and save the country.

Mr. Carpenter also raised another question:[1]

The question of the sufficiency in law of the articles themselves has not been raised by a demurrer thereto, has not been argued by either side, nor submitted to the court. The only question raised, argued, or submitted was the question of jurisdiction of the defendant; that is, whether the court had power to pass upon the sufficiency of the articles, or take any other step whatever in the cause. Had the court affirmed jurisdiction (as I claim it has not), then we could have moved to quash the articles, or demurred to them, or joined issue for trial. I do not hesitate to affirm that none of these articles, with possibly one exception, state the necessary facts to constitute a good indictment. Mere rhetoric and denunciation will not do. It is not enough to say that the defendant has been guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors; but the articles must state every fact which is an element of crime. And although the same strictness of pleading has not been required in cases of impeachment as in ordinary criminal causes, yet every fact relied upon to constitute the crime must be stated; and on the trial the proof can not go beyond the averments of the articles. In the several impeachment trials in this country defendants have not resorted to formal pleadings. In Blount's case his response was more like an answer to a bill in chancery than a pleading in a criminal cause. It was a plea to the jurisdiction, a demurrer, and answer, all in one.

But I assume that where the respondent chooses to avail himself of formal and particular pleading, which the experience of a thousand years has shown to be essential to the protection of innocence, this court will not deny the right, at least without a hearing.

I therefore assume that the court, on its attention being called to the very sweeping terms of this order, will, of its own motion, vacate so much of it as holds that the articles of impeachment are sufficient in law.

The sufficiency in law of the articles is as material to the conviction of the respondent as is the truth in point of fact of the matters therein charged. Before there can be a conviction several things must be established:

First. That the defendant, in fact, has done, or omitted to do, certain things,

Second. That the things he has done or omitted constitute a crime;

Third. And not merely a crime, but a high crime or misdemeanor, meriting impeachment; and

[1] Record of trial, page 159.

Fourth. That the respondent is subject to impeachment, and this court has jurisdiction over him for the hearing and determination of this cause.

If any one of these elements be wanting, there can be no conviction. And of course, as soon as any one of these propositions is established in favor of the respondent he is entitled to an acquittal. I think the point as to jurisdiction has been determined in his favor, inasmuch as more than one-third of the Senate has declared against jurisdiction. But what course we ought to take as a matter of expediency—whether we should move to vacate the order altogether and that the respondent be dismissed; or demur to the articles; and if the demurrer is overruled, answer to the merits and go to trial—should only be determined after consultation of the respondent's counsel.

To this Mr. Manager Scott Lord replied:[1]

One other suggestion. We apprehend that the true object of all trials, civil or criminal, is to reach the merits at the earliest moment. The defendant here stands accused by impeachment, having been a high officer of the Government, of certain crimes and misdemeanors. He has put in one dilatory plea, and that has occupied all his time. He now proposes, after this Senate has so deliberately entered this order; after it, having examined all the pleadings, has found these articles of impeachment sufficient, to try again in that direction. He proposes to demur to the articles of impeachment; and while I can not, perhaps, strictly call a demurrer a plea, yet, in a broader sense, it is. The defendant proposes another dilatory proceeding; I may call it properly another dilatory plea. And how many shall he have? It is absolutely in the discretion of the Senate whether to give him this privilege or not. It is in the discretion of any court of civil or criminal jurisdiction, unless controlled by statutory law.

This defendant accused of these high crimes, after having by his dilatory plea occupied weeks of time, seeks further delay. After this court, under rules which are broader and more liberal than in other courts in regard to pleadings, has deliberately overruled his demurrer, deliberately held his plea for naught, and that the only pleading before this tribunal is the pleading called the "articles of impeachment," and after this court has solemnly adjudged that these articles are sufficient, the defendant by his learned counsel asks you to go back into the courts of law, for rules not binding even there. He wants you to adopt the rules which he says are held in criminal courts, and give him the right, under all the circumstances of this case, to put in this further dilatory plea, because he says what? That he could go into a criminal court and take up these articles of impeachment, and one by one satisfy the tribunal that the pleading would not be good as an indictment. What if he could, and what if the technical rule availed here? It nevertheless is in the discretion of this court whether it will allow him again to stand on a technical point instead of proceeding to the merits. I apprehend it is an application which will not be favored by the Senate. I apprehend this Senate sitting as a court of impeachment will hardly take the position, after this deliberate order, that it will open the whole case again, and for what? Not from a sense of justice to the defendant; not for the purpose of ascertaining the truth; but simply that learned counsel skilled in the criminal courts may stand in this august tribunal and urge that these articles of impeachment have not all the words and phraseology which he thinks would be necessary in a court of criminal jurisdiction to maintain an indictment.

I will not now discuss the question whether the articles of impeachment are sufficient. The counsel himself has confessed the rule that pleadings in this court are entirely distinct and separate as to mere technical rules from pleadings in ordinary criminal proceedings. This court has a broader range; it has an easier path in its high jurisdiction to reach the merits, and therefore I may say, with all respect to this tribunal, that it would be a most extraordinary proceeding, in the judgment of the managers, for this court, without claim of any possible injustice to the defendant, to open this case for another dilatory plea instead of requiring him to go to trial upon the merits.

The Senate finally[2] discarded an order providing that the respondent "have leave to plead further or answer the articles of impeachment within ten days," and agreed to the following:

Ordered, That W. W. Belknap have leave to answer the articles of impeachment within ten days from this date; and that in default of an answer to the merits within ten days, by respondent, to the articles of impeachment, the trial shall proceed as upon a plea of not guilty.

[1] Record of trial, page 160.

[2] Senate Journal, p. 949; Record of trial, pp. 164, 165.

This question of pleadings was touched upon also in the final arguments, Mr. Matt H. Carpenter, speaking[1] at length on the view already advanced by him, and Mr. Manager Scott Lord opposing.[2]

2124. The answer of respondent is part of the pleadings of an impeachment trial, and exhibits in the nature of evidence may not properly be attached thereto.—On February 3, 1905,[3] in the Senate, sitting for the trial of Judge Charles Swayne, at the end of the portion of respondent's answer relating to the first article of impeachment, certain exhibits were attached to show the practice of other Federal judges in certifying their expense accounts to the Department at Washington. Judge Swayne was accused in the first article of rendering false accounts.

At the conclusion of the reading of this portion of the answer, Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, said:

Mr. President, we have attached as exhibits to this answer to the first article three certificates, one from the fifth, one from the seventh, and one from the ninth judicial circuits of the United States, which show that, almost without exception, the amount of $10 per diem was drawn by each and all of the judges, both of the circuit and district courts of those circuits, in their attendance outside of their districts, under the provisions of these laws. We have been unable up to the present time to secure from the Secretary of the Treasury the additional certificates for the other districts.

After concluding the reading of the entire answer of the respondent, Mr. Thurston said:

Now, Mr. President, referring to the fact that certain exhibits which we desired to attach to our answer to article No. 1 had not been attached because of the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury in the short space of time has been unable to furnish it to us, we move as follows:

Counsel for respondent move on order giving them leave to hereafter attach to the answer herein to article 1, as exhibits, additional copies of certificates of the Secretary of the Treasury, showing the amounts certified to and received from the United States by the judges of the first, second, third, fourth, sixth, and eighth judicial circuits, as their reasonable expenses for travel and attendance while holding court away from the places of their residences, and outside of their respective districts, in the year 1903, it having been impossible for the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare and furnish the same to respondent up to the present time.

Mr. Manager Palmer said that the managers did not admit that these exhibits were material,[4] but that they would not object except on the question of delay that might be caused.

Mr. Charles W. Fairbanks, of Indiana, offered this order:

Ordered, That the respondent, Charles Swayne, have leave to hereafter, not later than the 10th instant, attach as further exhibits to his answer to article 1 of the articles of impeachment copies of the certificates of the Secretary of the Treasury, referred to in said answer, showing the amounts certified to and received from the United States by the judges of the first, second, third, fourth, sixth, and eighth judicial circuits as their reasonable expenses for travel and attendance while holding court away from the place of their residence, and outside of their respective districts, in the year 1903.

Mr. Joseph W. Bailey, a Senator from Texas, said:

Mr. President, as a matter of good practice—and I presume we are to conduct this trial according to good practice—it seems to me that this is a request for time in which to exhibit evidence as a part of the pleadings. If this matter is admissible before this court at all, it is admissible as evidence. It does not occur to me as an appropriate proceeding to be giving time in which counsel for the respondent may file evidence with their pleadings. That is as I look at it. If it were desirable to give the counsel time to prepare new allegations I should not object to an order for that; but I do object to having this court put into the attitude of expressly and by order providing for delay, in producing as a part of the pleadings, what properly, as it seems to me, belongs only to the production of evidence.

Mr. Manager Palmer also said:

If, as suggested by the Senator from Texas [Mr. Bailey], it is true that these exhibits are to be considered as evidence, then certainly they ought to be attached before the managers are asked to reply. We had expected to ask until next Monday to reply or to demur or to except to this answer, and the answer ought to be complete before we are asked to reply to it. If this time is postponed until the 10th of February our answer will have been in, and if these matters are matters of evidence it might be quite a serious consideration. Therefore we object to the extension of the time until the 10th of February.

Mr. Thurston then said:

Mr. President, the respondent and his counsel are so anxious to interpose no obstruction to the speedy trial of this case that if, as suggested, our motion would be taken as a ground for asking delay we here and now withdraw it.

The Presiding Officer announced:

The motion is withdrawn, and the Chair supposes the order proposed by the Senator from Indiana is also withdrawn.

So the subject was dropped.

2125. Counsel for respondent in the Swayne trial interposed a plea as to jurisdiction of offenses charged in certain articles, but declined to admit that it was a demurrer with the admissions pertinent thereto.

During time of presentation of testimony in the Swayne trial counsel of respondent were permitted to file a brief on their pleas to jurisdiction.

Form of brief on plea to jurisdiction filed by counsel for respondent in Swayne trial.

On February 22, 1905,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, after the counsel for the respondent had begun to present testimony, but before they had concluded, Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, said:

Mr. President, the respondent has at all times insisted, and still does insist, upon the pleas to the jurisdiction as to the first seven counts. It had been the purpose of my associate, Mr. Higgins, to present our statement and arguments with respect to those pleas as a part of his opening statement. In deference to the evident wish of the Senate and to the imperative demand for the completion of the legislative duties of the Senate, he decided to waive that privilege.

We have prepared a statement and argument as to those pleas to the jurisdiction which we could, of course, use on the final arguments in the case. But we feel it would be fairer to the Senate and to the managers to present those now, and as our position upon the pleas to the jurisdiction and as a part of our presentation of the case we now ask to present our statement and argument and have it printed in the Record, so that the Senate and the managers may have an opportunity before the close of the case to consider it. [To the managers on the part of the House.] Is there any objection?

[1] Third session Fifty-eighth Congress, Record, pp. 3026–3035.

Mr. Manager Henry W. Palmer, of Pennsylvania, replied that the managers did not object.

The Presiding Officer[1] said:

The brief prepared by counsel on the question of jurisdiction as to the first seven articles will be inserted in the Record unless there be objection on the part of the managers or of Senators.

Mr. Thurston then said:

Mr. President, I feel it is our duty to state that this presentation of the historical, constitutional and parliamentary procedure in impeachment proceedings has been prepared not by counsel for respondent, whose names are attached to it, but by a gentleman who is renowned as a scholar along constitutional lines and a lawyer of great ability, and without naming him we wish to disclaim any credit that may attach to the preparation of this document.

Mr. Manager Palmer then stated a question, and the following occurred:

Mr. Manager PALMER. Are you demurring to the first seven articles of impeachment upon the ground that they do not charge an impeachable offense? Is that the idea?

Mr. THURSTON. Our pleas are in to that effect, if the manager has read them.

Mr. Manager PALMER. Exactly. I understand you are filing a demurrer to the first seven articles on the ground that they do not charge impeachable offenses.

Mr. THURSTON. We did interpose special pleas to those articles.

Mr. Manager PALMER. And this argument is intended to support those pleas?

Mr. THURSTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. Manager PALMER. Of course your demurrer admits the truth of all that is stated in those articles.

Mr. THURSTON. I beg pardon.

Mr. Manager PALMER It could not be a demurrer if it did not.

Mr. THURSTON. I beg pardon, Mr. President. We have not demurred. Our pleas stand, and the manager can take any legal view of them that he chooses to present.

The heading and signatures of the document were as follows:

In the Senate of the United States sitting as a court of impeachment. The United States of America against Charles Swayne, a judge of the United States in and for the northern district of Florida. Upon articles of impeachment presented by the House of Representatives.

Argument in support of the pleas to the jurisdiction interposed in behalf of the respondent to articles 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7, such pleas presenting the contention that the facts set forth in said articles, even if true, do not constitute impeachable high crimes and misdemeanors as defined in the Constitution of the United States.

* * * * * * *

The pleas to the jurisdiction interposed in behalf of respondent to articles 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7 should be sustained, because the facts set forth in said articles, even if true, do not constitute "high crimes and misdemeanors," as defined in Article II, section 4, of the Constitution of the United States.

ANTHONY HIGGINS,
JOHN M. THURSTON,
Counsel for Respondent.

2126. The managers being introduced in the Senate and having signified their readiness to exhibit articles of impeachment, the Presiding Officer directs proclamation to be made.

Form of proclamation made by the Sergeant-at-Arms when managers bring articles of impeachment to the Senate.

Articles of impeachment being exhibited by the managers, the Presiding Officer says that the Senate will take proper order and inform the House thereof.

[1] Orville H. Platt, of Connecticut, Presiding Officer.

In 1868 the Senate ceased in its rules to describe the House of Representatives while acting in impeachment cases as the grand inquest of the nation.

Present form and history of Rule II of the Senate rules for impeachments.

Rule II of the "Rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials" is as follows:

When the managers of an impeachment shall be introduced at the bar of the Senate and shall signify that they are ready to exhibit articles of impeachment against any person, the [Presiding Officer] of the Senate shall direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to make proclamation, who shall, after making proclamation, repeat the following words, viz: "All persons are commanded to keep silence, on pain of imprisonment, while the House of Representatives is exhibiting to the Senate of the United States articles of impeachment against ——— ———;" after which the articles shall be exhibited, and then the Presiding Officer of the Senate shall inform the managers that the Senate will take proper order on the subject of the impeachment, of which due notice shall be given to the House of Representatives.

The origin of this rule is found in the trial of William Blount in 1797.[1] In 1804[2] at the impeachment of Judge Pickering, the committee having charge of the rules—Messrs. Uriah Tracy, of Connecticut, Stephen R. Bradley, of Vermont, Abraham Baldwin, of Georgia, Robert Wright, of Maryland, and William Cocke, of Tennessee—made a new draft of the words to be repeated after proclamation. At the trial of Blount they had been:

All persons are commanded to keep silence while the Senate of the United States are receiving articles of impeachment against ——— ———, on pain of imprisonment.

Mr. Tracy's committee modified this to this form:

All persons are commanded to keep silence, on pain of imprisonment, while the grand inquest of the nation is exhibiting to the Senate of the United States, sitting as a court of impeachments, articles of impeachment against ——— ———.

For the trial of Judge Chase, in 1805, the rule was adopted in practically the identical form agreed to by Mr. Tracy's committee, except that the words "sitting as a court of impeachments" were omitted.[3] There does not seem to have been significance in the omission of these words, since the articles of impeachment against Judge Chase were received by the Senate sitting as a high court of impeachment. In 1868, during the proceedings against President Johnson, the rules were revised, but the committee reported[4] this rule in the form as used since 1805. While the rules were under debate on February 29, Mr. Thomas A. Hendricks, of Indiana, said as to the language of the announcement:

In the Constitution which the fathers adopted, after grave consideration, they said that the House of Representatives should impeach an officer. We say that "the grand inquest of the nation" shall impeach. Where is the advantage of this new language? Why not make proclamation in the Senate here that "the House of Representatives impeaches the President of the United States?" It is not sufficiently high sounding is all the trouble about it. It expresses exactly the thought that the Constitution does, truly and correctly, and does not refer us to some body of men not known to our system of government.

The matter was not further discussed, and on March 2,[1] on motion of Mr. Hendricks, without further debate or division, the words "grand inquest of the nation" were stricken out and "House of Representatives" inserted. So the rule came to its present form.

2127. Upon presentation of articles of impeachment and the organization of the Senate for the trial, a writ of summons is issued to the accused.

The writ of summons to one accused in articles of impeachment recites the articles and notifies him to appear at a fixed time and place and file his answer.

The rule specifying the method of serving writs of summons to one accused in articles of impeachment.

The person accused in articles of impeachment failing to appear or to answer, the trial proceeds as on a plea of not guilty.

The person accused in articles of impeachment may appear in person or by attorney.

If a plea of guilty be entered in answer to articles of impeachment, judgment may be entered without further proceedings.

Present form and history of Rule VIII of the Senate sitting for impeachment trials.

Rule VIII of the "Rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials" is as follows:

Upon the presentation of articles of impeachment and the organization of the Senate as hereinbefore provided, a writ of summons shall issue to the accused, reciting said articles, and notifying him to appear before the Senate upon a day and at a place to be fixed by the Senate and named in such writ, and file his answer to said articles of impeachment, and to stand to and abide the orders and judgments of the Senate thereon; which writ shall be served by such officer or person as shall be named in the precept thereof, such number of days prior to the day fixed for such appearance as shall be named in such precept either by the delivery of an attested copy thereof to the person accused, or if that can not conveniently be done, by leaving such copy at the last known place of abode of such person, or at his usual place of business in some conspicuous place therein; or if such service shall be, in the judgment of the Senate, impracticable, notice to the accused to appear shall be given in such other manner, by publication or otherwise, as shall be deemed just, and if the writ aforesaid shall fail of service in the manner aforesaid, the proceedings shall not thereby abate, but further service may be made in such manner as the Senate shall direct. If the accused, after service, shall fail to appear, either in person or by attorney, on the day so fixed therefor as aforesaid, or, appearing, shall fail to file his answer to such articles of impeachment, the trial shall proceed, nevertheless, as upon a plea of not guilty. If a plea of guilty shall be entered, judgment may be entered thereon without further proceedings.

This rule dates from 1868,[2] when it was adopted preliminary to the trial of President Johnson. It was reported from a committee of which Mr Jacob M. Howard, of Michigan, was chairman, in its present general form; but during consideration in the Senate the word "court" was stricken out wherever it occurred, and the word "Senate" substituted, to conform to a general decision of the Senate.

Form of oath administered to the returning officer in an impeachment case.

The oath taken by the returning officer in an impeachment case is spread on the records.

Present form and history of Rule IX of the Senate in impeachment cases.

Rule IX of the "Rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials" is as follows:

> At 12.30 o'clock afternoon of the day appointed for the return of the summons against the person impeached, the legislative and executive business of the Senate shall be suspended, and the Secretary of the Senate shall administer an oath to the returning officer in the form following, viz: "I, ——— ———, do solemnly swear that the return made by me upon the process issued on the —— day of ———, by the Senate of the United States, against ——— ———, is truly made, and that I have performed such service as therein described: So help me God." Which oath shall be entered at large on the records.

This rule, with slight changes, dates from the Chase trial in 1805.[1] In 1868[2] in preparation for the trial of President Johnson, it was adopted in exactly its present form.

2129. In an impeachment case the writ of summons being returned, the accused is called to appear and answer the articles.

The person impeached being called to appear and answer, a record is made as to appearance or nonappearance.

The person impeached may appear to answer the articles in person or by attorney, and a record is made as to the mode of appearance.

When the person accused in articles of impeachment appears by agent or attorney, a record is made naming the person appearing and the capacity in which he appears.

Present form and history of Rule X of the Senate sitting for impeachments.

Rule X of the "Rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials" provides:

> The person impeached shall then be called to appear and answer the articles of impeachment against him. If he appear, or any person for him, the appearance shall be recorded, stating particularly if by himself, or by agent or attorney, naming the person appearing and the capacity in which he appears. If he do not appear, either personally or by agent or attorney, the same shall be recorded.

This rule was first adopted in 1805,[3] for the Chase trial. In 1868,[4] during proceedings for the impeachment of President Johnson, the rules were generally revised, but this rule was changed only by dropping out the word "exhibited" after "articles of impeachment." It was then agreed to in the present form.

2130. In impeachment proceedings before the Senate counsel for the respondent is admitted and heard.

Present form and history of Rule XIV of the Senate sitting for impeachment trials.

Rule XIV of the "Rules of procedure and practice for the Senate when sitting in impeachment trials" is as follows:

Counsel for the parties shall be admitted to appear and be heard upon an impeachment.

This rule in identically its present form dates from the Chase trial in 1805.[1] It then embodied what had been the practice in preceding trials.

2131. In impeachment trials all motions made by the parties or counsel are addressed to the Presiding Officer, and must be in writing, if required.

Present form and history of Rule XV of the Senate sitting for impeachment trials.

Rule XV of the "Rules of procedure and practice for the Senate when sitting in impeachment trials" is as follows:

All motions made by the parties or their counsel shall be addressed to the Presiding Officer, and if he, or any Senator, shall require it, they shall be committed to writing, and read at the Secretary's table.

This rule was first drafted in 1805,[1] for the trial of Judge Chase. It had then an additional clause providing how the vote should be taken on such motions. In 1868,[2] when the rules were revised, it was given its present form, the words "presiding officer" being substituted for "President of the Senate," and the clause relating to voting being stricken out. The words "or any Senator" were also inserted at this time.

2132. In an impeachment trial the case is opened by one person on each side.

The final arguments on the merits in an impeachment trial are made by two persons on each side, unless ordered otherwise upon application.

The final argument on the merits in an impeachment trial is opened and closed by the House of Representatives.

Present form and history of Rule XXI of the Senate sitting for impeachment trials.

Rule XXI of the "Rules of proceeding and practice for the Senate when sitting in impeachment trials" is as follows:

The case, on each side, shall be opened by one person. The final argument on the merits may be made by two persons on each side (unless otherwise ordered by the Senate upon application for that purpose), and the argument shall be opened and closed on the part of the House of Representatives.

This rule dates from 1868,[3] when a committee, of which Mr. Jacob M. Howard, of Michigan, was chairman, reported a revision of the rules, in view of the approaching trial of President Andrew Johnson. The rule as reported was in this form:

XXI. The final argument on the merits may be made by two persons on each side, and the argument shall be opened and closed on the part of the House of Representatives.

[3] Second session Fortieth Congress, Senate Report No. 59.

On March 2,[1] this rule was debated fully, and amended so as to stand in its present form. Mr. Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts, proposed an amendment which, after discussion, was adopted in form as follows:

The case, on each side, shall be opened by one person.

During the debate Mr. Roscoe Conkling explained this amendment on behalf of Mr. Sumner, who had been called away:

The Senator from Massachusetts thought that when the managers came here and rose to open their case and had proceeded an hour perhaps the Senator from Indiana or some other Senator would say, "This now is a proceeding, a question falling within the first of these two rules; it is a preliminary or interlocutory matter, and therefore to be restricted to an hour." That there might be no question about it, the Senator from Massachusetts proposes that the two rules shall stand precisely as they are now, the latter of which rules gives to counsel the right to sum up the evidence at any length they please, be it a day or four days or ten days each; but that before the evidence has been delivered, before the witnesses are called, that explanatory statement which is called "an opening" shall be made by one person on each side, one manager on the part of the House of Representatives in the beginning, and one counsel on the part of the respondent after the evidence for the prosecution is closed and the respondent comes to make his case. To cover that, the Senator from Massachusetts interposes this rule between the two (leaving the previous rule to operate upon interlocutory matters, as it does), to provide for the opening of the case on each side respectively before the evidence is delivered, and then to leave to counsel to sum up, or close the case, or, in the language of the rule, to make the "final argument on the merits" at any length they please. That is the meaning of it, as I understand it.

A question having been raised by Mr. Thomas A. Hendricks, of Indiana, Mr. Conkling said further:

The idea is that the practice is to be precisely as it is in Indiana—not the practice in Westminster Hall, but the practice as we know it in this country. The plaintiff, for illustration, opens his case and gives his evidence and finishes it, then the defendant opens his case and gives his evidence and finishes it; and then the summing up occurs. That is the design here—that the prosecutors for the House of Representatives open their case and prove it as far as they can; then the respondent opens his case and proves it as far as he can. That is precisely what the amendment means, I submit. I know that is the design of the mover.

The amendment was agreed to without division.

A more serious question arose as to the number of persons who should be permitted to sum up on each side. Mr. James W. Grimes, of Iowa, objected that the number should not be restricted, saying:

If I remember rightly the history of impeachment trials in England, the members of the managers and the counsel on the part of the defense have addressed their arguments to a particular issue that was involved in a particular specification; and I think that was the case in this country in the celebrated Chase trial, and in the Peck trial. There were divers and sundry specifications, to each of which the defendant pleaded not guilty. One manager argued each particular specification; and one of the counsel on the part of the defense replied to him. Each article was one of the points upon which the court had to pronounce that the defendant was either guilty or not guilty, and each was argued separately.

Now, had we not better leave this whole matter to be settled by a conference between the attorneys of the respective sides when they shall reach the argument than to say now peremptorily that ten or twenty articles shall all be combined in the speech of the counsel instead of being severed, as they have been in previous trials, and limiting them to two speeches on each side? My own opinion is that a question of practice of that kind belongs purely to the court; and if we are to resolve ourselves from a Senate into a court, it ought to be settled by the court itself, when the Chief Justice, who is to preside over us, is present to give us the aid of his counsel.

[1] Senate Journal, pp. 242, 243, 814; Globe, pp. 1580–1585.

Mr. Garrett Davis, of Kentucky, speaking in the same line, said:

I can state to the honorable Senator from Vermont and to the Senate that in every case of crime of any great interest, and especially a capital crime, I have never known the argument of the case on the part of the defense by a less number of counsel than three, and it is often by five. I agree with the Senator from Indiana that in the management of the case, if you introduce more than two counsel, if they are competent counsel, you embarrass the case and you weaken the prosecution or the defense. But it is not so always in the argument of cases of importance. It is a universal practice in the criminal courts of Kentucky that where a case of interest involving capital punishment is under trial, and the accused desires it, he is heard by at least three counsel in his defense.

Mr. President, I have learned this fact in relation to impeachments—that they are to be treated with more liberality on both sides than the stringent practice and forms and rules of proceeding in criminal cases, and that those rules which are introduced into criminal cases to economize time have never been resorted to as a general rule in the trial of impeachments. It seems to me that all the modes of proceeding and all the practice in cases of impeachment ought to be more liberal, ought to be more free from restrictions, and especially technical restrictions, and restrictions simply to save time, than criminal prosecutions. And yet the honorable committee that have reported these rules of proceeding and practice are restricting the proceedings in this and all future cases of impeachment much more rigorously than is known in the criminal practice in the courts of Kentucky.

Mr. James Dixon, of Connecticut, said:

I most deeply regret to see what I think I see, what I can not help seeing, in the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts and some other Senators. That Senator speaks as if the consumption of a day or two days or three days or even four days, taken up in the defense of this great trial, was to be regretted, a thing to be deprecated and avoided; and he points out as something to be shunned that Mr. Burke spoke four days in the great trial of Warren Hastings. I confess I have not that feeling. I regret that the Senator has it; I regret that any Senator has it. I do not think it is to the credit of this body when entering upon this great trial, impartial as undoubtedly we all are, wishing to do justice in a solemn case of this kind, bringing before us the President of the United States, that gentlemen are disposed to deny him on the final argument upon ten charges the privilege of being heard by as many counsel as he wishes.

In behalf of the restriction, Mr. Sumner said:

The Senator forgets that on the trial of Judge Peck Mr. Wirt, in a speech which I have sometimes thought was the most masterly forensic effort in the history of our country, occupied the attention of the Senate two full days. The Senator will also remember that on the trial of Warren Hastings, Mr. Burke occupied the attention of the court of impeachment for four successive days, and there were other gentlemen on both sides, managers, and also counselors for the defense, who occupied the attention of the court each for several days.

I merely refer to these historical precedents that we may be reminded in advance of the possibilities of a trial like this; and a Senator near me says, the probabilities. Perhaps that is a better word; but I prefer to express myself in the most moderate manner, and I therefore said simply "the possibilities." It seems to me that it is our duty to provide against probabilities or possibilities even.

And Mr. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, said:

Now, as to the propriety of this rule as a general rule. Is there a Senator on this floor who would stand up and say of his own personal knowledge of criminal practice in his own State that this rule does not exist in all their courts? I do not mean as a written rule necessarily; but is it not a general rule in every court in the United States of America, either State or national, that only two counsel are heard on a side in the summing up of a cause? A man is tried for his life, and, as a general rule—there may be exceptions, but I never heard of them in that case—only two counsel are heard in his defense, and only two for the prosecution. So all civil rights and questions involving the operations of law over vast sections of country are determined in the same way. This very day, in another Chamber of this building, before the Supreme Court of the United States, a cause is argued which may involve the peace and safety of the inhabitants of ten States, and of millions of persons, and it is confined, by the rules of that court, to two counsel on a side, and nobody complains that any injustice is being done to any one.

After the debate had continued for some time, Mr. Edmunds proposed the following amendment, which was agreed to without division:

Insert, after the words "on each side," the words "unless otherwise ordered by the court upon application for that purpose."

The word "court" was afterwards changed to "Senate" in accordance with a general conclusion to which the Senate had arrived.

Mr. Dixon, referring to the law of Connecticut as a precedent, then proposed the addition of the following clause:

And the counsel of the party accused in all trials to which these rules are to apply shall be allowed the closing turn in the final argument.

Mr. Orris S. Ferry, of Connecticut, said it had been the law of Connecticut since 1848, but had worked badly. The amendment was rejected without division.

2133. In the opening address in an impeachment trial it is proper to outline what it is expected to prove; but it is not proper to quote evidence which may or may not be admissible later.—On February 10, 1905,[1] in the Senate sitting for the trial of Charles Swayne, Mr. Henry W. Palmer, of Pennsylvania, was making the opening address on behalf of the managers, and had outlined what they expected to prove in support of the article charging the improper use of a private railway car. Mr. Palmer went on to say:

The respondent acknowledged the facts, as above stated, but defended his action upon the ground that the property of the railroad company being in the hands of the court, he, the judge of the court, had a right to use it without making compensation to the railroad company.

When questioned on the subject, we shall prove that he said, in answer to this question:

"Q. You said this car was one of the cars in possession of the court, because the road was in the hands of a receiver?—A. Yes.

"Q. You said that it was the privilege of the court to use that car, because the road was in the hands of a receiver?—A. Yes."

Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, objected:

Mr. President, the statement that is now being read, as the record shows, is a part of the testimony of Judge Swayne taken before the committee of the House of Representatives, which, under the acts of Congress, can not be used against him in any criminal prosecution; and therefore it is improper to make the statement that the chairman of the managers is now proceeding to make. We object to the presentation here, by statement or otherwise, of any testimony that was given by Judge Swayne, the respondent, before the House committee, claiming his right, under the law of the Congress of the United States, that it can not be used against him in any criminal prosecution, of which this certainly is one.

After brief argument the Presiding Officer [2] said:

Of course, the managers on the part of the House and the counsel on the part of the respondent have somewhat wide latitude in their opening statements, but the Presiding Officer is of opinion that testimony which has been given by Judge Swayne on the occasion referred to ought not to be cited at length. He has a right to plead his privilege. He can not be obliged to criminate himself. * * * It seems to the Presiding Officer to be an indirect way of getting before the Senate the fact that Judge Swayne had testified to this. The Presiding Officer suggests to the manager that he may properly omit the reading of testimony which had been given on another occasion by Judge Swayne.

[2] Orville H. Platt, of Connecticut, Presiding Officer.

Very soon after, in outlining the case as to the charge of nonresidence, Mr. Palmer said:

The facts, as they will appear in the testimony, are that after his confirmation as judge in 1890 he established his residence at St. Augustine, in a house rented from Mr. Flagler, and lived there with his family until the boundaries of his district were changed by the act of Congress in the year 1894. Judge Swayne states that he was urged by his friends not to move his family or furniture, that the next Congress would probably restore his district, and therefore his furniture was allowed to remain in St. Augustine until the year 1900, when he rented the Simmons cottage in Pensacola and lived there at intervals until 1903, when his wife bought a home. During the six years——

Mr. Higgins objected.

Mr. President, I wish to say that that statement is again contrary to the rule we have invoked as to the statute.

The Presiding Officer[1] held—

The Presiding Officer thinks that the manager has a right to state what he expects to prove, but that he ought not to go further by citing any testimony which has been given by Judge Swayne on another occasion as the means by which he expects to prove it.

2134. The opening address in an impeachment trial should be confined to what is to be proven, and how it is to be proven, and should not include extended argument on the whole case.—On February 21, 1905,[2] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne Mr. Anthony Higgins, of counsel for the respondent, was making the opening address preliminary to the introduction of testimony for the respondent, and in the course of his remarks made various citations which he asked the Secretary to read. Thus he had read extracts from the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in the cases of Bradley v. Fisher; In re Cuddy, petitioner; In re Savin, and an extract from the answer of one O'Neal in a lawsuit out of which arose one of the causes of Judge Swayne's impeachment.

After the reading of this extract the Presiding Officer[1] interrupted saying:

The Secretary will suspend for a moment. Why does the counsel claim that this is proper in an opening? The Presiding Officer supposed that the opening of a case on the part of the managers or on the part of counsel should be limited to a statement of the issues raised in the case, and what the parties propose to prove either for the prosecution or the defense. How do these extracts which the Secretary has been asked to read fall within what the Presiding Officer supposes to be the proper line of an opening on behalf of the respondent?

Mr. Higgins replied:

I will state, Mr. President, in the first instance, that a perusal of the statement of counsel in the Peck case shows that the managers went very fully into the merits of the case on the argument. Mr. Meredith, in opening for the respondent, did not. I thought, therefore, that I was entirely within the rules of this anomalous proceeding, which is not by common law, is not in equity, but is according to the lex et consuetudo parliamenti. The articles and answers are drawn from the civil law. They are not known to our own practice, and therefore I have supposed that it was a proceeding where the largest latitude was given to counsel in the first instance.

In the second place I desire to say, Mr. President, on this interesting point that the Greenhut testimony has not been read, and it is impossible to get a statement of the issues without it. I could have had read the affidavit of Greenhut, I could have read Greenhut's testimony, so as to get them before the court as to what they would show, but I have elected to leave them out, and was stating what O'Neal's was. Moreover, I thought it was the shortest way in which I could proceed.

[1] Orville H. Platt, of Connecticut, Presiding Officer.

[2] Third session Fifty-eighth Congress, Record, p. 2977.

The Presiding Officer then said:

The Presiding Officer, of course, does not wish to limit counsel for respondent as to any of their just rights, but as was suggested a moment ago the Presiding Officer supposed that an opening on behalf of the person accused was to be confined strictly to the issues raised and what the counsel expected to prove, and how they expected to be able to prove it. This opening seems to have taken the form of an extended argument on the whole case, which the Presiding Officer had supposed would be more proper, to say the least, when the case came to be finally argued. Perhaps the Presiding Officer is only expressing a little the impatience of the Senate, and without attempting to fix limits, he wants to suggest that the opening should be concluded as quickly and as rapidly as counsel feel that it can be in presenting their case to the Senate.

2135. At the trial of President Johnson both managers and counsel for respondent objected successfully to the rule limiting the number speaking in final argument.

In the final argument in the Johnson trial the conclusion was required to be by one manager.

The privilege of submitting a written instead of an oral argument in the final summing up was allowed in the Johnson trial.

In the Johnson trial the Senate declined to limit the time of the final arguments.

The Chief Justice ruled during the Johnson trial that a proposed order should, under the Senate practice, lie over one day before consideration.

On April 11, 1868,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Mr. Frederick T. Frelinghuysen, Senator from New Jersey, proposed the following:

Ordered, That as many of the managers and of the counsel for the respondent be permitted to speak on the final argument as shall choose to do so.

The Chief Justice[2] held that under the rules of the Senate the order would not be considered until the next day.

On April 13,[3] the order came up in the Senate sitting for the trial, and Mr. Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts, at once proposed the following to come in at the end:

Provided, That the trial shall proceed without any further delay or postponement on this account.

Mr. Manager Thomas Williams, of Pennsylvania, referred to the rule of the Senate (Rule XXI), which provided that the final arguments "may be made by two persons on each side (unless otherwise ordered by the Senate upon application for that purpose), and the argument shall be opened and closed on the part of the House of Representatives," and said that the rule as it stood was calculated to embarrass the managers, whose number had been fixed by the House at seven. In the preceding impeachment cases wherein a defense had been made, the cases of [1] Second session Fortieth Congress, Senate Journal, p. 887; Globe Supplement, p. 147.

Judges Chase and Peck, the numbers of managers were, respectively, seven and five, and in the one case six of the seven managers were heard in concluding argument, and in the other all five were heard. In neither of those cases did there seem to have been any question as to the right of the House to be heard through all its managers. And going to the English precedents, in the famous case of Warren Hastings all the managers were heard in argument.

After further debate Mr. Frelinghuysen modified his order as follows:

Ordered, That as many of the managers and of the counsel for the President be permitted to speak on the final argument as shall choose to do so: Provided, That the trial shall proceed without any further delay or postponement on this account: And provided further, That only one manager shall be heard in the close.

Mr. Manager George S. Boutwell objected to the proposition to limit the close to one manager. He recited that in the trial of Judge Peck the case was first summed up by two managers on the part of the House, then the case of the respondent was argued by two of his counsel, and then the case was closed by the arguments of two managers. And in the case of Judge Peck, after the counsel for the respondent had concluded, the case was closed by three managers. He also cited the ably conducted trial of Judge Prescott, in Massachusetts, wherein two arguments were made by the managers after the close of the argument for the respondent.

Mr. Sumner then proposed to amend by striking out the last proviso and inserting:

And provided, That according to the practice in cases of impeachment the several managers who speak shall close.

Mr. George H. Williams, of Oregon, in order to test the sense of the Senate as to the desirability of changing the existing rule, moved that the order and pending amendment be laid on the table. This motion was agreed to, yeas 38, nays 10.

On April 14,[1] Mr. Sumner offered this order:

Ordered, In answer to the motion of the managers, that under the rule limiting the argument to two on a side unless otherwise ordered, such other managers and counsel as choose may print and file arguments at any time before the argument of the closing manager.

This order going over for consideration until the next day a discussion arose as to the time of submitting the written arguments, and Mr. John Conness, of California, proposed this amendment:

Strike out all after the word "ordered" and insert:

"That the twenty-first rule be so amended as to allow as many of the managers and of the counsel for the President to speak on the final argument as shall choose to do so: Provided, That not more than four days on each side shall be allowed; but the managers shall make the opening and the closing argument."

The question being taken, the substitute was disagreed to, yeas 19, nays 27.

Thereupon Mr. Jonathan Doolittle, of Wisconsin, proposed an amendment:

Strike out all after the word "ordered" and insert:

"That upon the final argument two managers of the House open, two counsel for the respondent reply; that two other managers rejoin, to be followed by two other counsel for the respondent; and they, in turn, to be followed by two other managers of the House, who shall conclude the argument."

[1] Senate Journal, pp. 896, 897; Globe Supplement, pp. 174, 175.

Thereupon Mr. Charles D. Drake, of Missouri, moved that the proposed order and pending amendment be postponed indefinitely. This motion was agreed to, yeas 34, nays 15.

On April 20,[1] after the introduction of evidence had been concluded, Mr. Manager John A. Logan asked of the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial, that he be permitted to file a printed argument instead of arguing orally. After some discussion Mr. William M. Stewart, a Senator from Nevada, offered this order:

Ordered, That the honorable Manager Logan have leave to file his written argument to-day and furnish a copy to each of the counsel for the respondent.

To this Mr. John Sherman, a Senator from Ohio, offered the following as a substitute:

That the managers on the part of the House of Representatives and the counsel for the respondent have leave to file written or printed arguments before the oral argument commences.

Mr. Stewart accepted the substitute as an amendment, and it was considered by the Senate in lieu of the original resolution offered by Mr. Stewart.

On April 22 the amendment of Mr. Stewart, in its modified form, was considered, and Mr. George Vickers, a Senator from Maryland, proposed as a substitute:

As the counsel for the President have signified to the Senate sitting as a court for the trial of the impeachment, that they did not desire to file written or printed arguments, but preferred to argue orally, if allowed to do so: Therefore,

Resolved, That any two of the managers other than those who under the present rule are to open and close the discussion, and who have not already addressed the Senate, be permitted to file written arguments at or before the adjournment of to-day, or to make oral addresses after the opening by one of the managers and the first reply of the President's counsel, and that other two of the counsel for the President who have not spoken may have the privilege of reply, but alternating with the said two managers, leaving the closing argument for the President and the managers' final reply to be made under the original rule.

This proposed substitute was agreed to, yeas 26, nays 20; but immediately thereafter the order as amended by the substitute was disagreed to, yeas 20, nays 26.

Thereupon Mr. Vickers offered the following:

Ordered, That one of the managers on the part of the House be permitted to file his printed argument before the adjournment of to-day, and that after an oral opening by a manager, and the reply of one of the President's counsel, another of the President's counsel shall have the privilege of filing a written or of making an oral address, to be followed by the closing speech of one of the President's counsel, and the final reply of a manager under the existing rule.

Mr. John Conness, a Senator from California, thereupon moved to amend by striking out all after the word "ordered" and inserting:

That such of the managers and counsel for the President as may choose to do so have leave to file arguments on or before Friday, April 24.

The amendment of Mr. Conness was disagreed to, yeas 24, nays 25.

The original order as proposed by Mr. Vickers being under consideration, it was, on motion of Mr. Reverdy Johnson, of Maryland, amended by striking out the word "one" in the first line and inserting "two." Then, on motion of Mr. John Sherman, of Ohio, the words "or written" were inserted between the words

[1] Senate Journal, p. 916; Globe Supplement, pp. 247–251.

"printed" and "arguments." And on motion of Mr. John Conness, of California, the time was lengthened from "adjournment of to-day" to "before to-morrow noon."

Thereupon Mr. John B. Henderson, of Missouri, offered an amendment subsequently modified to read as follows:

Amend by striking out all after the word "ordered" and inserting:

"That subject to the twenty-first rule all the managers not delivering oral arguments may be permitted to file written arguments at any time before the 24th instant, and the counsel for the President not making oral arguments may file written arguments at any time before 11 o'clock of Monday, the 27th instant."

A motion to lay the whole subject on the table was disagreed to, yeas 13, nays 37.

At this stage of the proceedings Mr. Thomas A. R. Nelson, of Tennessee, of counsel for the President, addressed the Senate, asking that all the counsel for the President who should be able to participate—Mr. Stanbery being ill—should have leave to address the Senate either orally or in writing, as they should elect. He concluded:

I may say, although I am not expressly authorized to do so, that I am satisfied the President desires that his cause shall be argued by the two additional counsel whom he has provided in the case, besides the three counsel who were heretofore selected for that purpose; and I trust you will not deny us this right. I trust that you will feel at liberty to extend it to all the counsel in the case. If we choose to avail ourselves of it we will do so. I have no sort of objection, so far as I am concerned, that the same right shall be extended to all or to more than an equal number of the managers on the other side. I trust that the resolution will be so shaped as to embrace all the counsel who are engaged in the cause in behalf of the President.

Mr. Nelson also cited the precedent of Judge Chase's trial, when six of the managers and five of counsel for the respondent were permitted to address the Senate.

After consideration of suggested amendments, Mr. Lyman Trumbull, of Illinois, proposed to amend Mr. Henderson's amendment by striking out all after the word "that" and inserting:

As many of the managers and of the counsel for the President as desire to do so be permitted to file arguments or to address the Senate orally.

And this amendment was agreed to, yeas 29, nays 20.

Then, on motion of Mr. Charles R. Buckalew, of Pennsylvania, these words were added:

But the conclusion of the oral argument shall be by one manager, as provided in the twenty-first rule.

Mr. Richard Yates moved to amend by striking out all after the word "that" and inserting:

Four of the managers and four of the counsel for the respondent be permitted to make printed or written or oral arguments, the managers to have the opening and closing, subject to the limitation of the twenty-first rule.

This amendment to the amendment was disagreed to, yeas 18, nays 31.

Then by a vote of yeas 28, nays 22 the substitute of Mr. Henderson, as amended by the propositions of Messrs. Trumbull and Buckalew, was agreed to, and then the order as amended was agreed to. So it was—

Ordered, That as many of the managers and of the counsel for the President as desire to do so be permitted to file arguments or to address the Senate orally, but the conclusion of the oral argument shall be by one manager as provided in the twenty-first rule.

2136. After elaborate investigation it was held that the opening and closing arguments on incidental questions in impeachment trials belong to the side making the motion or objection.

The claim of the managers to the closing of all arguments arising in course of an impeachment trial has been denied after examination of American and English precedents.

Discussion of the technical forms of pleading in an impeachment trial, as related to right of opening and closing arguments on an incidental question.

Instance wherein the Senate sitting for an impeachment trial fixed the number of managers and counsel to argue on an incidental question.

One of the managers in an impeachment trial may not move to rescind an order of the Senate as to the conduct of the trial.

On March 23, 1868,[1] in the Senate while sitting for the trial of the impeachment of President Johnson, the counsel for the President offered an application that thirty days be allowed the President and his counsel for the preparation of his case.

The managers for the House of Representatives were first heard, Mr. Manager John A. Logan opposing the request. Then Mr. William M. Evarts, of counsel for the President, was heard in favor. Mr. Manager James F. Wilson next opposed, and was followed by Mr. Henry Stanbery, counsel for the President, who favored the application.

Then Mr. Manager John A. Bingham proposed to reply on behalf of the House of Representatives.

The Chief Justice,[2] who was the Presiding Officer under the Constitution, said:

The Chair announced at the last sitting that he would not undertake to restrict counsel as to number without the further order of the Senate, the rule not being very intelligible to him. He will state further that when counsel make a motion to the court the counsel who makes the motion has invariably the right to close the argument upon it.

Thereupon Mr. Manager Bingham asked the decision of the Senate, saying:

Mr. President, with all respect touching the suggestion just made by the Presiding Officer of the Senate, I beg leave to remind the Senate, and I am instructed to do so by my associate managers, that from time immemorial in proceedings of this kind the right of the Commons in England and of the Representatives of the people in the United States to close the debate has not been, by any rule, settled against them. On the contrary, in Lord Melville's case, if I may be allowed and pardoned for making reference to it, the last case, I believe, reported in England, Lord Erskine presiding, when the very question was made which has now been submitted by the Presiding Officer to the Senate, one of the managers of the House of Commons arose in his place and said that he owed it to the Commons to protest against the immemorial usage being denied to the Commons of England to be heard in reply to whatever might be said on behalf of the accused at the bar of the Peers. In that case the language of the manager, Mr. Giles, was:

"My Lords, it was not my intention to trouble your lordships with any observations upon the arguments you have heard; and if I now do so it is only for the sake of insisting upon and maintaining that right which the Commons contend is their acknowledged and undoubted privilege—the right of being heard after the counsel for the defendant has made his observations in reply. It has been invariably admitted when required."—(State Trials, vol. 29, p. 762; 44 to 46 George III.)

Lord Erskine "responded the right of the Commons to reply was never doubted or disputed."

Following the suggestion of the learned gentleman who has just taken his seat, I believe that when that utterance was made it had been the continued rule in England for nearly five hundred years.

In this tribunal, in the first case of impeachment that ever was tried before the Senate of the United States under the Constitution (I refer to the case of Blount), the Senate will see by a reference to it that although the accused had the affirmative of the issue, although he interposed a plea to the jurisdiction, the argument was closed in the case by the manager of the House, Mr. Harper. (Wharton's State Trials of the United States, pp. 314–315.)

When I rose, however, at the time the honorable Senator spoke, I rose for the purpose of making some response to the remarks last made for the accused; but as the Presiding Officer has interposed the suggestion to the Senate whether the managers can further reply I do not deem it proper for me to proceed further until the Senate shall pass upon this question.

Some discussion arising, Mr. Reverdy Johnson, of Maryland, called for the reading of this rule:

20. All preliminary or interlocutory questions and all motions shall be argued for not exceeding one hour on each side, unless the Senate shall, by order, extend the time.

Mr. Manager Bingham thereupon stated that the managers had used but thirty-five minutes of their time.

Thereupon Mr. Bingham was allowed to proceed.

At the close of his remarks there was no claim for recognition from the counsel for the President, and a vote was taken.

2137. On April 1, 1868,[1] in the Senate during the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Hon. Walter A. Burleigh, Delegate from Dakota Territory, a witness called by the managers, was being examined, when counsel for the President objected to the competency of a certain question. After arguments had proceeded for some time, the following colloquy occurred between Messrs. Managers John A. Bingham and Benjamin F. Butler on the one side and Mr. Henry Stanbery, of counsel for the President, on the other:

Mr. Manager BINGHAM. I rise to a question here. I understand that we speak here under a rule of the Senate, as yet at least, that requires us to be restricted to an hour on each side.

Mr. STANBERY. And one counsel, if you go according to the rule.

Mr. Manager BINGHAM. No; I do not understand that. I understand, on the contrary, that the practice heretofore thus far in the progress of this trial has been to allow the counsel to divide their time as they pleased, within but one hour on each side. The point to which I rise now, however, is this: That we understand that in a proceeding of this sort the managers have always claimed and asserted, where the point was raised at all, the right to conclude upon all questions that were raised in the progress of the trial. The hour has been well nigh expended in this instance on each side, as I am told, though I have not taken any special note of the time. But we raise the question; and I state that the fact that our time has been exhausted, as I am advised, is the only reason why I raise it now; and thus we are cut off from any further reply. Our only object in raising the question is that we shall not be deemed to have waived it, because we are advised that it was settled years ago in Melville's case by the Lord Chancellor presiding and by the Peers that the managers might waive their privilege by their silence.

Mr. Manager BUTLER. We have the affirmative.

Mr. STANBERY. On this question? Oh, no.

[1] Second session Fortieth Congress, Globe Supplement, p. 70.

2138. On April 28, 1876,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, the following order was made in a secret session of the Senate, which had retired for consultation, and was reported:

Ordered, That the hearing proceed on the 4th of May, 1876, at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.; that the opening and close of the argument be given to the respondent; that three counsel and three managers may be heard in such order as may be agreed on between themselves, and that such time be allowed for argument as the managers and counsel may desire.

The argument here referred to was on a question in the nature of a demurrer raised by the plea of the respondent that he was not amenable to impeachment for acts done as Secretary of War because of his resignation of said office.

The order having been read in the Senate sitting publicly for the impeachment, Mr. Manager Scott Lord, on behalf of the House of Representatives, announced that the managers requested to be heard on the question of the opening and closing arguments, and also in regard to the number of managers who should be allowed to speak.

Then Mr. Manager Lord proposed a motion [2] to rescind the order.

The President pro tempore [3] said:

The Chair would state to the manager that a motion by him to rescind the order of the Senate would not be in order; but the manager is permitted to address the Senate.

The question being thrown open to argument, three main points were involved:

1. The rule suggested by the state of the question.
2. The American precedents.
3. The effect of English usage.

(1) As to the rule suggested by the state of the question, Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, stated, in support of their claim to the opening and closing, the conditions under which the question presented itself:

Now let me briefly state the condition of the pleadings in this case.

To the articles of impeachment the respondent interposed a plea to the jurisdiction, averring that, when the House ordered the impeachment, and when the articles were exhibited, he was not an officer of the United States, but was a private citizen, etc.

It is contended by some that a citizen holding one office may be removed by impeachment for prior misdemeanors in another office. If this be sound, then the plea to the jurisdiction set up new matter; that is, that he was not in any office. Some of the articles of impeachment did not show that he was out of office as Secretary of War, and none of them averred that he was a private citizen. To this plea the House of Representatives replied double; first, that he was Secretary of War when the acts complained of were done, and continued in such office "down to the 2d of March, 1876;" second, that he was in such office "until and including the 2d day of March, 1876," and until the House, by its committee, had completed an investigation, etc.

At this point Mr. Roscoe Conkling, of New York, interposed to say that this reply of the House was a replication.

Mr. Carpenter (continuing) said:

Certainly, and so they call it.

To the first replication the respondent interposed a demurrer; found on page 8 of printed proceedings. And the managers filed a joinder in demurrer; found on page 9.

The honorable manager [Mr. Hoar] now claims that the first replication was a demurrer. An inspection will show that it was not. It does not object to the plea as insufficient in matter of law, but because of certain facts therein set forth. We demurred to this replication, and they joined in demurrer.

If all the pleadings subsequent to the articles of impeachment are regarded as immaterial, then the substance of the matter is, we have demurred to the articles. And a demurrer to the articles is an affirmative assertion that, conceding the truth of the matters therein contained, they are insufficient in law; and upon this proposition we hold the affirmative.

Mr. Carpenter also said:

There is no question as to what is the rule in the courts of law. There it is well settled that the party demurring has the right to open and close the argument. The rules of pleading and proceeding in the ordinary courts of justice, no less than the great canons of the common law, have resulted from centuries of practical experience in the administration of justice, and have been approved by the sages of the law as the best methods to elicit truth and administer justice. If these rules are wisely devised to insure these ends, why should they be departed from in this trial? Is there other motive here than to ascertain the truth and do justice? One of two things is clear; those rules should be observed here or abolished there. It is impossible to maintain that one system of procedure will secure justice in one tribunal and produce injustice in another. And the question is whether the methods which have been established, and from time to time improved, in the courts of law, which are in almost continuous session and dealing with endless variety of causes, are less reliable than rules which might be adopted in a court like this which sits only occasionally after long intervals, and where the personnel of the court is likely to be wholly changed between one trial and another.

Mr. Montgomery Blair, also of counsel for the respondent, said:

The first to which I will call the attention of the Senate is the case of Barnard, with which the managers have shown their familiarity, having referred to it in connection with this plea in abatement. Throughout that case the rule which obtains in courts of justice was adhered to, that counsel who maintained the affirmative of the issue had the opening and reply upon such issue. I would also say—and I am making my remarks very brief—in regard to the affirmative of the issue that this is substantially a demurrer to the articles, because every lawyer knows that in a proceeding like this the articles themselves must allege all the facts necessary to give the jurisdiction in the case alleged and proved. This court of impeachment is a court of limited jurisdiction under the Constitution, and in every court of that character the facts upon which the jurisdiction rests must appear on the complaint by which the case is initiated and inviting the action of the court.

Now, every party demurring has the opening and closing, and the argument which is addressed to the court on the other side, that, as they have the affirmative of the general issue, therefore they ought to be heard in opening and replying upon all the questions arising in the progress of the case, would with equal propriety give the plaintiff in every other court the reply on all such questions, whether applied to a question of law or a question of fact. But that is not the rule. In this case we demur, and thus say that, assuming all the facts alleged to be true, the House of Representatives has no case. That is an affirmative proposition that no impeachment can be maintained on the facts charged, and therefore we are entitled to the opening and conclusion of the argument.

Mr. Manager George F. Hoar, on the other hand, contended:

I desire for one moment to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the managers undertake here the affirmative of this issue. It is true that the respondent has interposed what he calls a plea to the jurisdiction, and that the jurisdictional question has been raised by making an issue upon that plea; but that is a matter of form and not of substance. If the counsel for the respondent had seen fit to enter a general plea of "not guilty," the question of the jurisdiction of the Senate to try and convict would have been involved in the final vote upon that question. To show the jurisdiction of the court over the subject-matter of the inquiry is a part of the affirmative issue involved in the presentment of articles. So that by the logic of ordinary practice we are brought to the same result as we should be if it were not a question of the prerogative of the House, and the accustomed and well-settled methods of proceeding in impeachment.

* * * * * * *

The substance of this issue is this: The House of Representatives say the defendant did certain acts as Secretary of War, and remained Secretary of War until the 2d day of March. The defendant replies, "I was not Secretary of War when you presented your articles, or before," leaving it ambiguous whether he means never before, or that there was a time before when he did not hold the office. In order not to be entangled by that ambiguity, the House of Representatives say, "We mean to assert, as we said before, that you were Secretary of War down to the 2d day of March; and the fact that you have gone out since (which is the only fact, as we understand the pleadings, now newly set up by you) is not a sufficient answer to our original article."

* * * * * * *

I understand that the question which the Senate ought to determine is this—this is the substance of the whole thing: Is the fact newly affirmed, and first affirmed by this respondent, to wit, the fact that he had ceased to be Secretary of War when these articles were presented, a sufficient answer to the charge? You can not escape that simple proposition. That is what you have got to try: Is the fact newly set up by the defendant, that he had ceased to be Secretary of War when these articles were presented, a sufficient answer to this charge? He sets that up and the House of Representatives say that is no sufficient answer; and that is a demurrer in substance and in fact; and on the question whether a fact so set up by my antagonist newly, for the first time in the case, is a sufficient answer to what I have said, I am always entitled to the opening and close.

The House of Representatives, in the first instance, allege in the original articles:

"ART. 3. That said William W. Belknap was Secretary of War of the United States of America before and during the month of October, 1870, and continued in office as such Secretary of War until the 2d day of March, 1876."

Now, if the Senate will be good enough to observe the plea, which was put in by the honorable counsel, it is this:

"That this honorable court ought not to have or take further cognizance of the said articles of impeachment exhibited and presented against him by the House of Representatives of the United States, because he says that before and at the time when the said House of Representatives ordered and directed that he, the said Belknap, should be impeached at the bar of the Senate, and at the time when the said articles of impeachment were exhibited and presented against him, the said Belknap, by the said House of Representatives, he, the said Belknap, was not, nor hath he since been, nor is he now, an officer of the United States."

In that replication there is an ambiguity. If the respondent had said that at the time of the presentment of the articles of impeachment he was not a civil officer, it would have presented the naked question of jurisdiction without ambiguity or difficulty, and the House would have demurred; but he inserts the word "before." That may have one of two meanings. It may amount to an allegation that he was never, before the original articles of impeachment were presented, a civil officer of the United States. I do not say that that astute purpose was in the mind of the counsel who drew the pleading. If we had demurred simply, if we had made a simple demurrer, the respondent might then have come before the Senate and argued that he had responded to the articles that he never was a civil officer of the United States at any time before they were presented, and we should have been left to a discussion upon the verbiage of the article and to the danger of being excluded from court by a blunder in not giving the proper construction to the defendant's language. Accordingly we set up no new matter, but we simply reassign, in regard to the fact which is left doubtful on the expression of the defendant's plea, what we said in our original articles; in other words, we say, "We mean to say that you were a civil officer of the United States until the 2d of March, and therefore, that being the meaning of our original article, your plea presents no legal or proper response." It is a case, therefore, of a reassignment or a reaffirmation of a fact originally set forth in a mode in which the meaning of the original allegation can not be questioned, and saying that, therefore, that fact being considered, the plea of the respondent shows no answer in law. Thus we have presented to the Senate in substance an issue made here in this way—a statement of the original articles that the defendant was a civil officer of the United States down to the 2d day of March, reaffirmed in the replication; a statement by the defendant that before these articles were presented he had ceased to be such civil officer; and a statement on the part of the House of Representatives that that last allegation is no defense to the charge; in other words, a simple demurrer to what is pleaded and well pleaded in the original article; and on such demurrer by the invariable rule of courts both of law and equity the party sustaining the demurrer has the affirmative.

Upon the larger question (setting aside now the pleadings and taking the substance of the issue upon the question of jurisdiction) the plaintiff always has the affirmative. If the respondent had contented himself with introducing a naked plea of "not guilty," he could have availed himself of his objection to the jurisdiction upon that plea, and it would have required the judgment of the court to be given against him or in his favor, without setting up the fact at all, because the original articles do not allege that at the time of the presenting of the articles he was a civil officer of the United States.

And it may be proper to say one further word in conclusion. I understand, in accordance, as was suggested in the very significant question put I think by the honorable Senator from New York, that the true rule of pleading in impeachment cases is this: The House of Representatives present articles setting up the substance of the transaction on which they rely, not in the form of an indictment or of a bill in equity or of a civil declaration certain to a certain intent in general, but setting forth the substance of a transaction. It is not necessary to give dates. You may say "on or about the time." It is not necessary to give legal results or intendments. Then the defendant comes in and in his answer either denies the whole matter if there was no such transaction as is set up, or if there was a transaction of the kind, but an innocent and not a guilty one, with certain different and other circumstances, he tells the story as he alleges it to be, setting up at the same time all special suggestions of law or of defense of fact on which he relies; and the pleadings are made up in that way by a joinder of issue. I do not think it is in the power of parties by pleadings of fact such as take place in ordinary courts of law to compel the Senate to determine, except in its discretion, several issues of fact in succession Suppose an issue of fact were made up on this question of jurisdiction, is the Senate to be compelled to lay aside its legislative business and determine that, and then the defendant answer over, perhaps setting up some other matter strictly in bar, and have that determined, and so the Senate put to a trial of half a dozen successive issues of fact? I respectfully submit that that is not the rule, but that the proper method of pleading is the one which I have first stated.

Undoubtedly it would have been very proper that the matter set up in this second replication should have been set up in the original articles; but it is also well settled in matters of impeachment that the House of Representatives has in its discretion the right at any time to file additional articles if it see fit. It is also true that this new matter set up in the second replication has been pleaded to without objection on the part of the defendant; that it is before the Senate as an allegation in the cause presented by the authority of the House; and whether it should or should not have been originally inserted in the articles becomes now of no consequence.

(2) As to the American precedents, Mr. Manager Hoar said:

This question arose in the trial of President Johnson, and with the leave of the Senate I will cite that authority and the English authority on which the Senate then based its action. After a discussion of a question of practice which came up, as to the course of proceeding in the trial, the Chief Justice, then presiding in the Senate, after the managers for the House had closed what they had to say, inquired of the counsel for the President respondent whether they desired to reply to what had been said by the managers, and the managers representing the House interposed with this suggestion:

"Mr. Manager BINGHAM. Mr. President, with all respect touching the suggestion just made by the Presiding Officer of the Senate, I beg leave to remind the Senate, and I am instructed to do so by my associate managers, that from time immemoral in proceedings of this kind the right of the Commons in England, and of the Representatives of the people in the United States, to close the debate has not been by any rule settled against them. On the contrary, in Lord Melville's case—"

And this, I believe, is the last case of impeachment which has taken place in England—

"if I may be allowed and pardoned for making reference to it, the last case, I believe, reported in England, Lord Erskine presiding, when the very question was made which has now been submitted by the Presiding Officer to the Senate, one of the managers of the House of Commons arose in his place and said that he owed it to the Commons to protest against the immemorial usage being denied to the Commons of England to be heard in reply to whatever might be said on behalf of the accused at the bar of the Peers. In that case the language of the manager, Mr. Giles, was:

"My lords, it was not my intention to trouble your lordships with any observations upon the arguments you have heard; and if I now do so, it is only for the sake of insisting upon and maintaining that right which the Commons contend is their acknowledged and undoubted privilege, the right of being heard after the counsel for the defendant has made his observations in reply. It has been invariably admitted when required.' (29 State Trials, p. 762, 44–46 George III.)

"Lord Erskine 'responded the right of the Commons to reply was never doubted or disputed.'

"Following the suggestion of the learned gentleman who has just taken his seat, I believe that when that utterance was made it had been the continued rule in England for nearly five hundred years.

"In this tribunal, in the first case of impeachment that ever was tried before the Senate of the United States under the Constitution (I refer to the case of Blount), the Senate will see by a reference to it that although the accused had the affirmative of the issue, although he interposed a plea to the jurisdiction, the argument was closed in the case by the manager of the House, Mr. Harper."

In response to that claim, the distinguished and able counsel for the President, who, I need not remind many of the most distinguished Members of this body, fought every inch of ground, yielded to the demand; and throughout the President's trial, from that time, the House of Representatives was heard in reply upon every question that arose, whether a question of the admission of evidence, of the proceedings, or the final question, following therein the English precedents for five hundred years and the precedent adopted in the first case of impeachment in the Senate, and acting therein also in accordance with what, so far as I have been able to examine, has been the proceeding in every case of impeachment in a State tribunal in this country.

* * * * * * *

In the Blount trial, I believe I have stated with sufficient distinctness, the plea being that William Blount was a Senator of the United States, and therefore not an impeachable civil officer, and also that he had laid down his office before the proceedings were instituted—upon that issue, which presented simply the question of jurisdiction, the opening and close were with the House.

* * * * * * *

Blount's case was the case to which I referred. In the haste of replying to the learned counsel I used the phrase, "the rule settled by itself for the Senate in the first case which came before them." In point of fact, it appears upon the report that the order of proceeding was settled by the four distinguished counselors who took part in it by an agreement, and there is no vote or other express action of the Senate to be found; and it was my purpose, on the suggestion of one of my honored associates, to have made that explanation to the Senate at this time, but it passed from my mind. But Blount's case seems to me to be a very significant and important authority, for it is not credible that those four lawyers, four as able lawyers as the bar of the United States afforded at that time, Mr. Jared Ingersoll, Mr. Bayard, Mr. Harper, and Mr. Dallas, would have conceded so important an advantage to the managers on the part of the House of Representatives without any equivalent, unless they had understood the practice to be so.

* * * * * * *

I speak at this moment only from memory, but I do not understand that the learned counsel correctly states the only American precedent to which he has referred—the case of Barnard. In Barnard's case a plea was interposed to the jurisdiction, in substance the same plea which is interposed here, applying to several of the articles. That plea was argued by itself, and upon that argument the counsel for the State had the opening and the close.

On the other hand, Mr. Carpenter said:

In Blount's trial the House of Representatives had interposed the first demurrer, and therefore the managers were entitled to open and close the argument. In the report of that case (2 Annals of Congress, p. 2248), it is said:

"Mr. Bayard, the chairman, having communicated with Mr. Ingersoll, the leading counsel for the defendant, it was agreed between them that the managers should proceed in the argument first on the part of the prosecution, and that the right to reply should belong to the managers."

That is, the managers and the counsel for the defendant, being good lawyers, were agreed that the managers were entitled to open and close the argument upon the demurrer interposed by them. Such is the rule in all courts of justice. And yet the honorable manager [Mr. Hoar] refers to this understanding between counsel as to the rights of the managers, in that case, to show that the managers, in all cases, are entitled to open and close the argument upon a demurrer interposed by the defendant; which would be exactly the reverse of the rule in courts of law.

Indeed, the broad proposition is maintained by the honorable manager that in the argument of every question to arise in this case, upon every motion made by either side, and upon every demurrer, no matter by which side interposed, the managers are entitled to the opening and close. And I understood him to contend at your last sitting that this was conceded by the eminent counsel who defended the impeachment against President Johnson, when the question was first raised by Mr. Manager Bingham; and that the court and counsel on both sides thereafter proceeded on that hypothesis.

But an examination of the report of that trial shows that the honorable manager was under a total misapprehension. I read from page 77 of the first volume of the Congressional edition of that trial:

"Mr. Howard and Mr. Manager Bingham rose at the same time.

"The CHIEF JUSTICE. The Senator from Michigan.

"Mr. Manager BINGHAM. On the part of the managers I beg to respond to what has just been said.

"Mr. HOWARD. I beg to call the attention of the President to the rules that govern the body.

"Mr. Manager BINGHAM. I will only say that we have used but thirty-five of the minutes of the time allowed us under the rule.

"The CHIEF JUSTICE. The Chair announced at the last sitting that he would not undertake to restrict counsel as to number—

They had been restricted as to time—

"without the further order of the Senate, the rule not being very intelligible to him. He will state further that when counsel make a motion to the court, the counsel who makes the motion has invariably the right to close the argument upon it.

"Several SENATORS. Certainly."

Mr. Bingham, however, wished to be heard, and by unanimous consent was heard, just as this body, unquestionably, by unanimous consent would hear any manager on this honorable board who might ask such indulgence. So Mr. Bingham was heard. It is true that in his remarks he set up this unwarrantable claim, which has been repeated by his successor, that the House of Representatives had the right to close every argument whether they had the affirmative of the particular issue or not; but the silence with which the Senate listened leads me to infer that they were perfectly satisfied with the ruling of the Chief Justice, made before Mr. Bingham took the floor, and never recalled, and which was supported by "several Senators" answering from their places "certainly." No vote was taken on the question. It was an interlocutory question; I believe, a motion by the defendant for additional time to answer.

The Chief Justice ruled emphatically that whichever party made a motion, the counsel who made it had invariably the right to close the argument upon it, and several Senators responded "certainly." And nothing occurred to show that the remarks of Mr. Bingham affected the opinion of the Chief Justice or of the Senators who responded in approval. Certainly the ruling was not changed.

(3) As to the English precedents, Mr. Manager Hoar said:

I understand that the rules of proceedings upon impeachment are not governed by the principles or precedents of ordinary criminal courts. The House of Lords or the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment undoubtedly derives great light in the application of the principles of common justice and of law from the sages of the law; but nevertheless impeachment is a proceeding which stands on its own constitutional ground. It is an investigation into the guilt of great public offenders abusing official trusts by the legislative bodies of the country where that practice prevails. In that investigation, as everywhere else, those legislative bodies are equals. Neither branch of the American Congress stands as a suitor at the bar of the other; neither branch of the British Parliament stands as a suitor at the bar of the other; but the concurrent judgment of the two branches is necessary to an impeachment, just as the concurrent judgment of the two branches is necessary to an act of legislation. In the English Parliament the House of Commons brings to the bar of the Lords every bill which it passes, and requests the assent of the Lords thereto, just as in the English Parliament the House of Commons brings to the bar of the House of Lords the fact that it has ascertained the guilt of a great public offender in the course of its official duty, and asks the judgment of the House of Lords as to his guilt and his punishment.

It is an absolutely settled principle of right that upon all questions which arise in the trial of an impeachment the House of Commons has the right to reply. It is a principle which has existed in England for four hundred years, which, when the term "impeachment" is used in our Constitution in clothing this body with one of its highest functions, was imported, as all the other constitutional attendants of an impeachment were imported, except where they are expressly varied by the Constitution itself.

* * * * * * *

But the burden and the duty is on us of proving that charge according to the precedents of this Senate and of all senates, according to the precedents of the House of Lords in England sitting as a court of impeachment, and not according to the precedents of police courts or inferior courts of any other kind sitting anywhere. And the precedents of this Senate and of all senates sitting as a court of impeachment have adopted the rule practiced upon in the English House of Lords, from which impeachments come, for five hundred years, that on all questions the party instituting the proceeding and having the burden of proof throughout the whole issue has the right to reply. That is the proposition, and to that proposition no answer whatever has been vouchsafed or suggested by the honorable counsel for the defendant.

The further proposition, to which no reply has been suggested, was that in this particular on this special issue now made up, the precedent of this Senate and of all senates sitting as a court of impeachment precisely corresponds and agrees with the precedents of all courts whatever, that where a plea to the jurisdiction is interposed and to that plea a demurrer is filed, which—leaving out now this second matter of fact—is the question here, the party demurring has the affirmative and the reply in support of his demurrer

* * * * * * *

In regard to the English precedent, I beg leave respectfully to refer honorable Senators to a report of which Mr. Burke is the author from a committee appointed by the House of Commons to inspect the journals of the Lords with a view of ascertaining the occasion of the great delay which had happened in the trial of Warren Hastings. This inspection and report were made in the seventh year of that trial. Mr. Burke makes in this report a most ample and thorough discussion of the entire procedure in cases of impeachment in Parliament. He begins by considering the matter of pleadings and the matter of evidence and other matters of procedure, and states in the fullest manner the principle upon which the claim of the managers rested. I do not mean to say that he states anything in regard to this particular question of the opening and close. The report is silent upon that particular subject, but he states the doctrine. He begins by saying:

"Your committee finds that the Lords, in matter of appeal or impeachment in Parliament, are not of right obliged to proceed according to the course or rules of the Roman civil law, or by those of the law or usage of any of the inferior courts in Westminster Hall, but by the law and usage of Parliament."

Then he cites various precedents from the earliest times, and finds that always the court proceed according to the law and usage of Parliament. Then he cites Lord Coke:

"As every court of justice hath laws and customs for its direction, some by the common law, some by the civil and canon law, some by peculiar laws and customs, etc., so the high court of Parliament, suis propriis legibus et consuetudinibus subsistit. It is by the lex et consuetudo parliamenti that all weighty matters in any parliament moved, concerning the peers of the realm, or Commons in Parliament assembled, ought to be determined, adjudged, and discussed by the course of the Parliament and not by the civil law, nor yet by the common laws of this realm used in more inferior courts.

"This is the reason that judges ought not to give any opinion of a matter of Parliament, because it is not to be decided by the common laws, but secundum legem et consuetudinem parliamenti; and so the judges in divers Parliaments have confessed."

Then he goes on under the "rule of pleading:"

"Your committee do not find that any rules of pleading as observed in the inferior courts have ever obtained in the proceedings of the high court of Parliament in a cause or matter in which the whole procedure has been within their original jurisdiction. Nor does your committee find that any demurrer or exception, as of false or erroneous pleading, hath been ever admitted to any impeachment in Parliament, as not coming within the form of the pleading; and, although a reservation or protest is made by the defendant—matter of form, as we conceive—'to the generality, uncertainty, and insufficiency of the articles of impeachment,' yet no objections have in fact been ever made in any part of the record."

I do not think it is worth while to detain the Senate with reading very full and copious extracts from this report. I will take the liberty of placing the book where it will be reached by Senators when they discuss this question.

Taking the other view, Mr. Carpenter said:

In the next place, whatever may be the precedents in the House of Lords in trying an impeachment, we have the authority of the honorable manager himself who has just taken his seat that they are not binding at all in a trial of impeachment under our Constitution. In the debate which took place in the House (if it can be called a debate where nobody was allowed to speak) as to the ordering of the impeachment, the honorable manager himself stated that the British rules were not applicable, and consequently no aid could be drawn from the trial of Warren Hastings. Now I submit that whatever may have been the rule in the trial of impeachments in England this court should make its own rule, and that should be the rule of right and justice.

I deny, as respectfully as a man may deny anything that comes from a coordinate branch of this Congress, that the House appears here in any other attitude than we appear here, a suitor in this cause. Is it possible, where the Constitution says we are to have a trial, and the House of Representatives presents itself here as the accuser, that it is a part of the court; that it is entitled to any favor here that we are not entitled to? The rule uniformly adopted by the courts of law is a rule which the experience of hundreds of years has determined to be wise and proper, and that is the rule which I understand this Senate has ordered for this trial.

And Mr. Montgomery Blair argued:

It is altogether a mistake, also, that this proceeding was ever otherwise considered here or in England as standing upon any different footing in its general principles than any other proceedings at law. Woodeson, in his lecture on the subject of impeachment (volume 2, page 596), treats it as a suit. His language is that "the House of Commons, as the grand inquest of the nation, become suitors for penal justice." Wilson in his Parliamentary Law speaks of the articles as analogous to an indictment, and hence the rules of practice ought to conform to those of the courts in analogous circumstances, and if they vary from them in England, it does not follow a practice there which does not conform to the general principles recognized here. We have greatly restricted the impeachment proceeding; it is not the proceeding here as there in many of its essential features.

In conclusion, Mr. Carpenter quoted from Cushing's Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies.

Mr. Joseph E. McDonald, of Indiana, moved to rescind the order giving the opening and closing to the counsel for the respondent.

Mr. A. S. Merrimon, of North Carolina, asked this question:

Do the managers claim to reply in the discussion of all questions, as a matter of right, or only on the ground of practice, which the court may in its sound discretion rightfully change?

Mr. Manager Hoar replied:

I respectfully reply to that question that we do not concede that whatever be the constitutional and lawful prerogatives of the House of Representatives in this regard can be rightfully changed without the assent of the House itself.

The Senate, by a vote of 40 yeas, 18 nays, voted to retire for consultation.

Having retired, the question recurred on the motion of Mr. McDonald, which was decided in the negative; yeas 20, nays 34.

Thereupon, on motion of Mr. George S. Boutwell, of Massachusetts, it was—Ordered, That four managers on the part of the House of Representatives may be allowed to submit arguments upon the question whether the respondent is amenable to trial by impeachment for acts done as Secretary of War, notwithstanding his resignation of said office, and whether the issues of the fact presented in the pleadings are material, and also whether the matters in support of the jurisdiction alleged by the House of Representatives in the pleadings subsequent to the articles of impeachment can be thus alleged if the same are not averred in said articles.

And then, the Senate having returned to its chamber, the President pro tempore said:

The presiding officer is directed to state that the motion to reconsider the vote by which the order of argument was made is overruled, and also to state that an order is made granting the request of the managers on the part of the House that four of the managers be permitted to argue the case.

2139. On July 7, 1876,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, a question arose as to the admissibility of certain testimony.

Mr. Manager John A. McMahon, who had objected to the testimony, claimed the right as the objector to the opening and closing of the argument, but offered to waive the opening.

Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, admitted the right claimed, and insisted that the managers should exercise it.

Thereupon Mr. McMahon argued, and was followed by Mr. Carpenter. Then Mr. Manager George A. Jenks closed.

2140. Instance of action by the Senate as to improper language used by counsel for respondent in an impeachment trial.

The presiding officer at an impeachment trial exercises authority to call to order counsel using improper language.

On April 29, 1868,[2] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, and during the final arguments in the case, Mr. Charles Sumner, a Senator from Massachusetts, offered the following:

Whereas Mr. Nelson, one of the counsel for the President, in addressing the Senate, has used disorderly words, as follows, namely: Beginning with personalities directed to one of the managers he proceeded to say, "So far as any question that the gentleman desires to make of a personal character with me is conecrned, this is not the place to make it. Let him make it elsewhere if he desires to do it;" and whereas such language, besides being discreditable to these proceedings, is apparently intended to provoke a duel or to signify a willingness to fight a duel, contrary to law and good morals: Therefore,

Ordered, That Mr. Nelson, one of the counsel of the President, has justly deserved the disapprobation of the Senate.

The Chief Justice[3] said that the proposition of Mr. Sumner was not before the Senate if objected to.

Mr. John Sherman, of Ohio, thereupon objected.

Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler, who was the manager referred to, asked that no further action be taken in regard to the language referred to.

On April 30,[3] the proposition came before the Senate sitting for the trial.

Pending consideration, Mr. Henry B. Anthony, of Rhode Island, asked Mr. Nelson if he intended by the language to challenge the manager to a duel.

Mr. Nelson said that de did not particularly have a duel in mind. He simply resented a charge by the manager, and he had no idea of insulting the Senate.

Mr. Reverdy Johnson, of Maryland, moved that the proposition lie on the table, and the motion was agreed to; yeas 35, nays 10.

2141. On June 16, 1876,[4] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Mr. Jeremiah S. Black, of counsel for the respondent, offered a paper in the nature of a plea that the proceeding be dismissed because the Senate had affirmed its jurisdiction of the case by less than a two-thirds vote.

[4] First session Forty-fourth Congress, Record of trial, p. 170.

Objection arose to placing the paper on file, whereupon Mr. Black said:

Mr. President, we offer a paper asserting our legal and constitutional rights, as we understand them. A Senator rises and says he objects; a manager rises and says he objects. Is that a reason for simply throwing it under the table? Is there not to be some reason given for such a thing as that? What is to be done with this? Walk over us I admit you can, if a majority see proper to do so. They can do as they please; they can order it to be thrown under the table; but some little respect ought to be shown a man who is struggling for his liberty and his reputation——

Mr. George F. Edmunds, a Senator from Vermont, interrupting, said:

I call the counsel to order. I do not think that the language he is addressing to the Chair is fit to be addressed to this court.

The President pro tempore[1] said:

Counsel will use language which is proper and decorous. * * * The counsel will proceed, using proper language. The Chair will call him to order if he does not use proper language.

2142. It was held that a motion relating to the sitting of the Senate in an impeachment trial might be argued by counsel.—On July 7, 1876,[2] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Mr. George F. Edmunds, a Senator from Vermont, moved that the Senate take a recess until 7.30 p.m. for the purpose of an evening session.

Mr. Matt H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, was making an appeal against an evening session, when Mr. Edmunds raised the question of order that on a question of this kind counsel were not entitled to be heard.

The President pro tempore[1] overruled the point of order.

Thereupon Mr. Carpenter made his protest, and the Senate decided the motion of Mr. Edmunds in the negative.

2143. In arguing in an impeachment trial counsel take position under direction of the Senate.—On July 25, 1876,[3] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, was about to address the Senate in the final summing up, when Mr. John A. Logan, a Senator from Illinois, said:

Before the counsel proceeds, I will state that I have heard some complaints made about the position that the counsel and managers have to occupy in the presence of the Senate. I therefore suggest that the counsel be allowed to occupy any position he desires from which to address the Senate.

Thereupon, by unanimous consent, Mr. Carpenter was permitted to stand in the outer tier of seats.

2144. Instance wherein a manager was permitted to move a change of the rules governing the Senate in impeachment trials.—On April 11, 1868,[4] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Mr. Manager John A. Bingham, on behalf of the managers, moved in the Senate for a change in one of the rules governing the trial.

This motion was entertained.

2145. Instance wherein the managers of an impeachment declined to answer a question propounded by a Senator during the trial.—On April 1, 1868,[1] in the Senate during the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Hon. Walter A. Burleigh, Delegate from Dakota Territory, was under examination. Counsel for the President objected to a question tending to elicit from witness the substance of a conversation with General Thomas, and statements of the latter as to the means by which the President proposed to obtain possession of the war office.

In the course of the discussion as to the admissibility of the question, Mr. Reverdy Johnson, Senator from Maryland, propounded the following:

The honorable managers are requested to say whether evidence hereafter will be produced to show—

First, That the President, before the time when the declarations of Thomas, which they propose to prove, were made, authorized him to obtain possession of the office by force or threats, or intimidation, if necessary; or,

Secondly, If not, that the President had knowledge that such declarations had been made and approved of them.

To which Mr. Manager John A. Bingham replied:

I am instructed by my associates to say—and I am in accord in judgment with them, Mr. President—that we do not deem it our duty to make answer to so general a question as that; and it will certainly occur to the Senate why we should not make answer to it.

2146. During an impeachment trial the managers and counsel for the respondent are required to rise and address the Chair before speaking.—On July 7, 1876,[2] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment of trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Mr. Manager John A. McMahon, and Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, were engaged in a colloquy, when the President pro tempore[3] said:

The Chair will remind the gentlemen that they must rise to speak, and address the Chair. The Chair will insist upon it. * * * The Chair will again remind gentlemen, and hopes he does it for the last time, that the counsel as well as the managers should address the Presiding Officer, that he may maintain the rights of the parties. It is due to the Senate that it should be done; and the duty of the Chair demands it to protect the respect due to the Senate. The Chair will state, also, that he will not recognize a gentleman on either side unless he does rise and address the Presiding Officer.

2147. During an impeachment trial a proposition by managers or counsel is not amendable by Senators, but yields precedence to one made by a Senator.

A proposition offered by a Senator during an impeachment trial is amendable by Senators, but not by managers or counsel.

On June 6, 1876,[4] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, a proposition fixing the time for the hearing of evidence on the merits was under discussion, and motions were offered by the managers for the House of Representatives, by the counsel for the respondent, and by Senators. A question arising as to amendment and precedence the President pro tempore[1] said:

The Chair has ruled that a proposition made by managers or counsel is not amendable by Senators; but any proposition made by a Senator is amendable by a Senator, nor can the proposition made by Senators be amended by the counsel or managers. A motion made by a Senator has priority of one offered by the managers or the counsel.

2148. During an impeachment trial an order proposed by a Senator is debatable by managers and counsel, but not by Senators.—On June 1, 1876,[2] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Mr. William Pinckney Whyte, a Senator from Maryland, offered an order fixing the time for further pleadings on behalf of the respondent. Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, and Mr. Manager Scott Lord, on behalf of the House of Representatives, discussed the proposed order at some length.

Thereupon Mr. Allen G. Thurman, a Senator from Ohio, proposed to address the Senate.

The President pro tempore[1] reminded him that debate was not in order:

Mr. Thurman said:

I do not wish to debate, but I want to know the rule of the Senate on this subject. I want to know whether there is to be an unlimited discussion of counsel and managers on every order that is offered by a Senator. In my judgment it is all irregular.

The President pro tempore said:

The Chair will state in reply to the Senator from Ohio that the Chair was holding under the rule that each of the parties is entitled to one hour's debate on any motion or order submitted.

2149. During the Peck impeachment trial the respondent assisted his counsel in examining witnesses, in argument on incidental questions, etc.—On January 11, 1831,[3] in the hight court of impeachment during the trial of the cause of the United States v. James H. Peck, the respondent, who was United States district judge of Missouri, assisted his counsel, personally addressing the court to offer documentary evidence, to explain testimony which he proposed to offer, to propound questions to the witness, to make a statement supplementary to the testimony of a witness, and to argue as to the admissibility of certain testimony.

2150. Delays in the Johnson trial caused by illness of counsel for respondent were the occasion of protest on the part of the managers and of action by the Senate.—On April 16, 1868,[4] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Mr. William M. Evarts, of counsel for the President, announced that the defense had reached a point where it would not be convenient to produce any more testimony on this day. On April 14 the Senate had adjourned because of the illness of Mr. Henry Stanbery, of counsel for the respondent, and on April 15 the proceedings had been modified somewhat because of his continued illness. He was still absent on the 16th, when Mr. Evarts, after introducing considerable testimony made announcement as above stated.

This caused a protest from Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler, in the course of which he said:

We adjourned early on Monday, as you remember, and on the next day there was an adjournment almost immediately after the Senate met because of the learned Attorney-General. Now, all we ask is that this case may go on.

If it be said that we are hard in our demands that this trial go on, let me contrast for a moment this case with a great State trial in England, at which were present Lord Chief Justice Eyre, Lord Chief Baron McDonald, Baron Hotham, Mr. Justice Buller, Sir Nash Grose, Mr. Justice Lawrence, and others of Her Majesty's judges in the trial of Thomas Hardy for treason. There the court sat from 9 o'clock in the morning until 1 o'clock at night, and they thus sat there from Tuesday until Friday night at 1 o'clock, and then, when Mr. Erskine, afterwards Lord Chancellor Erskine, asked of that court that they would not come in so early by an hour the next day because he was unwell and wanted time, the court after argument refused it, and would not give him even that hour in which to reflect upon his opening which he was to make, and which occupied nine hours in its delivery, until the jury asked it, and then they gave him but a single hour, although he said upon his honor to the court that every night he had not got to his house until between 2 and 3 o'clock in the morning, and he was regularly in court at 9 o'clock on the following morning.

That is the way cases of great consequence are tried in England. That is the way other courts sit. I am not complaining here, Senators, understand me. I am only contrasting the delays given, the kindnesses shown, the courtesies extended in this greatest of all cases, and where the greatest interests are at stake, compared with every other case ever tried elsewhere. The managers are ready. We have been ready; at all hazards and sacrifices we would be ready. We only ask that now the counsel for the President shall be likewise ready, and go on without these interminable delays with which when the House began this impeachment the friends of the President there rose up and threatened.

At the conclusion of Mr. Butler's remarks, Mr. John Conness, Senator from California, offered this order:

Ordered, That on each day hereafter the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment shall meet at 11 o'clock a. m.

Mr. Charles Sumner proposed the following as a substitute therefor:

That, considering the public interests which suffer from the delay of this trial, and in pursuance of the order already adopted to proceed with all convenient dispatch, the Senate will sit from 10 o'clock in the forenoon to 6 o'clock in the afternoon, with such brief recess as may be ordered.

Under the ruling the proposed order went over to April 17 for consideration, when Mr. Sumner's proposed substitute was disagreed to, yeas 13, nays 30. The original order offered by Mr. Conness was then agreed to, yeas 29, nays 14.

The Senate had heretofore met at 12 m. under the rule.

2151. Instance during an impeachment trial wherein the Presiding Officer admonished managers and counsel not to waste time.—On February 15, 1905,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, in the course of the introduction of testimony, the Presiding Officer[2] said:

While the Presiding Officer makes no criticism on the course of the examination and cross-examination, he desires to say that the time of the Senate is very precious, and he hopes that there will be as little time taken by immaterial questions, either by the managers or by counsel, as possible, and that we may get along with this case.

2152. The Senate, and not the Presiding Officer, decides on a motion for attachment of a witness.

Instance wherein, during the Swayne trial, testimony was introduced to show the propriety of an attachment against an absent witness.

On February 10, 1905,[1] in the Senate sitting for the trial of Judge Charles Swayne, after the pleadings had been concluded and when the witnesses were called, Mr. Henry W. Palmer, of Pennsylvania, manager on behalf of the House of Representatives, said:

Mr. President, in the case of Joseph H. Durkee, of Jacksonville, Fla., we have a certificate of a physician stating that he is not able to attend. The certificate was sent to the Presiding Officer and by him handed to me, and it has been exhibited to counsel on the other side.

Mr. Durkee is a witness who has been subpœnaed by both sides, and is a material and important witness. I have a witness present who will testify with respect to Mr. Durkee's present condition, and I ask that Mr. B. S. Liddon be summoned to testify what Mr. Durkee's present condition is, for the purpose of moving for an attachment.

Mr. Liddon was then sworn and examined, giving testimony indicating that Mr. Durkee was able to attend.

The testimony being concluded, Mr. Palmer announced that on that showing the managers would ask for an attachment. He suggested, however, that if the counsel for respondent would consent, it could be arranged to take the deposition of the witness at his home. The counsel declined to agree to this.

Then the Presiding Officer[2] said:

The Senate will take into consideration the motion for an attachment, and decide it later on. The Presiding Officer will merely say at the present time that it seems to be understood that the witness is suffering from a serious disease, which makes it very difficult for him to travel, certainly without an attendant, and that for that reason his son, who is a physician, has been summoned. It would seem as if it were hardly required to issue an attachment until information is communicated to the Senate as to whether there is a real refusal on the part of the witness to come or whether the witness will come with his son as an attendant.

For that reason the Presiding Officer suggests that a decision of the motion be postponed, and the Sergeant-at-Arms will be instructed to ascertain whether the witness will come under the circumstances.

Later on this day, however, on a question relating to another witness, the Presiding Officer said[3]:

The rules require that a motion for an attachment shall be decided by the Senate rather than by the Presiding Officer. The Presiding Officer, however, will suggest that the motion being now made, a decision upon it can be delayed for a little time. There may be some further information. So it is not necessary to submit the question at this time to the Senate, unless it be desired.

2153. On February 13, 1905,[4] in the Senate sitting for the trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Mr. Anthony Higgins, of counsel for the respondent, said:

Mr. President, in respect to the application made by counsel for the respondent for an attachment against Louis P. Paquet, we desire to have the matter properly investigated as to whether the witness is really able to attend or not, and to that end we ask that the attachment may issue, and that the officer or the Sergeant-at-Arms serving the same may be charged with the discretion of determining whether the witness is able to attend or not. That is the course which has been pursued in practice with which I am familiar. In other words, where there is doubt in the mind of the court or of counsel as to whether a witness is able to attend or not, the court awaits the return of the sheriff or the marshal in the premises.

The Presiding Officer[1] said:

The sixth rule of the Senate for impeachment trials provides that motions for attachment must be decided by the Senate rather than the Presiding Officer. Whether it be necessary for the Senate to retire to consult upon this matter the Presiding Officer does not know, but he will state the motion to the Senate.

Mr. Paquet, a witness summoned for the respondent, has furnished the certificate of a physician that he has been ill since January 31, and is still ill, confined to his bed, and probably will not be able to travel for two or three weeks. Counsel for respondent now moves that an attachment may issue, and that the Sergeant-at-Arms in serving the same be authorized to use his discretion to determine whether the witness is or is not able to travel. Unless there be some motion made to retire for the consideration of this question, the Presiding Officer will submit the motion to the Senate.

Mr. John C. Spooner, a Senator from Wisconsin, said:

Mr. President, whether a witness shall be brought by an attachment or not is for the judgment of the Senate as a court, I should think, and I should like to hear it somewhat discussed, if there are authorities sustaining the proposition, that a court issues an attachment for a witness leaving it to the sheriff to determine whether the judgment of the court or the writ shall be executed or not. I should like to have the authorities produced.

After this suggestion the motion for process was temporarily withdrawn.

2154. Rule in the Swayne trial governing Senators as to colloquies and questions addressed by them to managers, counsel, or other Senators.

In the Swayne trial Senators were permitted a freedom of debate greater than usual.

On January 27, 1905,[2] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment of Judge Charles Swayne, a debate arose between Mr. Henry W. Palmer, of the managers for the House of Representatives, and Mr. J. C. S. Blackburn, a Senator from Kentucky.

The Presiding Officer said:

The Chair wishes to observe at this point that he doubts the propriety of debate between Senators and the managers of the impeachment on the part of the House. He does not speak positively upon that question, not having had an opportunity to examine the precedents.

On February 3,[3] in the Senate sitting for the trial, Mr. Augustus O. Bacon, of Georgia, offered and the Senate agreed to an order containing the following rule:

It shall not be in order for any Senator to engage in colloquy, or to address questions either to the managers on the part of the House or the counsel for the respondent, nor shall it be in order for Senators to address each other, but they shall address their remarks directly to the Presiding Officer.

The effect of this rule seems to have been to permit debate and suggestions by Senators. Thus on February 10[4] Mr. Joseph W. Bailey, of Texas, suggested as to testimony and debated. On February 13[5] there was extended debate of Senators on the subject of issuing processes for witnesses. On February 14[6] Mr. Porter J. McCumber, of North Dakota, and others, discussed evidence. Also on February 23,[1] on an order relating to the printing of arguments of managers, there was free debate by the Senators. Yet on an important question relating to the admissibility of testimony, arising on February 14[2] and 16, the Senate, after some debate, decided to enforce the rule providing for secret sessions. In other cases, also, the doors were closed. But during this trial Senators were permitted a greater freedom of debate than in other trials.

171.) This trial, though it varies in external ceremony, yet differs not in essentials from criminal prosecutions before inferior courts. The same rules of evidence, the same legal notions of crimes and punishments, prevailed; for impeachments are not framed to alter the law, but to carry it into more effectual execution against too powerful delinquents. The judgment therefore is to be such as is warranted by legal principles or precedents. (6 Sta. Tr., 14; 2 Wood., 611.) The chancellor gives judgment in misdemeanors; the lord high steward formerly in cases of life and death. (Seld. Jud., 180.) But now the steward is deemed not necessary. (Fost., 144; 2 Wood., 613.) In misdemeanors the greatest corporal punishment hath been imprisonment. (Seld. Jud., 184.) The King's assent is necessary in capital judgments (but 2 Wood., 614, contra), but not in misdemeanors. (Seld. Jud., 136.)

2156. In the Belknap trial the Senate directed the managers and counsel for respondent to furnish to one another lists of the witnesses they proposed to call.

The Senate denied in the Belknap trial the application of respondent's counsel for a statement of the facts which the managers expected to prove by each witness.

Form of a motion submitted by counsel for respondent in an impeachment trial.

On June 6, 1876,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, an order was made providing that on July 6, 1876, the Senate would proceed to hear the evidence on the merits of the trial in this case.

Thereupon Mr. Montgomery Blair, of counsel for the respondent, submitted this motion:

In the Senate of the United States sitting as a court of impeachment.

THE UNITED STATES
v.
WILLIAM W. BELKNAP.

William W. Belknap, by his counsel, moves the court that an order be made upon the managers on the part of the House of Representatives to furnish within twenty-four hours to the accused or his counsel a list of the witnesses whom they intend to call, together with the particulars of the facts which they expect to prove by them.

It being stated on behalf of the managers that a large portion of the testimony, and especially the material testimony, had been printed, Mr. Blair said:

Of course in respect to that part of the testimony which has been printed, it is very easy to furnish it to us; but I beg leave to say that there is a large portion of the testimony taken before the Judiciary Committee of which we are not at all informed, which we have applied to the managers for copies of, but they repelled us and refused to give them to us. We do not know what part of it they may rely on at all. We have rumors of its character from the press; but we do not know what part of it they mean to rely upon, or what facts they mean to rely upon; and as we are ordered to prepare, we want to make that preparation to meet such case as they may make.

Mr. Allen G. Thurman, a Senator from Ohio, asked this question:

Is there any precedent for the order asked for, either in impeachment trials or in ordinary courts of criminal jurisdiction?

To this Mr. Jeremiah S. Black, of counsel for the respondent, replied:

No; but certainly there ought to be one made. * * * We do not go upon precedent here; that is, this application is not founded upon anything that has ever happened before. There never was a case like this before. I have never heard whether the managers object to this order or not. If they do, I can not conceive for what reason. Certainly they do not intend to keep us in ignorance of the kind of case they are going to produce against us and take us by surprise and then proceed and run over us and get a conviction against us on grounds that we have no notice of. They do not think it is unfair, I suppose, to tell us beforehand what sort of facts they intend to produce.

They have their witnesses here, or at least within easy reach. Ours are scattered all over the continent; some of them in California, others in the Indian Territory. It becomes absolutely necessary for us, as soon as we can, to get out our subpœnas for witnesses and use all diligence in bringing them here. If the trial is to go on upon the 6th of July or at any other time, even a month later than that, we will be hard pressed for time. We can not know what particular witness we need or how many of them unless we are informed of theirs and understand what facts they mean to prove or try to prove.

I maintain, as to every public accuser, a manager of the House of Representatives, an attorney-general, or district attorney, if he has a criminal case which he intends to prosecute against a citizen, that he is bound by his duty and as a lover of justice to disclose the whole case to the defendant as fully as possible and at the earliest moment.

The gentlemen say, when we ask them for this list, that it is a secret which they have the right to keep and they will keep it until the moment of the trial and then spring it upon us, so that we shall be unable to meet it by contradiction or explanation. They wish to take us by surprise as much as possible, and convict the defendant, if they can, without giving him a chance to show his innocence. They say there is no precedent for such a call as we make upon them now. Nothing like this is found in the common-law cases. I do not know how far back they want us to go for a precedent old enough to suit them. In modern times it has never been refused. I admit that by the common law, whose authority they invoke, a man on trial in any criminal court had no chance at all for life or liberty. He was not allowed counsel. He was not allowed to call witnesses. He was not confronted with the witnesses against him. None of those privileges which are secured in our Constitution were given to a party charged with a criminal offense by the ancient common law. That common law was a bloody old beast.

Mr. Manager Scott Lord, on behalf of the House of Representatives, said:

What is the proposition which the counsel makes? It is no more and no less than this, that he has the right to invade the room of the managers, that he has the right to ascertain their course of trial, that he has the right to know every possible witness to prove a certain fact.

Sufficient it is to say that the wisdom of all the ages is against it. The learned counsel had better devote himself to answering the question of the Senator, and find whether in all the past ages a single precedent of this kind has been had in any criminal proceeding. It is not enough for him to rise here and say he did not hear the managers object. He may possibly have been out of the room. It is not enough for him to stand here and say, "We need to make a precedent in this case." It is enough for us to answer that he asks for an extraordinary precedent, extraordinary proceeding, against the wisdom of all the past, and in regard to which he can not find the first authority in rummaging through all the books of the common law and all the books relating to criminal jurisprudence. I am surprised that any such proposition should be seriously made here, that we should be compelled, in advance, to disclose to him the names of witnesses and what each witness is expected to testify to, when we have laid before him in the broadest manner every charge that we make, and one article of these articles of impeachment contains seventeen specifications.

The order proposed by counsel for respondent was disagreed to by the Senate, without division.

The Senate then agreed to this order:

Ordered, That the managers furnish to the defendant, or his counsel, within four days, a list of witnesses, as far as at present known to them, that they intend to call in this case; and that, within four days thereafter, the respondent furnish to the managers a list of witnesses, as far as known, that he intends to summon.

2157. In the Belknap trial the Senate adjourned to await the attendance of a witness declared by the respondent, on oath, to be "material and necessary for his defense."

The Senate declined to postpone formally the Belknap trial to await the attendance of a witness for the respondent.

Respondent's application in the Belknap trial for delay to await a witness's arrival was not required to be accompanied by a statement as to what he would prove.

Form of respondent's application for delay to await a witness in an impeachment trial.

On January 12, 1876,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, after the testimony for the respondent had proceeded some time, Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, announced that one witness whom they had asked to have summoned—John S. Evans—had not appeared. He said that his presence was necessary at this stage, and asked the Senate sitting for the trial to adjourn some reasonable time for Mr. Evans to arrive.

To this the managers on the part of the House of Representatives objected.

Mr. Manager George F. Hoar said:

I understand the rule and practice to be perfectly well settled and enforced in all courts where justice is administered according to the forms and practice of the common law that a party in a civil or criminal case applying either for a continuance or a postponement on account of the absence of a witness must show—

First. That the witness has been duly summoned;

Second. That the evidence which the witness would give if present is material and important to his cause; and,

Third. That the evidence must be so set forth that the opposite party may, if he choose, elect to admit that the witness, if present, would so testify; not to admit the fact, but that the witness, if present, would so testify; and that election is always tendered to the opposite party.

There is but one exception to the universality of that rule, which is, that where the evidence is of itself of a character which the witness only could state, that is not required of the party, as, for instance, if the question were of the construction of a dam which had been taken away, the scientific expert under whose direction that structure was built would be the only person who could describe it, and it would be impossible for the party ordinarily to say what his witness would testify to on that subject if he were present; but with that exception, of the evidence of experts where it is of such a character that the evidence could not be understood by the party who undertakes to set it forth, the rule is universal.

In the present case I fully concede that the defendant's counsel ought to stand before the Senate as if they had summoned the witness. They applied to the Senate for a subpœna. The Senate granted the order. The Sergeant-at-Arms did not execute it because, as he understood, there had been a subpœna issued already and served at the instance of the other party. So we agree that the defense stands here in all respects having used all diligence to obtain the presence of this witness; but the defendant shows no reason whatever why he should not state the evidence which Mr. Evans would give if he were present and give us an opportunity to elect to consent to that evidence. In fact, Mr. Evans, it appears, has been twice examined very fully in regard to this whole transaction before two different committees of the House. It is true that there was nobody present at that examination representing the defendant, and therefore certainly it is true that the defendant can not be sure that the facts favorable to him within Evans's knowledge were brought out in that examination. I do not overlook that. I make that concession also as fully as the learned counsel could desire. Still, either he can state what Mr. Evans would testify if he were present, and his reasons for believing that he would so testify, or he has no reason to believe that Evans's testimony would be valuable to him if he were here. He can not escape, as it seems to me, that dilemma. Either he has no reason to suppose that Mr. Evans would be more important to him than any other citizen of the United States who is at a distance of a thousand miles from this place or he can state what it is that this witness knows and would prove, and give us the opportunity to make our election.

I conceive that any distinction in practice which has grown up in State courts between a first continuance from term to term and a second continuance from term to term has nothing whatever to do with this matter. This is not a court having terms. It is a court which expires with its first and only term. This is not the case of an application for a continuance of a trial made before trial. It is a case where the trial has begun and has proceeded with the full consent in this particular of both parties. The evidence is fresh in the minds of all the members of the court. This, therefore, is a simple application for the postponement of a trial which is already far advanced toward its termination.

My associate [Mr. Manager Jenks] desires me to state the case of the trial of Smith and Ogden in the circuit court of the United States, where Judge Paterson establishes the rule that I have stated.

Mr. Montgomery Blair, of counsel for the respondent, said:

It is proposed, I suppose, from this initiatory proceeding, to treat this as an application for a continuance. Everything that has been said proceeds upon the assumption that we have applied for a continuance of this case, whereas we only ask that a witness who has been duly summoned, who ought to be here now, for whose absence we are not responsible, should be allowed a reasonable time to make his appearance, being detained by freshets or some other cause for which the party defendant is not in any way responsible. We have no disposition to abuse the patience of this body. We do not expect a delay beyond the time when the Senate will be in session in the transaction of its other business. We do not expect to detain this body with any long speeches. We have evinced no disposition whatever at any time, as I may appeal to the experience of every gentleman who hears me, to abuse the patience of this body in any respect, and above all not to try any sharp practice upon this body, but to have a fair trial.

I utterly protest against the application of rules derived from other proceedings altogether to the occasion which has arisen now, which is not an application for a continuance. We only ask that this body will wait until a man who has been summoned by its order makes his appearance here so that we may proceed with our examination.

While I am up I will say, however, that my learned friend on the other side and the very learned gentleman who makes this proposition are altogether mistaken or I am in regard to the rules of practice about what terms a party is to have who makes his application for a continuance. The gentleman who is associated with me has said that on application for a second continuance under the rules of the State in which I have practiced the party is required to state what the witness is expected to prove. The practice which prevails in the circuit court of this District and in Maryland, as my learned friend who represents that State on this floor [Mr. Whyte] will bear me out, is that where a party makes an application for a continuance, and states what he expects to prove by the witness, that proof is assumed to be a fact, not that the witness has proved it, but it is assumed to be a fact, an indisputable fact, according to the practice prevailing in this District, and in Maryland, from which State we derive the practice that prevails in the District. So that if the rule is to be enforced here, and the analogy is to be taken from the practice prevailing in this District, if we state what we expect to prove by this witness, and they proceed to trial, what we expect to prove is assumed to be an undisputed fact. That is the law of this District and the practice of the courts of the United States in the District of Columbia. That is a peculiar law. It does not prevail in the other courts with which I am familiar. It does not prevail in Missouri, where I practiced a great many years; but it is a law of this District and of Maryland. So then there are differences in respect to the laws of the different States. There is no uniform law on this subject. There is no common law upon this subject. There is none here recognized by this body. This court will have to make a rule for itself, and especially will it have to make a rule for itself in a proceeding which is not a motion for a continuance, but a motion for the delay of this trial until a witness can reach here who has been duly summoned. * * *

And, in response to a question by Mr. Manager Hoar, Mr. Blair said:

The gentleman knows perfectly well that when cases are called for trial in the ordinary courts of judicature the parties are asked whether they are ready for trial, that then and there the parties announce whether they are ready or not, and that motions for continuance are made and settled before they proceed to trial. Here there has been no occasion of that kind. We have been required to go to trial on this occasion without any "ifs" or "ands" about it, whether we were ready or not. We have been appointed a given day to be here. We have been notified that our witnesses would be summoned, and we have had the allowance of a committee of this body to summon them. We put their names in the hands of the officer to summon them. He has summoned them; and it is not our fault that this witness is not here. The analogies of the gentleman break down. One of the most unjust things in this world is to apply false analogies. It is the most misleading of all modes of reasoning.

Mr. Jeremiah S. Black, also of counsel for the respondent, argued:

I deny utterly the rule which they lay down with so much emphasis as being the true and only rule applicable to such a case—that is, that when a party is caught with an absent witness whom he had used all diligence to get here, and who he had good reason to believe would be here—it is either fair or just or law to push him forward or make him show the specific testimony which the witness would give if he were here, unless there be some reason to doubt the good faith of the application or the materiality of the witness, supposing him to be here.

The managers have produced a book, The Trials of Smith and Ogden. There the counsel for the accused asked for the continuance of the cause until they should be able to get certain witnesses from Washington, to which it was objected that they had not stated what specific facts the witnesses would prove if they were present in court. Mr. Colden, of counsel for the defense, answered:

"That is not the law as we have hitherto understood it. If we are obliged to offer an affidavit, we conceive it to be sufficient, in the first instance, to declare generally that the witnesses are material without specifying the particular points to which they are to testify, and that without them our client can not safely proceed to trial."

To which the answer of the judge was this:

"You must offer an affidavit, and must show in what respect the witnesses are material."

Now mark the reason upon which that ruling was founded:

"The facts charged in the indictment took place, and are laid, in New York; the witnesses are admitted to have been during that period at Washington. The presumption is therefore that they can not be material, and this presumption must be removed by affidavit."

That is the rule. If we were asking for a postponement on account of a witness who manifestly was a thousand miles off at the time the fact which we wished to examine him upon occurred, that would raise such a presumption against us that the court would very properly call upon us to show how that witness could be a material witness. They have cited this book as a precedent, and, so far as I have read it, it is a sound precedent. Let them follow it up.

At the conclusion of the arguments, Mr. Roscoe Conkling, of New York, proposed this order, which was agreed to without division:

Ordered, That the Senate will receive any evidence otherwise competent which the counsel for the respondent assure the Senate will be connected with the case by the testimony of the witness Evans, now absent, but whom the respondent duly asked to have summoned and who is expected to appear.

Later, during the same day,[1] Mr. Carpenter announced:

Now, Mr. President, we have completed all the testimony that in our opinion as counsel we can properly and safely introduce until Mr. Evans is sworn. We now repeat the request that the court adjourn for a reasonable time to enable Mr Evans to be present.

Mr. Manager McMahon said:

We certainly renew our objections, Mr. President, to a continuance without a compliance with the rule, or, if not the rule, a rule that ought to be established by the Senate, that the materiality or pertinency of the testimony expected be submitted to the Senate. The question has been argued.

Soon after Mr. Carpenter asked leave to file this affidavit in support of their motion:

In United States Senate sitting as a court of impeachment

THE UNITED STATES
v.
WILLIAM W. BELKNAP.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, ss:

W. W. Belknap, being first duly sworn, on oath says that he has stated to his counsel, Hon. J. S. Black, Montgomery Blair, and Matt. H. Carpenter, what he expects to prove by John S. Evans, and after such statement is advised by his said counsel, and verily believes, that the testimony of said Evans is material and necessary for his defense in this cause, the said Evans being the same person upon whose appointment the articles of impeachment are based; that said affiant is informed and believes that said Evans is en route for Washington and detained by high water obstructing the roads, but that he will be in as soon as he can get here, and this application for postponement of the trial is made in good faith, and not for delay.

[1] Senate Journal, pp. 978–981; Record of trial, pp. 269–273.

WM. W. BELKNAP.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 12th day of July, A. D. 1876.

W. J. McDONALD,
Chief Clerk Senate.

Mr. Manager McMahon said:

The objection has been fully stated, and we only rise now to enter it formally here.

In support of the objection Mr. Manager Elbridge G. Lapham said:

The respondent entered upon the trial without objection, upon the assumption that he was ready for trial. We are now in the midst of the trial; and a different rule, I submit, applies to this case from what would have been applicable if this application to postpone had been made before the trial commenced, upon the ground that Evans was not here in attendance. We have waited until the evidence on our side is completed, with the right to call this witness in case he comes, for we want him, I apprehend, much more than the defense. We have waited until the defense have exhausted in the main their evidence, according to the suggestion of the counsel. Now they propose to stop this trial midway, and postpone the further hearing by reason of the absence of this witness, without any suggestion as to what they propose to prove in respect to this case by him. I submit that an application now, pending the trial, is upon an entirely different footing from an application made before the trial is entered upon on the supposition and statement that the party is not ready for trial and can not properly commence it. The defendant did not ask to postpone this case on the ground that his witnesses were not here. He entered upon the trial on the 6th of the present month, the day assigned by the Senate for the trial, without objection that he was not prepared to go through with it. It was then the proper time, if his witnesses were not here, for him to have asked a postponement until their arrival. Having entered upon the trial, and having proceeded to the point we now have reached, I submit that the application to postpone is upon a different footing from what it would have been if made then.

Mr. Carpenter replied:

Mr. President, the reason for strictness against an application made to adjourn a cause after the trial of it has commenced in a court of law is that a jury is not a continuing institution. It is summoned for a term, and it never comes again. That particular body never comes a second time. That is the reason, and it is always stated so, why greater strictness is observed in regard to the postponement of a trial commenced before a jury. Everything that has been done must be lost. The testimony at the next term must be retaken, and the whole case proceed de novo. Here is a trial in the court of impeachment before the Senate of the United States, a body that can not die as long as the Government lives, a continuous institution, that is not to lose the benefit of what has been done. The strict attention which has been paid by every Senator here to this testimony shows that it will never fade from his recollection. There is not the slightest fear that when the Senate shall postpone this hearing for a week or ten days to have this witness arrive any of the testimony will be even faintly fading away at all in the minds of the Senate. The argument, therefore, made by the managers as to a nisi prius trial before a jury has no application.

Again, he says we ought to have applied for a continuance before we commenced the trial. I have already stated to the Senate, and now repeat, that when we made our application to have this witness subpœnaed he was not subpœnaed in our behalf, because the Government had subpœnaed him themselves. The Government were here with their case, and Mr. Evans was one of their witnesses, and we have heard from first to last that he was one of their main and principal witnesses, the thought of whose absence makes their grief overflow. We had no doubt that the managers were acting in good faith. We had no doubt that they would not proceed to the trial until they knew their chief witnesses were at command.

Mr. Carpenter then presented this request:

The respondent's counsel ask for an order that the further trial of this cause be postponed until notice be given by the Senate to the House of Representatives of the United States and to the respondent.

Pending consideration of this application, the Senate sitting for the trial adjourned.

On July 13 the President pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate describing the efforts made to secure the attendance of the witness, and stating that the latter had started for Washington, but had been detained by bad roads.

Mr. Thomas F. Bayard, a Senator from Delaware, having propounded to counsel for the respondent a question which had not been answered, proposed the following:

That as a condition precedent to the order for postponement of this trial asked for on the 12th instant by the respondent it is Ordered, That the respondent inform the Senate what in substance he proposes to prove by John S. Evans, the witness on the ground of whose absence postponement is asked.

Mr. Carpenter then said:

Mr. President and Senators, I desire in the first place to enter a respectful protest against being compelled in a criminal case to state what we expect to prove by a witness. I do that, not for its importance in this case so much as I hold that every lawyer defending a person accused in any court owes it to his profession to stand by the regular practice, and I understand that to be the regular practice almost without exception, that where a defendant in a criminal case is not in fault as to the subpœnaing of a witness he is not compellable to state what he expects to prove by that witness.

In this case, however, one or two things I may state. In the first place, we expect to prove by Mr. Evans one reason why he was not appointed when he first applied for this position, and that was that he intended to form a partnership with Durfee * * * and that that was one important reason why he was not appointed at first.

In the next place, let me say that Mr. Evans is the man upon whose appointment these articles rest. We have never examined him nor had an opportunity to do so. He has sworn twice before a committee of the House, and the testimony presented by the managers is quite voluminous in manuscript We have never read it; at least I have never read it; and I never supposed we should be called upon to read it, because we had the assurance of the Government that Mr. Evans was to be here. It seems now, from the statement of the Sergeant-at-Arms, that Mr. Evans was here and was released temporarily by the managers themselves without consultation with us. Our witness has been subpœnaed by the order of the Senate, has been here, has been discharged or released temporarily by the opposite party without consultation with us, and we desire to call and examine him.

Now we are asked, "Will you state what you expect to prove by him?" We can not, because we do not know what he will swear to in regard to certain points. And, sir, in a trial like this where every word we utter goes upon the record to be called back in the summing up of this case to show that we were mistaken about what the witness would swear, we should be guarded and prudent. We know this man Evans has had intimate knowledge of the management of that tradership from first to last, for he has been the trader. We know from glancing through certain other testimony and from certain other facts within our knowledge that he must have knowledge of certain subjects which we think if he would swear one way will be important to us; if he would swear the other way it might not be so beneficial to us. We think he will swear in our favor; and yet we do not know what he will swear; and therefore we do not know what we expect to prove by him.

The Senate, without further action on the application, adjourned.

On July 14 the Senate sitting for the trial adjourned to Monday, the 17th, the following order being made:

Ordered, That when the Senate sitting for the trial of impeachment adjourns it be till Monday next and that the trial then proceed.

On Monday, the witness not having arrived, Mr. George F. Edmunds, a Senator from Vermont, proposed this order:

Ordered, That the respondent have leave to examine John S. Evans at any stage of the proceedings prior to the termination of the argument-in-chief to any matter material to his defense.

But on motion of Mr. William Pinkney Whyte, of Maryland, it was Ordered, That the Senate sitting in this trial adjourn until Wednesday, the 19th instant.

On Wednesday Mr. Evans was present, and was sworn.

2158. The Senate sitting on impeachment trials is empowered by rule to compel the attendance of witnesses.

The Senate sitting on impeachment trials has authority to enforce obedience to its orders, writs, judgments, etc., punish contempts, and make lawful orders and rules.

The Sergeant-at-Arms is authorized by rule to employ necessary aid to enforce the lawful orders, writs, etc., of the Senate sitting on impeachment trials.

Discussion as to the power of the Senate sitting on impeachment trials to command assistance of the military, naval, or civil service of the United States.

Discussion as to the power of the Senate sitting on impeachments to enforce its final judgment.

Present form and history of Rule VI of the Senate sitting for impeachment trials.

Rule VI of the "Rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials" is as follows:

VI. The Senate shall have power to compel the attendance of witnesses, to enforce obedience to its orders, mandates, writs, precepts, and judgments, to preserve order, and to punish in a summary way contempts of, and disobedience to, its authority, orders, mandates, writs, precepts, or judgments, and to make all lawful orders, rules, and regulations which it may deem essential or conducive to the ends of justice. And the Sergeant-at-Arms, under the direction of the Senate, may employ such aid and assistance as may be necessary to enforce, execute, and carry into effect the lawful orders, mandates, writs, and precepts of the Senate.

This rule dates from the revision made in 1868, at the time of the impeachment proceedings against President Johnson. The committee, of which Mr. Jacob M. Howard, of Michigan, was chairman, reported [1] the rule in this form:

VI. The court shall have power to compel the attendance of witnesses, to enforce obedience to its orders, mandates, writs, precepts, and judgments, to preserve order, and to punish in a summary way contempts of and disobedience to its authority, orders, mandates, writs, precepts, or judgments, and to make all lawful orders, rules, and regulations which it may deem essential or conducive to the ends of justice. And the presiding officer may, by the direction of the court, require the aid and assistance of any officer or person in the military, naval, or civil service of the United States, to enforce, execute, and carry into effect the lawful orders, mandates, writs, precepts, and judgments of said court.

The Senate having come to a conclusion which caused the word "court" to be discarded, the word "Senate" was substituted.[2] Before that was done, however, another question had been presented by the motion of Mr. Willard Saulsbury, of Delaware, who moved to strike out the lines—

[1] Second session Fortieth Congress, Senate Report No. 59. [2] Globe, p. 1602.

And the Presiding Officer may, by the direction of the court, require the aid and assistance of any officer or person in the military, naval, or civil service of the United States, to enforce, execute, and carry into effect the lawful orders, mandates, writs, precepts, and judgments of said court.

Debate arose on this motion,[1] involving two points—one as to the power of the Senate to command such assistance for its incidental or interlocutory judgments, and the other as to the power to enforce by such means, or by any means, its final judgment.

In support of his motion Mr. Saulsbury said:

My reason for making this motion is that, in my judgment, it is not in the constitutional power of the Senate of the United States, when acting in the discharge of its ordinary duties or as a court, to command the services of the Army and Navy or of any officer of the Army and Navy; that if it is proper to clothe the court with such a power it is necessary to pass an act of Congress giving them the authority, if such an act itself could be constitutionally passed. Suppose that this provision of this article remained, and the court called upon the officers of the Army and Navy to assist the court in the discharge of its duties, and they should assist them either as officers or in company with men under their command, what power would the court have to compel their attendance and their assistance? They are already under the command, in the first instance, of the General of the Army, and, secondly and chiefly, under that of the President of the United States.

How, therefore, can the Senate, acting as a Senate, command the services of the Army and Navy or the officers of the Army and Navy? Suppose they refuse to obey the order of the court made upon them for any attendance or to assist the court, how can you enforce that order? I submit, Mr. President, if their services can be invoked by any agency whatever, it can only be done after the passage of an act by the two Houses of Congress; that the court then would be acting in pursuance of law; but that the orders of this body, this Senate, are not law, and that the words, if they remain, will be a nullity and inoperative.

Mr. George H. Williams, of Oregon, said:

Assuming that the Senate, when it proceeds to try an impeachment, is a court, I suppose it possesses those powers as to the execution of its judgments that other courts possess—no other or greater powers. I do not suppose that it can be contended that the Senate can make a rule which will have the force of law. True, the Senate may provide for its own government in the transaction of any particular kind of business; but I do not understand that the Senate can make a rule that will operate upon persons outside of the Senate, or that will operate like a legislative act.

Assuming, then, that the Senate, in making these rules, is confined to the creation of orders that regulate its own actions, it seems to me to follow necessarily that the court has no power by the use of military force to execute its judgment. Take any court; if you please, the supreme court of the District of Columbia. Suppose a judgment is rendered by that court; it becomes the duty of the ministerial officer, the marshal or the sheriff, to execute that judgment. If resistance is made to the process in his hands, then he may summon the posse comitatus for the purpose of executing that process; and if the resistance is so strong as to defeat his proceedings, under such circumstances, if there be any law of the land which authorizes it, he may call upon the military to assist him in the execution of the process. But I submit that when judgment is rendered by the court the jurisdiction of the court is at an end, so far as enforcing its execution is concerned. Can the supreme court of the District of Columbia make an order and enter it upon its records that if any process of that court is resisted a military or naval force shall be employed in the execution of that process? * * * as to whether the court in session may make an order commanding the military or naval forces of the United States to do any act whatever, unless it may be to protect the court, to protect its dignity, to preserve decorum. That is an inherent power in the court. But can the court issue an order as a court and say to General Grant, "You marshal your army in such a place for such a purpose? Or can it issue an order to any admiral in the Navy to put his armed vessels in any particular position for any purpose? It seems to me that, if there is no law on the subject, there ought to be a law providing for the enforcement of judgments that are rendered in cases of this kind. If there be no law, then such a law ought to be enacted; but because there is no law the Senate has no power to assume to create such a law and exercise legislative power. I do not desire to have the Senate in making these rules go beyond its jurisdiction, though I am in favor, of course, of all rules that are necessary to enable the Senate to transact its business. But it does seem to me that if in a case of impeachment that may be tried before the Senate a judgment of guilty should be pronounced by the court it can make no subsequent order for the execution of that judgment. If the person who is to be removed from office by that judgment refuses to obey that judgment, then legislation will be necessary or some other power must be interposed.

Mr. John Sherman, of Ohio, concurred with Mr. Williams if the rule was intended to enforce the final decree of the court. But he conceived that the rule was intended to apply only to what might be called the interlocutory orders of the court, to compel the attendance of witnesses, or judgments finding recalcitrant witnesses in contempt.

Mr. Reverdy Johnson, of Maryland, said:

I concur with the honorable Member from Delaware and the honorable Member from Oregon that we have no power to adopt the rule which we are asked to adopt. The rule which we are asked to adop is one which, when proposed in the committee, of which I had the honor to be a member, I resisted, and I have seen no reason to change the opinion which led me to that course.

The authority conferred upon the Senate is to try all cases of impeachment, and the Constitution provides that when the President is the party impeached the Chief Justice is to preside; and the judgment which the Senate, acting as a court of impeachment, may pronounce can not extend beyond a declaration that the party impeached shall be removed from office and be thereafter ineligible to any other office of trust or profit under the United States. The "judgment shall not," in the language of the Constitution, "extend further than" that; and upon that judgment being rendered in the case of a President—we are to look at that as a case which is really now before us with reference to this question—the Vice-President, if we have one, is to become President; and if the Vice-President is himself the President and is himself the party impeached, the President pro tempore of the Senate is to become President. No process, therefore, is necessary to enforce that judgment to that extent. The moment it has been pronounced the incumbent who has been impeached ceases to be President, and the party next in succession becomes at once the President. When he is the President he has precisely the same authority that he who is elected President and who takes his office at the termination of the term of his predecessor has.

Mr. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, argued:

I should be sorry to see us strip ourselves, by refusing to adopt a rule of this kind, of the power which that rule confers. It is a power which inheres in a body like this, as it does to the House of Commons and the House of Lords in England, from whence we derive our theory of trying impeachments. This rule only regulates and puts in force in the way of execution this existing power. We have to act as an organized body, whether sitting as a Senate or sitting as a court, because, as I said before, it is the same body exercising different functions, sitting for different purposes. Therefore, when the Constitution permits us to make rules and regulations for the government of the Senate, I think under the Constitution we can make a regulation for the government of the Senate when it is exercising any of the functions that the Constitution imposes upon it. Being of the opinion that this power to protect ourselves, and to enforce any order or mandate that the Constitution authorizes us to make, exists, while I agree that it ought to have the assistance of law in a great many respects, it being in my judgment an inherent power, we have a right to regulate and to name the cases in which it shall be put in exercise. As I have said before, if any question arises after we are sworn, and the Chief Justice takes the chair, as to the fact that the functions of the court are cramped by these general rules, it will be time enough then for the court to say that it will or will not (because it is the same body) change or execute them. Now, I should be sorry to see the Senate exercising the constitutional power of making rules and regulations in general, refuse to provide for putting in exercise a power of this kind, while I hope and believe it will not be necessary to make use of it; especially in view of the fact that it has been published to the world in another place (using parliamentary language), by a distinguished leader, that our orders, processes, and mandates will be resisted. * * *

The Constitution says that we are to try and adjudge, and there the Constitution stops; and hence, upon the logic of that proposition, inasmuch as the Constitution does not provide how we are to get the Chief Justice in here in a certain case, or how we are to be sworn in a certain other case, the law providing no oath, the Constitution providing no oath, merely stating that we are to be sworn, we are perfectly helpless. In short, the argument is that the Constitution is not a code of procedure; that it does not contain a set of rules and regulations. Mr. President, that is a mistake. It is a mistaken idea of the nature of the Constitution, of the idea of conferring constitutional power. Wherever there is a grant of power by a law or by a constitution to a tribunal or a body or a person, there is granted in that power, as a part of it, there is conferred as in it and of it and a part of it all the power that is necessary, justly and properly necessary, to the due exercise of the power conferred. So the Supreme Court frequently decided in the days of Marshall; and I challenge contradiction upon the proposition. * * *

The Senate gives itself the power, without having an endless debate on the subject, to direct its Presiding Officer, when we have a justice of the Supreme Court on trial or any other man accused, to apply to the President of the United States and ask of him the assistance that is necessary to protect us in the exercise of our functions. It does not assume the legislative power of imposing any penalty if that President should refuse. There is the distinction. If we were desiring to get a witness into court who refused to come, and force were needed to bring him upon attachment, it would be necessary, if he should bring action against one of the assistants of the Sergeant-at-Arms, for that assistant to defend on the authority of the Senate, and to prove that it was by our authority that he assisted the Sergeant-at-Arms in bringing in the witness. Now, what does this rule provide? It provides for all such cases in advance, without having a squabble over them at the time. By it our authority is given in advance, by a mere order to that effect on a single point, to call upon everybody to assist in the enforcement of our process.

Now, as to the final process, if you speak of it as process—it is not so spoken of in the report; it is spoken of as a judgment—it is said that the word "judgment" may include the final judgment. The term "judgment," of course, does in its natural meaning include final judgments as well as interlocutory ones; but we must always construe language in reference to the subject to which it is to be applied. As applied to interlocutory judgments, we all seem to agree that it is proper. When you come to final judgment, although there is no express exception made, the nature of the final judgment has been well stated by the Senator from Ohio; it is a judgment the very force and operation of the pronouncing of which is to change the office, speaking in the case of a President, from one person to another; so that the judgment in a certain sense may be said to execute itself. Therefore, if you say the word includes final judgment, and you may in that literal sense, it does no harm, because all that then you would call upon anybody to do would be to call upon the new and lawful President of the United States to assist the Senate in putting himself into possession of his own office.

The motion of Mr. Saulsbury, to strike out, was agreed to, yeas 25, nays 15.

Mr. Lyman Trumbull, of Illinois, said during the debate:

I will state that in the committee, as I was a member of it, I thought it better not to have this clause in, and I was in favor of the old rules as far as they could be made applicable to the present case. I thought the fewest changes made the best. Now, I submit to the Senate whether we shall not accomplish all we want by adopting the old rule on this point. I think the Senator from Indiana will be satisfied with that, and I think we ought all to be satisfied with it. The old rule provided that the Presiding Officer "shall also be authorized to direct the employment of the marshal of the District of Columbia, or any other person or persons during the trial, to discharge such duties as may be prescribed by him." The marshal has authority under the general laws to call a posse, if necessary, to call on the military if necessary. We have a marshal in the District of Columbia not acceptable I believe to everybody, but I think a marshal who will do his duty, whatever his duty is, as faithfully as anybody else. Why not strike out all of the words of this rule? After the word "court" strike out and insert what I have read, so as to read:

"The Presiding Officer may by the direction of the court direct the employment of the marshal of the District of Columbia, or any other person or persons, during the trial to discharge such duties as may be prescribed by him."

I think that would get us out of this difficulty.

Objection was made to this old rule—which dated from the trial of Judge Chase, in 1805—on the ground that the marshal of the District of Columbia had duties of his own prescribed by law, and might not be at the service of the Senate. There was discussion also as to his power, and the power of the Sergeant-at-Arms, to summon a posse comitatus to assist. Finally Mr. Trumbull's proposition was put in form as follows, and agreed to without division:

And the Sergeant-at-Arms, under the discretion of the court, may employ such aid and assistance as may be necessary to enforce, execute, and carry into effect the lawful orders, mandates, writs, and precepts of said court.

Subsequently, in accordance with the general principle agreed on, the final words "said court" were stricken out, and the "Senate" inserted.

So the rule was finally agreed to in the form in which it now exists.

2159. The Senate, sitting for the Belknap trial, declined to order process to compel the attendance of a witness who had been subpœnaed by telegraph merely.—On July 10, 1876,[1] in the Senate, sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, asked for an attachment to compel the attendance as a witness of John S. Evans. Mr. Carpenter stated that Evans had been subpœnaed, but had not appeared. The following return was read:

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 1, 1876.

I made service of the within subpœna, telegraphing the same to the within-named John S. Evans, at Fort Sill, Ind. T., on the evening of the 22d day of June, 1876.

JOHN R. FRENCH,
Sergeant-at-Arms United States Senate.

Mr. Manager John A. McMahon also said:

I will state in addition that I have seen a dispatch in the Sergeant-at-Arms's room from John S. Evans acknowledging the receipt of this subpœna.

It was then

Ordered, That an attachment issue for the said John S. Evans.

Presently Mr. George F. Edmunds, a Senator from Vermont, asked if there was proof that Evans had been served with the subpœna. It having been stated in reply that the proof being by telegraph, Mr. Edmunds moved to reconsider the vote on the order, and the motion was agreed to.

Then a discussion arose, in the course of which it was developed that the subpœna for this witness, as well as for other witnesses living at a distance, had been served by telegraph.

Mr. John W. Stevenson, a Senator from Kentucky, said he was not aware of any law permitting a witness to be subpœnaed by telegraph, and expressed a doubt as to the legality of an attachment based on a subpœna thus served. Mr. Roscoe Conkling, of New York, expressed the same doubt, and Mr. Edmunds said:

That is no service in point of law.

On motion of Mr. Edmunds the subject was laid on the table.

Then, on motion of Mr. Edmunds,

Ordered, That a subpœna issue commanding the said John S. Evans to appear forthwith before the Senate.

2160. The Senate, sitting for an impeachment trial, has commanded a reluctant witness to produce certain papers in its presence.—On July 8, 1876,[1] in the Senate, sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Leonard Whitney was sworn and examined as a witness on behalf of the United States. The witness was manager for the Western Union Telegraph Company and had been subpœnaed to produce telegrams passing between Caleb P. Marsh and the respondent.

Mr. John A. McMahon, of the managers for the House of Representatives, said to the witness:

Now open your package and see what dispatches you have from Washington to New York, passing between Mr. Marsh or R. G. Carey & Co. and W. W. Belknap.

The witness replied:

Before I do so I wish to state that I can not produce these telegrams unless I am required to do so by the court; and I respectfully submit to the court that they are privileged communications, and I ought not to be required to produce them.

The President pro tempore[2] thereupon submitted the question to the Senate, Shall the witness produce the telegrams? and it was decided in the affirmative without division.

2161. In impeachment trials before the House of Lords it is the practice to swear and examine the witnesses in open house.

Under the parliamentary law witnesses in an impeachment trial may be examined by a committee.

In Chapter LIII of Jefferson's Manual the following is given in the "sketch of some of the principles and practices of England," on the subject of impeachments:

Witnesses. The practice is to swear the witnesses in open house, and then examine them there; or a committee may be named who shall examine them in committee, either on interrogatories agreed on in the House or such as the committee in their discretion shall demand. (Seld. Jud., 120, 123.)

2162. Form of oath administered to witnesses in impeachment trials.

Form of subpœna issued to witnesses in impeachment trials.

In impeachment trials subpœnas are issued on application of managers or the respondent or his counsel.

Form of direction for service of subpœnas to witnesses in impeachment trials.

Discussion as to the competency of the Senate to empower one of its officers to administer oaths.

Present form and history of Rule XXIV[3] of the Senate sitting for impeachment trials.

Rule XXIV of the "rules of procedure and practice for the Senate when sitting in impeachment trials" provides:

Witnesses shall be sworn in the following form, viz: "You, ——— ———, do swear (or affirm, as the case may be) that the evidence you shall give in the case now pending between the United States and ——— ——— shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, so help your God." which oath shall be administered by the Secretary or any other duly authorized person.

[1] First session Forty-fourth Congress, Record of trial, p. 216. The Senate Journal (p. 966) indicates that Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, made the objection instead of the witness, but the verbatim account in the Record of trial seems conclusive.

FORM OF A SUBPŒNA TO BE ISSUED ON THE APPLICATION OF THE MANAGERS OF THE IMPEACHMENT OR OF THE PARTY IMPEACHED OR OF HIS COUNSEL.

To ——— ———, greeting:

You and each of you are hereby commanded to appear before the Senate of the United States, on the —— day of ———, at the Senate Chamber in the city of Washington, then and there to testify your knowledge in the cause which is before the Senate, in which the House of Representatives have impeached ——— ———.

Fail not.

Witness ——— ———, and Presiding Officer of the Senate, at the city of Washington, this —— day of ———, in the year of our Lord ———, and of the Independence of the United States the ———.

———— ————,

Presiding Officer of the Senate.

FORM OF DIRECTION FOR THE SERVICE OF SAID SUBPŒNA.

The Senate of the United States to ——— ——— , greeting:

You are hereby commanded to serve and return the within subpœna according to law.

Dated at Washington, this —— day of ———, in the year of our Lord ———, and of the Independence of the United States the ———.

———— ————,

Secretary of the Senate.

These forms were agreed to in 1868[1] on report from a committee of which Mr. Jacob M. Howard, of Michigan, was chairman. They were adopted, with slight variations of phraseology from the forms used in the impeachments of Blount and Chase, in 1797 and 1805. The words "high court of impeachment," which had been introduced in the forms as reported, were stricken out in accordance with a general conclusion of the Senate as to its functions.

As reported, the rule provided simply that the oath to witnesses should be administered by the Secretary. The words "or any other person duly authorized" were added on motion of Mr. Roscoe Conkling, of New York. A difference of opinion had arisen as to the power of the Senate to confer on anyone the authority to administer an oath.

Mr. John Sherman, of Ohio, argued[2] that it could only be done by law, because if perjury should arise, the oath must be shown to be administered by an officer authorized by law to administer an oath. The Secretary had power to do so. Mr. Howard held that the Senate had the power, as belonging to its judicial function in trying the case, to provide for the administration of the oath.

2163. In impeachments a Senator called as a witness is sworn and testifies standing in his place.

Present form and history of Rule XVII of the Senate in impeachment trials.

Rule XVII of the "rules of procedure and practice for the Senate when sitting in impeachment trials" is as follows:

If a Senator is called as a witness, he shall be sworn, and give his testimony standing in his place.

This rule dates from 1797,[3] when it was adopted for the trial of William Blount. In 1805,[4] at the time of the trial of Judge Chase, it received verbal changes merely.

2164. During the Belknap trial Senators were called as witnesses and were sworn, and testified standing in their places.—On July 12, 1876,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, said:

Mr. President, I desire to call Senator Allison, of Iowa.

The President pro tempore [2] said:

The Senator will stand in his place and be sworn.

Hon. William B. Allison was sworn and examined, standing in his place.

Similarly, George G. Wright, a Senator, was called, sworn, and examined.

2165. In an impeachment trial testimony is presented generally and is not classified according to the article to which it applies.—On February 11, 1805,[3] in the high court of impeachments during the trial of the case of the United States v. Samuel Chase, an associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, a witness was called, in behalf of the managers, when Mr. Robert G. Harper, counsel for the respondent, stated that this witness was called on an article subsequent to that on which the witnesses already examined had testified. He would submit a proposition to the honorable managers to go through at one time the whole of the testimony on each article. It might not be the regular course, but if gentlemen assent to it, said Mr. Harper, we shall prefer it; it will be convenient to the witnesses, many of whom may be discharged before the whole of the testimony is gone through.

Mr. John Randolph, jr., of Virginia, chairman of the managers, said:

Though this mode may have its advantages, it is attended with its difficulties. A witness may be found to support more than one article. With regard to the first article, I have no objection to this course; but with regard to the subsequent articles I have.

The President [4] said:

If the gentlemen are agreed, I will take the sense of the Senate on the course to be pursued.

Mr. Randolph said:

It is the wish of the managers not to depart from the usual course.

Mr. Harper said:

We do not claim it as a right.

2166. In the Johnson trial the Chief Justice held that evidence might be introduced during final arguments only by order of the Senate.—On April 20, 1868,[5] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, after the testimony had been nearly closed on both sides, Mr. Manager John A. Bingham suggested that it might be the desire of the managers later to examine one or more witnesses. This caused a discussion as to the admission of testimony after the beginning of the final arguments. Mr. Reverdy Johnson, a Senator from Maryland, expressed the opinion that such a course would not be in accordance with the American practice. Mr. Manager Bingham suggested that it had been done in the trial of Judge Chase, although he could not speak positively.

The Chief Justice [1] said:

In case the honorable managers desire to put in further evidence after the argument it will be necessary to obtain an order of the Senate; at least it would be proper to obtain such order before the argument proceeds.

2167. The proposition that evidence in an impeachment trial may be admitted or excluded by a majority vote has not been questioned seriously.—On July 21, 1876,[2] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Mr. Jeremiah S. Black, of counsel for the respondent, was making his argument in the final summing up, and was holding that, as two-thirds of the Senate were required to convict, so also two-thirds were required on a vote determining jurisdiction.

Mr. Allen G. Thurman, a Senator from Ohio, propounded this question:

If it requires two-thirds of the Senators present to overrule the respondent's plea to the jurisdiction, does it not follow that two-thirds are necessary to overrule any objections to testimony made by the respondent or to sustain an objection to testimony made by the managers?

Mr. Black replied:

No; clearly not. I admit that is a very fair attempt at the reductio ad absurdum of our proposition, but it does not succeed. What I say is that two-thirds are required to establish any fact which is an essential element in the conviction. Every other fact may be established and every other order may be made by a bare majority. I do not say that, because this is a court of impeachment and two-thirds of the Senate are required to concur in a final conviction, therefore every time an adjournment is moved it can not succeed without a majority of two-thirds.[3]

2168. Witnesses in an impeachment trial are examined by one person on either side.

Present form and history of Rule XVI of the Senate sitting for impeachments.

Rule XVI of the "Rules of procedure and practice for the Senate when sitting in impeachment trials" is as follows:

Witnesses shall be examined by one person on behalf of the party producing them, and then cross-examined by one person on the other side.

This rule was first drafted in 1805[4] for the trial of Judge Chase. In the revision of 1868,[5] preparatory to the trial of President Johnson, it was amended by striking out the words "cross-examined in the usual form," and inserting "cross-examined by one person on the other side."

2169. The managers in the Swayne trial having offered to prove a statement made by respondent before the House committee, counsel successfully resisted the reading of the statement as part of the offer.

An argument by counsel for respondent against the "offer of proof" method of presenting evidence in an impeachment trial.

Instance wherein counsel for respondent in the Swayne trial was called to order for language reflecting on the conduct of the managers.

On February 14, 1905,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Mr. Manager Henry W. Palmer, of Pennsylvania, offered to prove that the respondent on the 28th day of November, 1904, at the city of Washington, D. C., voluntarily appeared before a subcommittee of the House Judiciary Committee, not having been summoned as a witness or otherwise, and voluntarily made the following statement.

At this point Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, objected to the reading of the statement, saying:

Mr. President, standing here as objecting to this offer, I repeat what I said a few days since about this attempt to present to this court the statements made by Judge Swayne while he was a witness before a committee of the House of Representatives. The offer to prove what he said before that committee is all that, under any rule of practice that has ever prevailed in any court, can be made. It has never been held that in offering to prove what a witness had said somewhere else a statement could be made in the offer of what he had said somewhere else, because that would, by indirection and by pettifogging, Mr. President, present to the court, the judge, or the jury the statement of what the evidence would show when it was really admitted, if at all, and evidently in the expectation——

At this point Mr. Edmund W. Pettus, of Alabama, intervened and said:

Mr. President, I object to the word "pettifogging" being used in this court.

The Presiding Officer[2] said:

The Presiding Officer thinks that the word ought not to have been used.

Mr. Thurston then continued:

I apologize for the use of that word. I was not using it with reference to this offer. I was saying that it was a common custom in some courts to attempt to show by a statement of this kind what a witness had said somewhere else, when the attorneys making the offer knew and understood perfectly well that the statement itself would not be proper evidence to be introduced in the case, and that an offer of this kind was and is an attempt to present to a court evidence known to be improper, prohibited by the statutes of the United States, and its reading to the court in an offer must necessarily be, and can only be, an attempt by indirection to place in the record and before the judges testimony that they know is not legal testimony and ought not to be considered.

Now, Mr. President, I do not wish to reflect—and if I have made any reflections upon these honorable managers I withdraw them—I do not wish to reflect upon them in this case, but I do say that in other cases and in other courts where offers of this kind have been made they have been necessarily made with the express desire to place in the record and before the court and the jury a line of evidence that is prohibited by the law of the land from being presented. We object both to the offer to introduce the testimony and to the offer to read the proposed testimony to this court. Mr. President, we also protest against this manner of presenting evidence by an offer to prove something.

The only proper way, in our judgment, if the managers wish to produce this testimony and have this court pass upon its competency, is to put a witness on the stand or to offer the record, to ask the question, or let the record be objected to, and pass upon that. I do not think it is proper for us, Mr. President—and the occasion may arise in this case where it would be most desirable for us, if it were proper—to offer to prove a certain statement of fact that we do not believe can be introduced in evidence if objected to upon the other side. But, sir, feeling our responsibility here, we will not attempt to offer before this court a statement of anything, nor will we attempt to offer in this court to prove facts setting it forth. What facts we have to prove we will prove by records, or we will prove them by questions directed to the witnesses presented in the court, and let the objections, if any there be, be taken in the regular way and upon legal lines.

[1] Third session Fifty-eighth Congress, Record, pp. 2536, 2537.

[2] Orville H. Platt, of Connecticut, Presiding Officer.

Mr. Manager Palmer announced that he would hand the statement to the court and let the court pass upon it:

Mr. Joseph W. Bailey, of Texas, said:

Mr. President, while the Presiding Officer passes on such questions in the first instance, Senators must pass upon it finally, and they know what is offered before they can vote intelligently upon the question. It is unprecedented to say that the court shall not be permitted to hear what is offered before passing upon the admissibility of it. * * * for my own guidance, I would like to know exactly the question before the court.

The Presiding Officer said:

It is in writing. The managers offer to prove that the respondent on the 28th day of November, 1904, in the city of Washington, D. C., voluntarily appeared before a subcommittee of the House Judiciary Committee, not having been summoned as a witness or otherwise, and voluntarily made the following statement. Then the statement is recited.

No further demand was made for the reading of the statement, and it was not read.

2170. Managers and counsel disagreeing as to method of direct and cross examination of a delayed witness the Senate ordered examination in accordance with the regular practice.—On July 12, 1876,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, the managers announced:

We desire to state to the Senate that we are through with our case in chief for the United States with this exception, that if Mr. Evans arrives in the usual course of the trial of this case, we desire to put him on the stand, or if he is put upon the stand by the defense we desire permission to put to him such questions as would be competent and proper if he were examined by us in chief; but we do not ask the delay of this case one hour for the arrival of Mr. Evans. On the contrary, we ask that it proceed.

The President pro tempore said:

Is there objection to this privilege of examination being reserved?

Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, objected.

On July 19[2] John S. Evans appeared, and was called as a witness on behalf of the respondent.

Mr. Carpenter said:

Mr. President, I desire to say to the managers that Mr. Evans is now upon the stand. If they wish to examine him as a witness on the part of the prosecution, we make no objection to their doing so. If they do not, we give them notice that we shall insist on their being held to a proper cross-examination.

[1] First session Forty-fourth Congress, Record of trial, p. 255.

[2] Senate Journal, p. 981; Record of trial, p. 273.

Mr. Manager John A. McMahon said:

Mr. President, we desire to state to the Senate that we shall claim the right to call out on cross-examination whatever is legitimate and proper in this case. I think, after having waited for nearly a whole week for the witness to come to accommodate the defense, that the Senate will endeavor to expedite matters by enabling us to put our questions to the witness upon cross-examination with the full privilege of the gentlemen in rebutting to ask him to explain all those matters about which we may inquire, which will make one examination answer all the purposes of this case, whereas if we now examine him the gentlemen on their side will have a right only to cross-examine him as to what we examined into, and then they must put him on the stand, we cross-examine him, and so on, making really a double examination, and upon the good sense of the Senate on that question we rely now. The gentlemen may examine Mr. Evans.

Mr. Carpenter rejoined:

It will be recollected that the manager stated to the Senate that Mr. Evans was one of his most important witnesses. When he closed his case, he closed it reserving the right to call Mr. Evans if he should appear at any time during the trial. Mr. Evans is now present. We waive all objection to his being examined in chief on the part of the Government if they wish to examine him. If they do not, we shall insist, as far as we can insist, that when they come to the cross-examination they shall be restricted to the proper rules of cross-examination.

Thereupon, on motion of Mr. Roscoe Conkling, a Senator from New York, it was—Ordered, That the managers proceed to examine the witness Evans in chief; or, should they decline to do so, the respondent may proceed to examine the witness in chief, with the right of the managers to cross-examine him like any other witness.

2171. The Senate prefers that managers and counsel, in examining witnesses in an impeachment trial, shall stand in the center aisle.—On February 15, 1905,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, it was directed that the managers in examining witnesses should stand in the center aisle of the Senate Chamber, near the rear row of seats, so that the answers of witnesses might be heard readily by the Senators.

Later, however, Mr. Anthony Higgins, of counsel for the respondent, urged that he must stand by the table in examining witnesses, as he needed to consult certain documents.

But generally managers and counsel stood in the central aisle when conducting the examinations.

2172. Witnesses in an impeachment trial give their testimony standing unless specially permitted to sit.—On February 14, 1905,[2] in the Senate sitting for the trial of Judge Charles Swayne, a witness, Joseph H. Durkee, had been sworn, when the Presiding Officer[3] said:

The witness asks that he may be allowed to be seated. He may sit if there is no objection. The witness will please raise his voice and answer all questions so as to be heard all over the Chamber.

2173. The Senate assigns the place to be occupied by witnesses testifying in an impeachment trial.—On July 6, 1876,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, the testimony was about to begin, when the President pro tempore[2] suggested that witnesses take a place at the right of the Chair, on a level with the Secretary's desk; but at the suggestion of the managers and several Senators a place on the floor in front of the Secretary's desk was assigned to the witnesses.

Later[3] Mr. Theodore F. Randolph, a Senator from New Jersey, said:

Mr. President, is there any objection on the part of the Senate and counsel to have the witness stand at your right or left? So far as I am concerned, it is utterly impossible for me to hear one word out of three that is spoken. It has been so during the whole time. If I take the seat of another Senator, it is at his inconvenience. This is my seat. I have no right to another, but I have a right to hear what is said.

The President pro tempore said:

The Chair will state to the Senator that he designated a little higher place for the witnesses, but the managers and counsel thought it would be preferable to have the witness in front of the desk, and the Chair submitted that to the Senate, and, as there was no objection, the witnesses were placed there.

Then the President pro tempore put the request to the Senate, and it was ordered that the witnesses stand on the right of the Chair on a level with the Secretary's desk.

2175. The order of taking testimony in an impeachment trial is sometimes waived by consent of both parties.—On February 16, 1905,[5] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Mr. Manager David A. De Armond, of Missouri, said:

Mr. President, the witness Belden, of New Orleans, has not yet arrived, and with the exception of that one witness, so far as we know now, our case is complete, and we are willing that the respondent may go on with his testimony, with the privilege to us of calling General Belden when he arrives.

Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, said:

Mr. President, this suggestion was made to me this morning by the managers, and we have no objection to their proposed arrangement, it being, as I understand, that they have closed their case in chief, except as to the testimony of Judge Belden, who is to be produced by them and examined upon his arrival. We make no objection to that request. We should like, however, that they place Judge Belden upon the stand as soon as he does arrive, in order that as far as possible we may have their entire case in before we present our own witnesses.

2176. A question put by a Senator to a witness in an impeachment trial is reduced to writing and put by the Presiding Officer.

All orders and motions, except to adjourn, are reduced to writing when offered by Senators in impeachment trials.

The Presiding Officer in an impeachment trial is the medium for putting questions to witnesses and motions and orders to the Senate.

Present form and history of Rule XVIII of the Senate sitting for impeachments.

Rule XVIII of the "Rules of procedure and practice for the Senate when sitting in impeachment trials" is as follows:

If a Senator wishes a question to be put to a witness, or to offer a motion or order (except a motion to adjourn), it shall be reduced to writing, and put by the Presiding Officer.

This rule dates from the Chase trial in 1805.[1] In the revision of 1868,[2] preparatory to the trial of President Johnson, the form was modified by the insertion of the parenthetical clause and the use of the words "Presiding Officer" for "President."

2177. In defiance of Rule XVIII for impeachment trials, the Senate has established the practice that Senators may interrogate managers or counsel for respondent.

Instance of an appeal from a ruling of the President pro tempore in the Senate sitting for an impeachment trial.

While the Senate was sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, arguments, continuing from May 4 to May 8, 1876, were offered by the managers on the part of the House of Representatives and the counsel for the respondent on the question of the jurisdiction of the Senate to try a citizen not in civil office at the time of the presentation of articles of impeachment. In the course of these arguments, members of the Senate frequently interrupted the managers and counsel for respondent with questions[3] relating to various points touched in the argument. These questions were generally presented in writing.

2178. On July 20, 1876,[4] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Mr. Manager William P. Lynde was submitting an argument in the final summing up of the case, when Mr. William W. Eaton, a Senator from Connecticut, interrupting, said:

Mr. President, is it proper that I should ask the manager a question?

The President pro tempore[5] said:

It has been so ruled by the Senate.

And thereafter, during the trial, both the managers and counsel for respondent were interrupted by questions.[6]

2179. On July 12, 1876,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Mr. George F. Edmunds, a Senator from Vermont, following a custom that had existed during the trial, proposed a question to counsel for the respondent.

Mr. Roscoe Conkling, a Senator from New York, raised a question of order as to the right of a Senator to interrogate counsel.

The President pro tempore[2] said:

The Senator from New York calls the attention of the Chair to the fact that the rule does not authorize the questioning of counsel, but of witnesses. * * * The rule will be read.

"XVIII. If a Senator wishes a question to be put to a witness, or to offer a motion or order (except a motion to adjourn), it shall be reduced to writing and put by the Presiding Officer."

* * * The Chair will state that in administering the rule he would not feel authorized to permit a question to be put to the counsel or the managers, for the rule provides only for Senators to question witnesses, and not counsel or managers to be questioned by them. * * * The Senator from New York has stated the point of order, and the Chair simply holds that under the rule No. 18, and which is the only one bearing upon the subject and upon which he rules, the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. Edmunds appealed, and on the question, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?" There appeared yeas 18, nays 21. So the Chair was overruled, and the question proposed by Mr. Edmunds was put to counsel.

2180. Questions asked by Senators in an impeachment trial, whether of managers, counsel, or witnesses, must be in writing.—On July 11, 1876,[3] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, several Senators had addressed verbal questions to the managers and to counsel for the respondent. Mr. Roscoe Conkling, a Senator from New York, having called attention to the rule, which he condemned as absurd, the President pro tempore[2] said:

As the Senator from New York has alluded to the fact that the question was not put in writing, the Chair will say that it has not been done in order to facilitate business, and a moment ago one of the Senators was about to reduce a question to writing and the Senator from New York stated that the practice had been otherwise. * * *

The Chair to facilitate business has allowed questions to be put without being reduced to writing by their propounders.

Later, colloquies and objection having arisen, the President pro tempore ruled:

The Chair will enforce the rule. Colloquies must cease. Objection has been made, and the Chair must enforce the rule. He will state that on the part of Senators, to guard against any breach of the rules and unpleasantness, he will require all questions to be reduced to writing; and then certainly there can no debate. The counsel will proceed.

Mr. Richard J. Oglesby, a Senator from Illinois, asked:

Does the decision of the Chair, that no questions can be put hereafter without being reduced to writing, cover questions put by the court to one of the counsel?

The President pro tempore said:

It covers all questions put by members of the Senate. The rule does not require the questions on the part of the parties to be reduced to writing unless so required by the Chair or a Senator; but all questions put by members of the Senate the rule requires shall be put in writing.

2181. On July 19, 1876,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, John S. Evans, a witness on behalf of the respondent, was on the stand, when Mr. Theodore F. Randolph, a Senator from New Jersey, proposed to ask orally a question. The suggestion being made that the question should be reduced to writing, Mr. Randolph urged that such had not been the practice.

The President pro tempore[2] said:

The Chair will observe at this time that so far as questions have been put to witnesses by Senators the rule in the recollection of the Chair has been observed until this time, and the Chair called the attention of the Senator from California, who put a question just now without reducing it to writing, to the fact that the rule required it to be done. The question having been put and it having been reduced to writing, by calling the attention of the Senator to the rule the Chair did his duty. Heretofore no questions have been put to witnesses, as the Chair recollects, without having been first reduced to writing.

2182. Chief Justice Chase finally held, in the Johnson trial, that the managers might object to a witness answering a question put by a Senator.—On April 13, 1868,[3] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Gen. William T. Sherman was examined as a witness, and Mr. Reverdy Johnson, a Senator from Maryland, presented in writing a question for the witness to answer.

To this question Mr. Manager John A. Bingham, in behalf of the House of Representatives, objected.

Mr. Garrett Davis, a Senator from Kentucky, thereupon raised the question that one of the managers had no right to object to a question propounded by a member of the court.

The Chief Justice[4] said:

When a member of the court propounds a question, it seems to the Chief Justice that it is clearly within the competency of the managers to object to the question being put and state the grounds for that objection, as a legal question. It is not competent for the managers to object to a member of the court asking a question; but after the question is asked, it seems to the Chief Justice that it is clearly competent for the managers to state their objections to the questions being answered.

2183. On April 13, 1868,[5] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Gen. William T. Sherman had been called as a witness on behalf of the respondent. In the course of the examination, Mr. Reverdy Johnson, a Senator from Maryland, propounded this question:

Did you at any time, and when, before the President gave the order for the removal of Mr. Stanton as Secretary of War, advise the President to appoint some other person in the place of Mr. Stanton?

Mr. Benjamin F. Butler, one of the managers for the House of Representatives, at once objected to the question as leading in form, and also as being incompetent according to the decisions of the Senate as to this line of inquiry.

Mr. Garrett Davis, a Senator from Kentucky, raised a question as to whether or not the managers or the counsel for the defense could interpose any objection to a question by a member of the court.

The Chief Justice[1] said:

The Chief Justice thinks that any objection to the putting of a question by a member of the court must come from the court itself.

Thereupon Mr. Charles D. Drake, a Senator from Missouri, objected to the question.

The Chief Justice said:

The only mode in which an objection to the question can be decided properly is to rule the question admissible or inadmissible; and that is for the Senate. The question of the Senator from Maryland has been proposed unquestionably in good faith, and it addresses itself to the witness in the first instance, and it is for the Senate to determine whether it shall be answered by the witness or not. Senators, the question is whether the question propounded by the Senator from Maryland is admissible.

And the question being taken, there appeared yeas 18, nays 32. So the question was excluded.

2184. Either managers or counsel in an impeachment trial may object to an answer to a question propounded to a witness by a Senator.—On February 11, 1905,[2] in the Senate sitting for the trial of Judge Charles Swayne, a witness A. H. D'Alemberte, was sworn and examined. In the course of the examination a Senator, Mr. Augustus O. Bacon, of Georgia, proposed this question:

Q. Does the law of Florida require the payment of a poll tax from each male citizen of the State who is over 21 and under 55 years of age, without reference to the question whether or not he votes?

Mr. Manager Henry W. Palmer, of Pennsylvania, objected, saying:

In the opinion of the managers, that is a question of law, not of fact. I suppose we have a right to object to a question by a Senator, under the rule, and we object to that question. It is a matter of law, and I do not suppose the witness is a lawyer.

The Presiding Officer[3] said:

If the objection is insisted upon, the Presiding Officer thinks that the question is improper, for the reason that it relates to a matter of law; but the Presiding Officer would suggest that this examination has so far proceeded upon questions of law very largely.

Mr. Henry Cabot Lodge, a Senator from Massachusetts, raised a question as to whether or not the managers might object to a question propounded by a Senator.

The Presiding Officer said:

Perhaps not in the technical way in which objections are made in court, but the Presiding Officer thinks that either the managers on the part of the House or the counsel for the respondent have a right to raise the question, to be decided by the Presiding Officer, as to whether evidence is admissible. * * * The Presiding Officer does not at this time desire to make any binding or irreversible rule, but if such a case can be supposed as that a Senator should put an improper or inadmissible question to a witness the Presiding Officer thinks that that question being raised he would have a right to rule upon it.

Later Mr. Manager Palmer said:

While the witness is coming I wish to submit to the President the authority on which I objected to the question asked by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. Hopkins]. It is a ruling made by Chief Justice Chase in the trial of Andrew Johnson, and is to be found in the second volume of the Congressional Globe, at pages 166, 169, and 170, where it was decided that the managers had a right to object to a question asked by a Senator.

I merely call attention to the authority to show that I was not objecting without some reason.

A little later Mr. Joseph B. Foraker, a Senator from Ohio, said:

I deem it my duty to call attention to the fact that on page 310 of Extracts from Journals of the Senate of the United States of America in Cases of Impeachment I find the following ruling by the Chief Justice.

Mr. Johnson, Senator, having asked a question, objection was made by the managers.

"Mr. Manager Bingham having commenced an argument in support of the objection,

"Mr. Davis raised the question of order that it was not in order for the managers to object to a question propounded by a Member of the Senate.

"The Chief Justice ruled that neither the managers nor the counsel had a right to object to a question being put by a Member of the Senate, but might discuss the admissibility of the evidence to be given in answer to such question."

The ruling by the Chief Justice was submitted to the Senate and was sustained by the Senate, the rule on that subject being Rule XVIII, Governing Impeachment Trials, which reads as follows:

"XVIII. If a Senator wishes a question to be put to a witness, or to offer a motion or order (except a motion to adjourn), it shall be reduced to writing, and put by the Presiding Officer."

In other words, the rule is without qualification; and this is the first time I ever heard it suggested that a court conducting a trial did not have a right to put any question the court might see fit to ask. If there be any ruling such as managers have stated there is, made by the Chief Justice in the course of that trial, I have overlooked it

Later Mr. Manager Palmer said:

Mr. President, the managers have been asked for the particular authority for making objection to a question asked by a Senator. I refer the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Foraker] to the Congressional Globe, volume 40, trial of Andrew Johnson, page 169, in which the Chief Justice made this ruling. * * * The 13th of April, 1868, page 169. The ruling was as follows:

"The CHIEF JUSTICE. The honorable manager will wait one moment When a member of the court propounds a question, it seems to the Chief Justice that it is clearly within the competency of the managers to object to the question being put and state the grounds for that objection as a legal question. It is not competent for the managers to object to a member of the court asking a question; but after the question is asked it seems to the Chief Justice that it is clearly competent for the managers to state their objections to the questions being answered.

The Presiding Officer said:

The manager will allow the Presiding Officer to refer to the ruling which was cited by Senator Foraker. It is in these words:

"The Chief Justice ruled that neither the managers nor the counsel had a right to object to a question being put by a Member of the Senate, but might discuss the admissibility of the evidence to be given in answer to such question."

The ruling seems to be that an objection can not be made to a Senator putting a question, but that the admissibility of the evidence to be given might be objected to and discussed.

Mr. Manager Palmer said:

That is right. That is what we understood. We objected to the admissibility of the answer to such a question, because we did not think it was a legal question.

The Presiding Officer continued:

That is what the Chair understood; not that the managers objected to a question being put by a Senator, but objected to the question being answered.

Mr. Manager Palmer added:

Yes; we objected to its being answered, not to its being asked.

2185. The Senate decided that it might, in an impeachment trial, permit a Senator to interrogate a witness, although both managers and counsel for the respondent objected.—On July 11, 1876,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Caleb P. Marsh, a witness for the United States, had been examined by the managers, cross-examined by counsel for the respondent, and had responded to questions put by Members of the Senate. Thereupon Mr. John A. Logan, a Senator from Illinois, proposed another question.

Mr. Matt H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, objected to the question, and Mr. Manager John A. McMahon, on the part of the House of Representatives, seconded the objection.

Mr. Allen G. Thurman, a Senator from Ohio, asked what business the court had to ask a question to which both parties objected.

Mr. Logan said:

I presume that members of the court here stand upon an equality, and that one has as good a right to ask a question as another, provided it is a proper question, couched in proper language. I asked a question a while ago of the witness what the understanding was between him and Mrs. Bower. I did not use the name, but that was it, and he gave the understanding, and in that answer he incidentally remarked that he had an understanding with the former Mrs. Belknap. The question was argued by the managers and counsel for the respondent; the vote was taken by yeas and nays, and the Senate voted that the question should be answered; and the witness did answer the question. In furtherance of that question, I have asked what the understanding was with the former Mrs. Belknap.

Mr. Thurman said:

The House of Representatives here is represented by its managers; the defendant is represented by his counsel; and when both sides agree as to what are the issues upon which they will put in evidence, I really do not see, with entire respect to the Senator from Illinois and every other Senator, that it is any part of the duty of the Senate which is to sit here as impartial judges to introduce a new line either of prosecution or of defense. I see no reason for it; and if the Senate has erred once, it is no reason why it should err again. If neither the managers on the part of the House nor the counsel for the defendant have seen fit to go into the arrangements, if there were any, between the witness and this deceased lady or this living lady, it is no business of ours to go into them. If it is necessary for the purposes of public justice that they should be gone into and the testimony would be legitimate, it is to be presumed that the House of Representatives, through its managers, would have asked us to hear the testimony. If it were necessary for the defense that the matter should be gone into, it is to be presumed that the counsel for the defense would have introduced it as a defense. It is not for us to supply any deficiency of the prosecution or to supply any deficiency of the defense.

Mr. Oliver P. Morton, of Indiana, said:

I simply want to state that I regard it as the absolute right of this court or any member of it, with the consent of his brother judges or a majority of them, to ask any question; and the idea that the court can be overruled by the counsel on either side agreeing that the question shall not be asked is something entirely new.

The Senate decided, by a vote of yeas 23, nays 17, that the question should be admitted.

[1] First session Forty-fourth Congress, Senate Journal, p. 973; Record of trial, pp. 241, 242.

2186. Instance wherein both managers and counsel for respondent were permitted to object to questions proposed by Senators.—On April 18, 1868,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Alexander W. Randall, Postmaster-General, was sworn as a witness on behalf of the respondent. In the course of the examination, Mr. John Sherman, a Senator from Ohio, proposed in writing this question:

State if, after the 2d of March, 1867, the date of the passage of the tenure-of-office act, the question whether the Secretaries appointed by President Lincoln were included within the provisions of that act came before the Cabinet for discussion; and if so, what opinion was given on this question by members of the Cabinet to the President.

Mr. Manager John A. Bingham objected that the evidence sought to be obtained was incompetent under the decisions of the Senate already made.

The question being taken, there appeared in favor of admitting the testimony 20 yeas, and against 26 nays. So the testimony was not admitted.

2187. On July 11, 1876,[2] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Caleb P. Marsh, a witness on behalf of the United States, had been examined and cross-examined, when Mr. John H. Mitchell, a Senator from Oregon, proposed in writing this question:

Q. Why did you send to W. W. Belknap, Secretary of War, the one-half of the various sums of money received by you from Evans at Fort Sill?

Mr. Matt H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, objected, saying:

Mr. President, the celebrated Jeremiah Mason in the trial of a very important case once said, when a judge put a question to a witness, he being counsel for the defense, that if the question was put on the part of the plaintiff, he objected to it; if it was put on behalf of the defendant, he withdrew it. * * * The Government have gone through the examination of this witness; we have cross-examined him; the court has allowed them to go partially into a redirect examination, and they have concluded it. This question put by the managers now would certainly be objectionable, and I presume that we have the same right to object to a question put by the court that we would have if it were put by the managers. * * * They have had one redirect examination, the court overruling our objection to it, to give it to them. Now after this will this court permit the managers to return to that subject and open the examination of this witness? And if they will not permit the managers to do it, will the court do it themselves? If a question can not be objected to when put by one of the court which would be ruled out if put by the counsel, then this is a strange proceeding and we are in a singular situation. I say this of course with entire respect to the Senator who asks the question; but we must have a right to object to the question, and for the purpose of testing whether it is proper or improper, it must be considered as a question put by the managers, and put by the managers at this time, is there the slightest doubt that the Senate would rule it out?

The Senate, without division, determined that the question should be admitted. The witness replied to it:

Simply because I felt like doing it. It gave me pleasure to do it. I sent him the money as a present always, gratuitously. That is the only reason I had.

Thereupon Mr. George F. Edmunds, a Senator from Vermont, asked:

I should like to ask the witness, in connection with his last answer, whether General Belknap knew, in advance of these remittances from time to time, how large the present was going to be that was to be sent?

[2] First session Forty-fourth Congress, Senate Journal, p. 971; Record of trial, pp. 237, 238.

Mr. Carpenter said:

Mr. President, I object to that question upon the ground that one man can not swear what another man knows. It is physically and intellectually impossible. If he could say that he told Mr. Belknap a thing, if he could prove any fact, that fact may be proved; but could I be put on the stand to swear what the Senator from Vermont knows upon any subject? I should say he knows all about it, but any particular knowledge on a particular subject I could not be called to swear to. Nobody can.

Mr. Montgomery Blair, also of counsel for respondent, said:

Mr. President and Senators, there is another objection to this question that I hope the Senate will consider before voting that this question shall be admitted, and that is that this witness is a Government witness, and that the interrogatory of the Senator is to impeach the witness on the part of the prosecution. It implies that he has not stated the truth.

The question being submitted, the Senate, without division, decided that the interrogatory should be admitted.

2188. While managers or counsel may argue in objection to a question put to a witness by a Senator in an impeachment trial, the Senator may not reply.—On July 19, 1876,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, John S. Evans, post trader at Fort Sill, was called as a witness on behalf of the respondent. It was alleged that Evans had been appointed by respondent through improper influence by one Marsh, who had shared by the terms of a contract in Evans's profits and divided them with respondent.

Mr. Theodore F. Randolph, a Senator from New Jersey, proposed this question to witness:

The question is this: What amount of goods did Mr. Evans sell at Fort Sill during any one year pending this contract?

Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for respondent, objected:

The object of that question seems to be to show that he made an improvident contract with Marsh and paid him too much. I submit that that can have no materiality to this case. If the managers trace $500 home to Belknap in the form of a bribe, it is just as complete a case as $50,000. If he paid him an unreasonable bribe, it is no worse than to pay ten cents.

Mr. Randolph said:

I am unfortunately placed to argue the question with the counsel——

The President pro tempore [2] said:

Debate is not in order. The question will be put.

Thereupon, without division, the Senate decided that the question should be admitted.

2189. Rule of the Senate in the Swayne trial permitting managers or counsel to offer motions or raise questions as to evidence and prescribing the manner thereof.—On January 27, 1905,[3] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment of Judge Charles Swayne, Mr. Henry W. Palmer, of Pennsylvania, of the managers for the House of Representatives, offered the following:

Ordered, That lists of witnesses be furnished the Sergeant-at-Arms by the managers and the respondent, who shall be subpœnaed by him to appear on the 10th day of February, at 1 o'clock p. m.

[2] T. W. Ferry, of Michigan, President pro tempore.

[3] Third session Fifty-eighth Congress, Record, pp. 1450, 1451.

Later Mr. Charles W. Fairbanks, a Senator from Indiana, said:

We understand that the order which the managers of the House have asked for can not properly be put by them, and I suppose it is the proper practice to regard the order offered as a request. I offer, upon the request of the managers of the House, for present consideration, the order which I send to the desk.

Later, after the Senate had resumed its legislative sessions, Mr. Joseph W. Bailey, of Texas, said:

Mr. President, a moment ago, when the Senate was sitting as a court, it was doubted if the managers on the part of the House are permitted under the rules to make a motion. My own opinion is that nobody but a Senator can make a motion to be voted on by the Senate, but it would be a most anomalous situation if an attorney in any kind of a court could not make motions before that court to be acted on by that court. And for my own guidance—I am sure that other Senators are in much the same frame of mind—I should like to have that question settled. If it would be proper, I should like to have the Judiciary Committee report, or if the Senate prefers, a special committee, what have been the practice and the precedents in that respect.

It was pointed out that the Senate already had appointed a select committee to examine such questions, and that they would consider this question.

On February 3[1] Mr. Augustus O. Bacon, of Georgia, offered, and the Senate sitting for the trial agreed to, an order as follows:

Ordered, That in all matters relating to the procedure of the Senate sitting in the trial of the impeachment of Charles Swayne, judge of the district court of the United States in and for the northern district of Florida, whether as to form or otherwise the managers on the part of the House or the counsel representing the respondent may submit a request or application orally to the Presiding Officer, or, if required by him or requested by any Senator, shall submit the same in writing.

In all matters relating immediately to the trial, such as the admission, rejection, or striking out of evidence, or other questions usually arising in the trial of causes in courts of justice, if the managers or counsel for the respondent desire to make any application, request, or objection, the same shall be directly addressed to the Presiding Officer and not otherwise.

2190. During final argument in the Chase trial the managers claimed and obtained the right to introduce testimony to justify evidence of an impeached witness.—On February 25, 1805,[2] in the high court of impeachments, during the trial of the case of United States v. Samuel Chase, an associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, the testimony had been closed, the beginning on behalf of the managers in the final argument had been made, and two of the counsel for the respondent had submitted arguments, when Mr. John Randolph, jr., of Virginia, chairman of the managers, moved the examination of Hugh Holmes, who would testify in corroboration of the testimony of John Heath, a witness for the managers, whose evidence had been attacked. Mr. Randolph explained that Mr. Holmes did not attend until the evidence for the managers had been concluded. Mr. Randolph further said:

I only state this circumstance in tenderness to the character of the witness, and that Mr. Holmes is ready to prove that, pending the trial of Callender, Mr. Heath did declare to him as having passed in his presence such a conversation as the witness has stated. It is not our wish to press his evidence, because we know that the evidence of a witness thus rebutted can establish nothing material to the prosecution. But we are ready, if the court and counsel for the respondent agree, to receive his testimony.

[2] Second session Eighth Congress, Senate Impeachment Journal, p. 523; Annals, p. 541.

Mr. Robert G. Harper, counsel for the respondent, said:

It is not for us to say how the honorable managers shall proceed in conducting this prosecution. We have no objection to Mr. Holmes being examined, and we feel perfectly indifferent whether Mr. Heath be abandoned or not. Should Mr. Holmes not be examined, I presume it will be understood that he was offered to support the declaration of Mr. Heath.

Mr. Randolph said it was not intended to abandon Mr. Heath.

Mr. Harper inquired how long Mr. Holmes had been in the city. If correctly informed he had been here three days, and if so, his testimony might have been adduced before the defense on the part of the respondent was made.

Mr. Randolph said the delay in offering Mr. Holmes to the court arose solely from an indisposition to interrupt the counsel for the defendant. The character of Mr. Holmes stood too high to be impeached. It was only when they heard the correctness of Mr. Heath's testimony questioned that the managers deemed it necessary to do that, for the not doing of which they had received the censure of the counsel for the respondent. Mr. Randolph then moved that Hugh Holmes should be sworn.

The President [1] said the reasons assigned for the admission of Mr. Holmes's testimony, so far as they arose from tenderness to the character of Mr. Heath, could have no weight with the court. The only question for them to decide was whether his testimony was or was not material.

Mr. Joseph H. Nicholson, of Maryland, one of the managers, said he held it to be the right of either party, at any stage of the trial, when the evidence of a witness was impeached, to justify it by the testimony of another witness. He asked the receiving, therefore, of Mr. Holmes's testimony as a matter of right, not of favor.

The yeas and nays were taken on examining Mr. Holmes, and were yeas 21, nays 11.

2191. Instance of a suggestion by the Presiding Officer in the Swayne trial as to the form of a question.—On February 20, 1905,[2] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, a witness on behalf of the managers was questioned by Mr. Manager David A. De Armond, of Missouri:

Q. Now, then, as to the matter of that newspaper article. I understood you to say that you knew nothing whatever about it, and that you so stated during the hearing of these contempt proceedings?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And that Mr. Davis made a similar statement concerning himself?—A. I heard it, yes, sir.

Q. In the court, during the contempt proceedings?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. I will ask you whether there was anything else offered in testimony by those supporting the complaint against you than these two matters?—A. Nothing whatever.

Q. Then I will ask you whether there was anything upon which testimony could have borne in the matter brought out against you?

Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, objected to this question.

The Presiding Officer [3] said:

In that form the question is hardly admissible. * * * The witness might be asked if he supposed there was anything which was important which was overlooked.

2192. Decision as to the limits within which counsel in an impeachment trial may criticise a witness.—On February 18, 1805,[1] in the high court of impeachments, during the trial of the case of The United States v. Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, a witness, John Montgomery, was called and in the course of cross-examination Mr. Robert G. Harper, counsel for the respondent, said:

I will now proceed to show that Mr. Montgomery, in his strong anxiety to get Judge Chase impeached, has remembered things which nobody else remembers, and has heard things which nobody else heard.

Mr. John Randolph, jr., of Virginia, chairman of the managers, said:

I will ask of this court whether the witnesses we have called are not under their protection?

The President said:

If the counsel, in the testimony they adduce, come up to what they state they can prove, they will not be subject to reproach; if they do not, they merit it.

Mr. Randolph said:

I have no objection to the counsel impugning the veracity of one witness by the evidence of another and descanting upon it, but I think they take an improper liberty when they undertake to say, before it is proved, that what is deposed by a witness never passed.

The President[2] said:

I understand the gentleman to say that he will prove by another witness that what has been deposed never did pass.

Mr. Harper said:

Precisely so, sir.

2193. In the Swayne trial the Presiding Officer generally ruled on questions of evidence instead of submitting them directly to the Senate.—On February 21, 1905,[3] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, the Presiding Officer submitted a question relating to the admissibility of evidence, to the Senate directly, without ruling himself. Generally, in the course of this trial the Presiding Officer ruled, and very rarely indeed was the judgment of the Senate asked. The cases wherein the Presiding Officer submitted the question at once to the Senate without ruling himself were rare and exceptional. On February 23[4] occur several instances when the Presiding Officer submitted the decision at once to the Senate, and thereafter on the few succeeding days he submitted questions with more frequency.

2194. When the judgment of the Senate is asked after the Presiding Officer has ruled on a question of evidence, the form of question is, "Is the evidence admissible?"—On February 14, 1905,[5] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne a question arose as to an offer of evidence, and the judgment of the Senate was asked by Mr. Joseph W. Bailey, a Senator from Texas. The Presiding Officer said:

Objection was made to the introduction of certain evidence. The offer on the part of the managers of the House to prove what Judge Swayne stated before a committee of the House when he appeared voluntarily before that committee was objected to by counsel for the respondent. The Presiding Officer ruled that without inquiring technically whether it was testimony which Judge Swayne gave, or technically whether this was a criminal court, that the intention of the statute referred to was such as made it proper to exclude the testimony; and from that the Senator from Texas took an appeal.

Mr. Joseph B. Foraker, a Senator from Ohio, raised a question:

Mr. President, I submit it is not technically correct to call it an appeal. The rule provides that when the Chair has ruled, it may, if any Senator so requests, submit the question to the Senate. I understand this is simply a request that the question be submitted to the Senate. * * * The question submitted to the Senate should be whether or not the objection of counsel for the respondent shall be sustained. So an affirmative vote would sustain the objection.

Mr. Albert J. Hopkins, a Senator from Illinois, said:

Would not the form under that rule then be as to whether the decision of the Chair shall stand as the judgment of the court?

Mr. Shelby M. Cullom, a Senator from Illinois, said:

I desire to read a paragraph from the trial of the President of the United States years ago:

"The CHIEF JUSTICE. Senators, the Chief Justice is unable to determine the precise extent to which the Senate regards its own decisions as applicable. He has understood the decision to be that, for the purpose of showing intent, evidence may be given of conversation, with the President at or near the time of the transaction. It is said that this evidence it distinguishable from that which has been already introduced. The Chief Justice is not able to distinguish it, but he will submit directly to the Senate the question whether it is admissible or not."

The Presiding Officer[1] said:

This is the rule:

"And the presiding officer on the trial may rule [on] all questions of evidence and incidental questions, which ruling shall stand as the judgment of the Senate, unless some Member of the Senate shall ask that a formal vote be taken thereon, in which case it shall be submitted to the Senate for decision; or he may, at his option, in the first instance, submit any such question to a vote of the Members of the Senate."

The presiding officer was of opinion that the question was whether the evidence was admissible. * * * The presiding officer then submits to the Senate the question whether the evidence offered by the managers on the part of the House is admissible.

2195. The right to ask a decision of the Senate after the Presiding Officer has ruled preliminarily on evidence belongs to a Senator, but not to counsel.—On July 7, 1876,[2] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, a question by counsel for the respondent to a witness was objected to by Mr. Manager John A. McMahon.

The President pro tempore[3] said:

The Chair sustains the objection.

Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for respondent, asked if he might appeal to the Senate.

The President pro tempore[3] held that he might not, but said that a Senator might have the point submitted to the Senate.

2196. The Senate finally decided in the Swayne trial that under the rule debate on the admission of evidence might not take place in open Senate.—On February 14, 1905,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, the decision of the Senate was asked on a question relating to the admissibility of evidence. Mr. Joseph W. Bailey, a Senator from Texas, proposed to debate the question, when a question as to debate arose, and the Presiding Officer[2] said:

In the opinion of the Presiding Officer, the matter can be discussed in the Senate upon the appeal and the vote be taken here, or the Senate can, if it so desires, retire to its conference chamber for discussion. Either course may be pursued, according to the wish of the Senate.

After Mr. Bailey had proceeded in debate for some time, Mr. Augustus O. Bacon, a Senator from Georgia, cited Rules VII and XXIII, saying:

The rule is peremptory that except when the doors are closed there must be no debate, short or long. * * * I read Rule VII to show that Rule XXIII does not in any manner modify the provision of Rule VII as to debate except when the Senate is in secret session; "when the doors shall have been closed," in the language of the rule. I do not think that debate upon any question which may arise is in order. Senators will perceive necessarily that a contrary rule would in its operations protract the session of a court of impeachment beyond the possibility of any practical termination.

The Presiding Officer said:

The Presiding Officer is of opinion that the point of order taken by the Senator from Georgia is well taken, and that the only exception is that contained in Rule VII. Rule XXIII provides:

"All orders and decisions shall be made and had by yeas and nays, which shall be entered on the record, and without debate, subject, however, to the operation of Rule VII, except when the doors shall be closed for deliberation."

The exception in Rule VII is that upon all such questions the vote shall be without a division. But Rule XXIII provides that all orders and decisions shall be by yeas and nays. The exception referred to in Rule VII is upon questions relating to the introduction of evidence and incidental questions; if the vote of the Senate is asked, it may be decided without a division, unless the yeas and nays are demanded.

The Presiding Officer thinks the point is well taken.

2197. In an argument as to the admissibility of evidence, it is not proper to read the very evidence objected to.—On February 23, 1905,[3] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Mr John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, proposed to submit as evidence certain extracts from the official record of Congressional debates.

Mr. Manager Marlin E. Olmsted, of Pennsylvania, having objected, Mr. Thurston said:

I am offering the proceedings. They directly bear upon the construction of this act, and I have a right to refer to the Congressional Record in the debates, at least; for instance, Mr. Allen, in the Senate, when this provision was under consideration, offered the following——

Mr. Manager Olmsted said:

I object to the gentleman putting in an argument the evidence to which we object. I understand he was about to read from the debates.

[1] Third session Fifty-eighth Congress, Record, pp. 2538, 2539.

[2] Orville H. Platt, of Connecticut, Presiding Officer.

[3] Third session Fifty-eighth Congress, Record, pp. 3165, 3166.

The Presiding Officer[1] said:

The Presiding Officer thinks that counsel can make the argument that he desires to make without reading the Congressional debates. He desires to show the nature of the evidence which he proposes to introduce by introducing these debates. They are something more than debates. They are action upon amendments and various motions that were made. The Presiding Officer thinks that that can be done without any actual reading of the debates. There can be statements by counsel as to the particular matter to which he wishes to call the attention of the Senate without reading the debates.

2198. The Chief Justice held, in the Johnson trial, that the offering of evidence might not be interrupted by a question relating to business incident to the trial or to legislative sessions.—On April 3, 1868,[2] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, the managers on behalf of the House of Representatives were engaged in offering certain documentary evidence, when Mr. Henry B. Anthony, a Senator from Rhode Island, proposed to call up for consideration a matter of business pending in a legislative session of the Senate.

The Chief Justice[3] said:

It is not in order to call up any business transacted in legislative session.

Thereupon Mr. Anthony, proposing to call the matter up as originating in the Senate sitting for the trial, moved that a place be assigned on the floor to the reporter of the Associated Press.

The Chief Justice said:

The Chief Justice thinks it is not in order to interrupt the business of the trial with such a motion.

2199. In the Belknap trial, by consent of both sides, a statement of what would be proven by an absent witness was admitted, subject to objection as to its relevancy.—On July 10, 1876,[4] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, asked for the reading of two telegrams, one from Gen. W. T. Sherman and the other from Gen. P. H. Sheridan, setting forth that urgent military necessity rendered it desirable that the latter should not leave his post to testify before the Senate in this case. The telegrams having been read, Mr. Carpenter said:

In consequence of those telegrams, and not wishing to interrupt the public service unnecessarily, we have agreed, if the court will permit us, to let it go upon the record, as follows:

I. It is admitted that Lieut. Gen. Phil Sheridan would, if present, testify to the good official character of the respondent while Secretary of War.

II. That in regard to all the applications made for leave to sell liquors at the military posts the matter was referred by the Secretary of War to him, and by him investigated and reported on, and his report in all cases was adopted by the Secretary of War.

III. And that a part of a letter from him, Sheridan, to the Secretary of War, dated March 29, 1872, may be read in evidence and that the same, and said admission, shall be taken and regarded as testimony in this cause with the same effect as though General Sheridan had appeared and testified to the same effect.

It is understood, of course, that all these different points are subject to the objection that they are irrelevant or incompetent if the counsel on the other side chooses to raise that objection.

Mr. Manager John A. McMahon said:

We admit that he would be asked these questions and would answer in that way, provided they were competent or material.

2200. The presentation and reading of a document during introduction of evidence in an impeachment trial was held not to preclude an objection as to its admissibility.—On April 2, 1868,[1] in the Senate sitting for the trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Mr. Manager James F. Wilson, of Iowa, offered in evidence a certain letter from President Johnson to Gen. U. S. Grant.

The letter having been read, Mr. Henry Stanbery, of counsel for the President, asked that certain documents referred to by the letter as accompanying it be read. The managers having announced that they did not propose to offer the accompanying documents, Mr. Stanbery entered an objection to the admission of the letter without the accompanying documents.

Mr. Manager Wilson raised the point that the objection came too late, since the letter had been submitted and read and was in evidence.

The Chief Justice[2] said:

The Chief Justice is of opinion that objection may now be taken.

2201. In the Belknap trial the Presiding Officer, on request of respondent's counsel, required the reading in full of letters presented in evidence.—On July 8, 1876,[3] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Mr. Manager John A. McMahon, in the course of the introduction of testimony, offered a series of letters, the reading of which began.

Mr. George G. Wright, a Senator from Iowa, while admitting that the counsel had the right to have the letters read at length, asked if, in order to save time, they might not be regarded as read.

Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, objected and demanded that the letters be read in full.

The President pro tempore[4] directed the reading to proceed.

2202. The Chief Justice held, in the Johnson trial, that offer of documentary proof should state its nature only, but that the Senate might order it to be read in full before acting on the objection.—On April 18, 1868,[5] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Alexander W. Randall, Postmaster-General, was sworn as a witness on behalf of the respondent, and testified that Foster Blodgett, postmaster at Augusta, Ga., had been suspended from office on complaints both written and verbal. Certified copies of the official papers relating to the removal were then offered in evidence by Mr. William M. Evarts, of counsel for the respondent.

[5] Second session Fortieth Congress, Globe Supplement, p. 236.

Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler, having intimated that there might be objection, the Chief Justice[1] said:

The counsel for the President will state what they propose to prove in writing. * * * It will be necessary to state what the order and letters are; otherwise the court will be unable to judge of their admissibility.

Thereupon Mr. John Sherman, a Senator from Ohio, said:

I think we have a right to ask for the reading of the letters to know what we are called upon to vote.

The Chief Justice said:

The Senate undoubtedly have a right to order the letters to be read. * * * The usual mode of proposing to prove is by stating the nature of the proof proposed to be offered, and then, upon an objection, the Senate decides whether proof of that description can be introduced. It is not usual to read the proof itself. Undoubtedly it is competent for the Senate to order it to be read.

Mr. Evarts thereupon made this offer in writing:

We offer in evidence the official action of the Post-Office Department in the removal of Mr. Blodgett, which removal was put in evidence by oral testimony by the managers.

Mr. Butler having withdrawn all objection, the papers were then offered and read.

2203. Decisions as to the extent to which a witness in an impeachment trial may use memoranda to refresh his memory.—On February 11, 1805,[2] in the high court of impeachments during the trial of the case of United States v. Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, George Hay was sworn as a witness, and made this statement:

The greater part of the evidence I am to deliver relates to what was said by me as counsel for J. T. Callender, who was indicted for a libel on the President of the United States, and what was said by one of the judges; for I do not recollect to have heard the voice of Judge Griffin at any time during the trial. In order to make this statement as accurate as possible, as my memory is not strong, it is necessary to resort to a statement made by myself and the counsel associated with me in the defense of J. T. Callender, which I now hold in my hand, and every part of which, according to my best recollection, is correct.

Mr. Robert G. Harper, counsel for the respondent, here interrupted Mr. Hay and said:

The witness may refer to anything done by himself at the time the occurrences happened which he relates. But I submit it to the court how correct it is to refer to what was not done by him, or done at the time.

The President asked Mr. Hay whether the notes were taken by him.

Mr. Hay said:

The statement was made by different persons. Some parts were made by myself, perhaps the greater part; the rest by Mr. Nicholas and Mr. Wirt. I believe I shall be able to state from it every material occurrence which took place at the time. With regard to those parts of the statement not made by me, a reference to them will call to my recollection the facts mentioned in such parts. If I state anything which I do not distinctly recollect, upon adverting to the statement, I will explain the actual situation of my mind on that point.

---

[1] Salmon P. Chase, of Ohio, Chief Justice.

[2] Second session Eighth Congress, Annals, pp. 193–195; Senate Impeachment Journal, p. 518.

Mr. Joseph H. Nicholson, of Maryland, one of the managers, said:

If I understand the witness, it is not his intention to give the paper in his hand as evidence, but merely to refer to it for the purpose of refreshing his memory.

Mr. Harper said:

I do not understand the way in which it is meant to use the paper. I apprehend that it is a rule of evidence that nothing but notes made at the time of the transactions related can be received as evidence. I therefore am of opinion that a reference to this statement is inadmissible, because a part of it is made by others, and none of it made at the time.

Mr. Caesar A. Rodney, of Delaware, one of the managers, said:

When we advert to what has been stated by the witness, who says he does not mean to state in evidence anything in the paper of which he has not, independently of it, a distinct recollection, I think it is within the law to admit him to avail himself of it. I apprehend that had I attended the trial of Callender and taken minutes, and others had attended and not taken notes, if by recurring to my notes there should be recalled to their recollection facts so distinctly that they could swear to them before the court, it would be competent to admit their reference to such notes.

Mr. George W. Campbell, of Tennessee, one of the managers, inquired whether the objection was not confined to that part of the statement not made by the witness?

Mr. Harper said the objection related to the whole of it.

Mr. Campbell believed that a witness might use any memorandum to refresh his memory; and that it was not necessary that it should be made at the point of time when the events happened. It is sufficient if made at a time when his remembrance of the facts was correct. With regard to that part not taken by himself, if he perused it at a time so shortly after the events related, as to be able to determine it accurate, and now recognize the memorandum to be the same, it was sufficient.

Mr. Luther Martin, counsel for the respondent, said he had been many years in the practice of the law. The rules of evidence were probably different in different States. But he had always supposed that a witness could not be permitted to use any memorandum not made by himself, or at the time of the events related, or near it. He may, before he comes into court, consult any memorandum for the purpose of refreshing his memory, but not in court.

The President[1] said:

The witness proposes to make use of a memorandum under the circumstances which he has stated. The question is, shall the witness be permitted to make use of it?

Mr. John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts, a Senator, said:

I am not prepared to answer that question at present, not knowing the nature of the minutes the witness proposes to use. I therefore move that the Senate retire before the question is taken.

The question on retiring was taken, and on division lost.

Mr. Adams said he wished to see the papers before he voted.

The President asked Mr. Hay whether it was in his own handwriting.

Mr. Hay replied that it was not; but that it was written by a clerk from a printed statement.

[1] Aaron Burr, of New York, Vice-President, and President of the Senate.

The President asked:

Have you the parts made by yourself separate?

Mr. Hay said he had not.

The President then put the question:

Shall the witness be permitted to make use of, as a memorandum, a paper containing a statement of facts, composed by himself and other gentlemen, in relation to the trial of James T. Callender, sometime after the trial, the paper proposed to be made use of being a copy made by his clerk from a printed paper which contained the said statement.

And there appeared yeas 16, nays 18.

2204. On April 3, 1868,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, William N. Hudson was sworn and examined by the managers for the House of Representatives as to a certain speech of the President which he assisted in reporting at Cleveland, Ohio. Being questioned as to certain interruptions which the President experienced while speaking, the witness was told by Mr. Manager Butler that he might refresh his memory from any memorandum or copy of a memorandum. Witness then proceeded to use a copy of the newspaper in which the report was printed.

Mr. William M. Evarts, of counsel for the President, objected that the witness should speak by his recollection if he could. If he could not, he might refresh it by the presence of a memorandum which he made at the time.

The Chief Justice[2] having drawn from the witness that the memorandum made by him at the time was lost, and that the newspaper contained a copy of that memorandum, ruled as follows:

It is inquired on the part of the managers what interruptions there were, and the witness is requested to look at a memorandum made at the time in order to refresh his memory. Of that memorandum he has no copy, but he made one at the time, and it is lost. The Chief Justice rules that he is entitled to look at a paper which he knows to be a true copy of that memorandum. If there is any objection to that ruling, the question will be put to the Senate.

2205. It was held in the Peck trial that a witness might correct orally testimony already given by himself.

In correcting testimony previously given in an impeachment trial a witness was not permitted to put in a paper made up in part from the recollections of other persons.

On January 17, 1831,[3] in the high court of impeachment, during the trial of the cause of The United States v. James H. Peck, William C. Carr presented himself before the court and stated that since the evidence had been closed a written statement of the testimony had been shown to him, from which he perceived that the evidence which he had given was in one point defective, from want of remembrance of certain circumstances. He now therefore prayed leave of the court to present a condensed statement of the facts which had been omitted. He had reduced them to writing under the solemnity of an oath. In doing so he had not chosen to rely altogether upon his own recollection, but had referred to that of two other witnesses in this cause, and also had consulted two other gentlemen concerned in the matter. He hoped that the court would deem this paper admissible. If not, he wished to be subjected to oral examination.

Objection being made by the managers on behalf of the House of Representatives, the paper was withdrawn and the witness was examined orally.

On January 11,[1] B. C. Lucas had presented himself and addressed the court as follows:

I find it incumbent upon me to suggest to the court that since I gave my testimony some facts have occurred to my recollection which then escaped my memory.

Mr. Jonathan Meredith, counsel for the respondent, said:

The witness appears with a view of explaining or supplying a defect in his testimony as before delivered.

The President of the court[2] said:

The witness has a right to make an explanation of his testimony.

2206. Instance wherein depositions offered in an impeachment trial were purged of matters in conflict with the rule laid down as to evidence.—On January 10, 1831,[3] in the high court of impeachment, during the trial of the cause of The United States v. James H. Peck, Mr. Jonathan Meredith, counsel for the respondent, offered in evidence and read certain depositions. He stated that in consequence of decisions just made by the court of impeachment, relative to the admissibility of evidence, he had stricken from the depositions, which had been taken in Missouri, all those portions which were covered by the principles of the decision. The depositions, he said, had been examined jointly by the managers for the House of Representatives and himself, and the portions to be expunged had been mutually agreed upon.

2207. The Senate struck from the record of an impeachment trial certain statements of fact introduced by a manager in argument, without support of evidence.

On an order presented by a Senator in the course of an impeachment trial it was held that Senators might debate only in secret session.

An order affecting the conduct of a manager being presented during an impeachment trial, he was permitted to explain.

On April 16, 1868,[4] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler, in the course of a speech of protest against the delays of the proceedings, introduced certain tabular statements of the sales of gold by the Government, with the object of supporting his claim that the delay in the trial of the President was reacting unfavorably on the country. These statements were printed in the Globe for that day.

On April 17, the Senate having convened for the trial, Mr. Orris S. Ferry, a Senator from Connecticut, offered the following:

Whereas there appear in the proceedings of the Senate of yesterday as published in the Globe of this morning certain tabular statements incorporated in the remarks of Mr. Manager Butler upon the question of adjournment, which tabular statements were neither spoken of in the discussion nor offered or received in evidence: Therefore,

Ordered, That such tabular statements be omitted from the proceedings of the trial as published by rule of the Senate.

Mr. Thomas A. Hendricks, of Indiana, asked if it would be in order for a Senator to defend the Secretary of the Treasury against the attacks of the manager.

The Chief Justice [1] said that the rules positively prohibited debate. He said, however:

The question of order is made by the resolution proposed by the Senator from Connecticut. Upon that question of order, if the Senate desire to debate, it will be proper that it should retire for consultation. If no Senator moves that order, the Chair conceives that it is proper that the honorable manager should be heard in explanation.

Mr. Manager Butler thereupon made a brief explanation.

The order proposed by Mr. Ferry was then agreed to without division or debate.

2208. Having ascertained that certain testimony was within the scope of the articles of impeachment, the Senate reversed a decision that the testimony was immaterial.

Discussion as to whether or not the cross-examination in an impeachment trial may go beyond the scope of the direct examination.

Instance wherein a President pro tempore presiding at an impeachment trial made a decision as to evidence.

On July 7, 1876,[2] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, General Irvin McDowell, a witness for the Managers, was cross-examined by Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent. It had been charged against the respondent that he had appointed one Marsh to be post trader at Fort Sill, but that the name of one Evans had been substituted, said Evans having contracted with Marsh to share with him the profits, while Marsh remained away from Fort Sill and at his home in New York, and, it was charged, shared the money sent by Evans with the respondent. The witness, by direction of the Secretary of War, had drawn an order relating to absentee post traders. The examination proceeded thus:

Q. (By Mr. Carpenter). In regard to the post trader residing at the post, was there any object in that except to keep him at all times subject to military regulation and bring him more nearly within the control of the men who ought to control—the military officers?—A. My own view in drawing up that order was aimed at the question in hand of there being what I supposed to be a post trader at Fort Sill residing in New York.

Q. Would it make any difference whether he resided in New York or any other place, provided the rates at which he must sell were fixed?—A. I do not know whether it would or not.

Q. Can you conceive any difference?—A. I will only say what was in my mind at the time I drew the order up, that it was with reference to correcting an admitted abuse.

Q. The abuse, as you understood it, was sales at extravagant prices, was it not?—A. No; it was a man holding a place and exacting or receiving a large sum of money for it, having no capital, and doing no service for the money he received.

Q. Is there any way that that could injure the soldier or the country, unless he charged higher prices in consequence of that arrangement?

Mr. Manager John A. McMahon objected to this question, saying:

The objection we make to the question is that it is an endeavor to exculpate the accused by simply proving that he did not hurt the soldiers, although he may have hurt Evans. It seems to me that in the trial of a person for official malfeasance in an impeachment case, if we prove that the Secretary of War is in a corrupt combination with a person who has procured an appointment, by which the person who gets the appointment, for example—and I will give the example, Evans—is to divide the money that Evans may be able to force out of this person, to say that that is innocent simply because is does not raise the price of provisions at the garrison or the price of thread or cotton or whatever else may be wanted there, is certainly to the managers something new in the development of this case and of the theory of the defense. We do not care whether he raised the price of provisions a copper, from our standpoint.

Mr. Mongomery Blair, of council for the respondent, argued:

Mr. President and Senators, I beg to call the attention of the court to the fact that the gentleman in the close of his speech, and his colleague in the opening of his, assumed here as proved and established before this court the very thing that they have yet to prove, of which there is not a scintilla of proof before the court. He says, of course, if they prove that this defendant received this money it is an impeachable offense, and it does not make any difference what this order was drawn for. He goes back constantly harping on that and repeating it as the substance of the thing proved, when it remains yet to be proved, and when the question before this court bears directly upon that question, to show that by the course of conduct adopted by this defendant he could not have known that there was any such contract in existence between these parties.

The effort which we are here now making and the effect of this proof is as positive as it can be made to negative the assumption upon which these gentlemen are asking these questions. Is it not legitimate for us to ask this witness—an experienced officer of the Army, who himself did call upon the Secretary to inform him of this evil in existence and to suggest remedies for it—whether or not the remedy which he himself suggested was not adequate to the evil which he undertook to meet? The question whether the trader lived at the post or anywhere else is, as we expect to show, utterly immaterial; and yet we see that that circumstance was made to figure in the opening of this argument, and is continued to this moment, as the only way of escape from the conclusion and weight of this testimony that the defendant misrepresented to the officer who drew this order the fact that the trader resided not at the post but in New York.

The witness has not said any such thing; he has not said at all that this defendant represented to him any such thing. He has not said that, to begin with. Those are words put into his mouth by these gentlemen. He has not asserted at any time that the defendant told him that the trader lived in New York and that this was carried on for that purpose. He says, to be sure, that, as he now recollects it, he understood the fact to be that he did reside somewhere else; but we will show him and show this court before we get through that in that his recollection is mistaken. We will show him that he knew then, at the time, that the trader did not live in New York, but lived at the post. Hence this totally immaterial circumstance in its bearing upon this order is utterly swept out of the way, and the testimony will be left to bear with its whole force upon the fact that this defendant did not know and could not know of the existence of this contract which is the basis of the proceedings.

I therefore insist that this is a principal, material question to be answered by the witness, and the fact of the resistance to it makes it manifest to the court that it is a pretty material question.

The question being submitted to the Senate, the question was excluded; yeas 20, nays 31. So the Senate sustained the objection.

Before the above vote had been taken Mr. Samuel J. R. McMillan, a Senator from Minnesota, had briefly called attention to the fact that in one of the articles of impeachment it was charged that Evans was retained in office by the Secretary of War not only corruptly, but that his retention there was "to the great injury and damage of the officers and soldiers of the Army of the United States stationed at said post, as well as of emigrants, freighters, and other citizens of the United States," etc., and suggested that although that issue might not be the only issue in the case, it was an issue that might be a material one, and upon which the Senate would have to pass in their finding.

Soon after the vote,[1] the same witness being under cross-examination, Mr. Carpenter asked:

It is charged in the third article of impeachment that the things alleged to have been done there—that is, the making of this agreement between Evans and Marsh—had been to the great injury and damage of the officers and soldiers of the Army of the United States stationed at that post. In what way could such contract injure the officers of the United States?

Mr. Manager McMahon having objected, the President pro tempore[2] sustained the objection on the ground that a similar question had already been ruled out.

Mr. Carpenter having protested and asked for a hearing, Mr. A. S. Merrimon, a Senator from North Carolina, asked for a vote on the ruling of the Chair, and the President pro tempore submitted the question:

Shall this interrogatory be admitted?

In arguing, Mr. Manager McMahon said:

We have yet offered no proof in this case to show that this has been detrimental to the service of the United States in the view in which the ethics of the gentleman seem to indicate to him may be important. It is a matter really for him in the defense if there is anything in it; and he has no right when we put a witness upon the stand to go into his substantive defense on that point.

The second objection we have in this case is the one which the Senate has already decided. Suppose that we should, taking an indictment, find in that indictment that the offense charged was alleged to be against the peace and dignity of the State of Ohio, or the State of New York, or against the commonwealth; and you were to put a witness on the stand and attempt to prove that it was not against the peace and dignity of the State of Ohio or the State of New York, because it was done in a corner where the State did not see it or had nothing to do with it, and would not know it unless one of the parties told it. It seems to me that it is entirely irrelevant, and it certainly strikes me as a new argument in morals that it is not improper, not an impeachable offense, for a Secretary of War or a Secretary of the Navy to dole out his offices to the men that will make the best bargain with him, without reference to the question whether it may be injurious to the public service or not.

Mr. Carpenter argued—

there is, as every lawyer knows, a conflict in the decisions in England and in some of the States of this country in regard to the extent to which a cross-examination may go. The rule in England, I understand to be, and in many of the States, that when a witness is called upon the stand, the other party may cross-examine him as to anything pertinent to the issue. The rule in other States is the reverse, and the rule I am bound to say in the Supreme Court of the United States is that you can only cross-examine as to matters referred to by the direct examination. But I submit to the Senate that in this trial, circumstanced as we are, with many army officers in attendance here whose public duties, as important as the duties of any officer, require their immediate return, and who are staying here every day to the prejudice of the public service, that rule, which after all is one in the discretion of the court, should in this case be, as I understand the English rule to be, that we may ask any witness called to the stand any question pertinent to the issue. There are many advantages in this. In the first place, it will place before the Senate in a compact form most of the testimony upon a particular subject.

In the next place, it will be a great convenience to all these witnesses. I do not understand, however, that I am now going at all beyond the scope of the direct examination. I make this remark because the question will undoubtedly arise hereafter as to other witnesses.

Now the managers say they have not as yet introduced any proof to show that this arrangement was detrimental to anybody. If they admit that it was not, then I do not wish to take a moment of your time in proving that it was not. If they concede that not a soldier paid one cent more for any article that was sold at that post in consequence of this arrangement between Marsh and Evans, that is the end of it. That is all I want to show by this testimony; but we are able to show, and shall if permitted, that notwithstanding this arrangement between Evans and Marsh, Evans never increased his prices on a single article. He has, as he has sworn elsewhere, upon the general average of his prices, charged less than he did before the arrangement made with Marsh.

The question being put on admitting the interrogatory, it was decided in the negative without division.

A little later,[1] the same witness having testified to his official relations with the respondent Mr. Carpenter asked, on cross-examination:

What has been his character as Secretary of War?

Mr. Manager McMahon said:

We object to this question, and will state our objection to the Senate. I think this is clearly substantive matter of defense, and must come into the trial of this case when the defendant opens his side of the case; but I will say to the gentleman here, though it may not waive the proof upon his part, that the managers upon their part, as I understand, are perfectly willing to concede that up to the time of the development of these matters his character was as good as could be desired or wished.

Mr. Carpenter said:

This question, Mr. President and Senators, falls within the class of questions to which I before referred. Of course it is not a cross-examination, but if not answered now, it may make it necessary to keep General McDowell here for several days before it can be put in. I therefore offer it now and let the Senate rule upon it, and then, of course, we shall know exactly what course to take in regard to other evidence from other witnesses.

The Senate, without division, decided that the question should be admitted.

On July 19[2] John S. Evans, the post trader at Fort Sill, was a witness and was asked this question by Mr. Carpenter:

After you returned to Fort Sill and after that contract made between you and Mr. Marsh, by which you bound yourself to pay him sums of money on dates fixed in the contract, did you put up the prices of your goods at the fort?

Mr. Manager McMahon objected that the Senate had already decided that this line of inquiry was not permissible.

Mr. Carpenter argued:

The fourth article, if I remember the number rightly, charges that in consequence of this arrangement between Marsh and Evans the soldiers and officers of the Union Army were defrauded and compelled to pay extravagant and exorbitant prices. Now we offer to show that that is not true. Let the managers strike it out of the articles and we do not care for the proof. If it remains in the articles, we offer to disprove it and will prove by this witness that he not only did not increase his prices, but that they were absolutely lower from that time out until he was removed than they had ever been before, and not, as he expresses it, the one-tenth part of 1 cent was added to the price of goods sold to the soldiers in consequence of that arrangement.

The Senate, by a vote of yeas 26, nays 13, decided that the question should be admitted.

2209. In the Belknap trial the Senate permitted a redirect examination which was not responsive to the facts elicited in cross-examination.—On July 11, 1876,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Caleb P. Marsh, a witness on behalf of the United States, was, after the direct examination, cross-examined by Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent.

At the conclusion of this cross-examination, Mr. John A. McMahon, of the managers on the part of the House of Representatives, resumed examination, which proceeded:

Do you remember upon any occasion when Evans & Co. made payment in a check of Northrop & Chick to you for $500?

Mr. Montgomery Blair, of counsel for the respondent, objected to the question, for reasons stated by Mr. Carpenter:

We have simply cross-examined this witness. We have shown nothing whatever, nor have we attempted to show anything whatever, except what is legitimate matter of cross-examination. They may reexamine in regard to the new matters we have called out in cross-examination, but nothing else. They can not go on now and by this witness attempt to show any consideration or anything of that kind, because that is a part of their case; they have examined the witness upon that subject and called out from him such evidence as they could and passed him over for cross-examination, and they can not return to it now.

Mr. Allen G. Thurman, a Senator from Ohio, suggested:

I wish to suggest that even if the question is not strictly responsive to the cross-examination it is in the discretion of the court to permit it to be answered.

The question being put to the Senate, "Shall said interrogatory be allowed," it was decided in the affirmative without division.

2210. In the Swayne trial it was held that cross-examination should be responsive to the examination in chief.—On February 20, 1905,[2] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, a witness, Simeon Belden, was under cross-examination by Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, and the following occurred:

Q. As your associate, did he have authority to sign your name, together with his own, as counsel in the matter of these proceedings?—A. He had not—not that I recollect.

Mr. THURSTON (handing paper to Mr. Manager Olmsted). As a part of our cross-examination we offer this paper in evidence.

The paper, which was afterwards read, was as follows:

LAW NO. 72, IN THE UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF FLORIDA. MRS. FLORIDA M'GUIRE V. PENSACOLA CITY COMPANY ET AL.

Hon. F. W. MARSH,
Clerk United States Circuit Court, Northern District of Florida.

DEAR SIR: Please enter the above cause on the trial or call docket for trial at the coming term of court.

[2] Third session Fifty-eighth Congress, Record, p. 2900.

Mr. Manager David A. De Armond, of Missouri, suggested an objection.

Mr. Thurston said:

If I understand evidence, a paper which is a legitimate part of the res gestæ, of the transaction upon which the witness was examined in chief, may be offered when identified as a part of the cross-examination. We may never desire to present any case on our side, but we can not tell until we have the evidence on the other side in.

Mr. Manager De Armond said:

Mr. President, we do not want to be understood as conceding the proposition which the counsel for the respondent has just stated. The question of the admissibility of a paper is a question that will have to be determined when it is offered; and, of course, if a paper could be introduced as a matter of cross-examination, the question of its competency could not be considered, or there would have to be delay to consider the admissibility of something offered by the opposite side when we are offering our testimony. But as to this paper, and only as to this paper, we do not care.

The Presiding Officer[1] said:

The Presiding Officer understands it is offered merely as a part of the cross-examination. * * * Whether it becomes admissible or pertinent in any other view of the case is a matter to be determined afterwards.

Later, on the same day,[2] and during the cross-examination of the same witness, the following occurred:

Q. You afterwards tried that same case, after it was rebrought, in that same court?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And there you had every opportunity to secure your witnesses, did you not?—A. We had all facilities on that trial.

Q. You got all the witnesses you wanted?—A. I think we did.

Q. I will ask you to examine this paper [handing paper to witness] and see if it is the præcipe for witnesses filed by you as the witnesses you desired subpœnaed for that trial of the case when it did come on?—A. I suppose this is the list. I did not make it out; neither did I sign it.

Q. Signed by your associate, Mr. Davis, for himself and yourself?—A. I think so.

Mr. Thurston said:

Mr. President, it is not necessary to introduce this original paper in evidence, as it already constitutes a part of the record that the other side has put in. Possibly I may be mistaken; the whole record may not have gone in. I ask to have read the names of these witnesses and their residences as showing that all their witnesses, very few in number, resided immediately in and about the court-house at Pensacola.

The Presiding Officer said:

The Presiding Officer has some trouble about having these documents read by the Secretary. Counsel undoubtedly have a right to ask the witness on cross-examination, the witness having testified that there were forty or fifty witnesses, how many witnesses were used when the case came to trial. But the Presiding Officer can not see how it is proper at this time to have this part of the record read. The cross-examination can proceed without the introduction of the paper.

Mr. Thurston said:

Mr. President, we submit to the ruling. We will offer the paper in our own time, when that comes.

2211. On February 20, 1905,[3] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, a witness, Simeon Belden, was under cross-examination by Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, when the following occurred:

Q. This contempt proceeding was brought jointly against you, Davis, and Paquet, was it not?—A. Yes, sir.

---

[1] Orville H. Platt, of Connecticut, Presiding Officer.

[2] Record, pp. 2901, 2902.

[3] Third session Fifty-eighth Congress, Record, p. 2905.

Q. At the time you have spoken of it was only tried as to Davis and yourself?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Further proceedings were thereafter had in that case against your associate, Mr. Paquet, were they not?—A. Other proceedings were had later on.

Q. And those resulted in his making and filing a written apology, did they not?

Mr. Manager David A. De Armond, of Missouri, said:

Mr. President, we are about to object to that. There is a better way of proving that, if it is true, and then it has nothing to do with the case, anyhow. There is no proceeding against Judge Swayne here regarding what he did or did not do with respect to Judge Paquet, and even if it is important to ask what he did or did not, or why he did or did not do it, there is a better way of showing it.

Mr. Thurston said:

I offered it as a part of the res gestæ.

The Presiding Officer[1] said:

The Presiding Officer does not see how that is a part of the cross-examination of this witness upon anything he said. * * * It may become admissible when counsel for the respondent take up the case. The Presiding Officer does not see how it is cross-examination.

2212. Rulings in the Swayne trial as to right of counsel of respondent to introduce documents in evidence during their cross-examination of witnesses for the managers.—On February 15, 1905,[2] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, a witness for the managers, Elza T. Davis, was under cross-examination by Mr. Anthony Higgins, of counsel for the respondent, when these questions were asked and answered:

Q. (Producing paper.) Mr. Davis, will you kindly look at the paper I hand you and say whether or not that is your signature?

A. (After examining paper.) Yes, sir; that is my signature.

Q. Is that a paper presented for you in the United States circuit court for the fifth judicial circuit, relating to the habeas corpus?

A. I do not think it was presented in my case. I think that is an affidavit which was prepared in New Orleans, which Judge Paquet had prepared, and which I signed.

Mr. Higgins. If the court please, this is an original paper, and I offer it in evidence.

Mr. Manager David A. De Armond, of Missouri, objected that the paper might not thus be introduced in evidence.

The Presiding Officer[1] said:

The Presiding Officer thinks that it is hardly proper to offer this document in evidence on the part of counsel at this time. If they desire to cross-examine the witness upon anything contained in this document, they can do so without offering it formally as evidence now. * * * The Presiding Officer understands that the witness under cross-examination has been asked if a certain document bears his signature, and he says that it does. The Presiding Officer supposes that it is entirely proper for counsel upon cross-examination to ask him any proper question relating to what is in the document, but that this is not the time to offer it in evidence.

2213. Instance wherein during cross-examination in an impeachment trial the Senate sustained objection to evidence on a point not touched in direct examination and of doubtful pertinency.—On July 10, 1876,[3] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late

[2] Third session Fifty-eighth Congress, Record, p. 2622.

[3] First session Fifty-fourth Congress, Senate Journal, p. 970; Record of trial, p. 234.

Secretary of War, Gen. William B. Hazen, a witness on behalf of the United States, was cross-examined by Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent. A question arose as to whether or not respondent had ordered witness to a Dakota station as a punishment for testimony given before a committee of the House of Representatives in relation to the post tradership at Fort Sill, and Mr. Carpenter offered, in this connection, as follows:

The offer is to show that the President ordered Mr. Belknap as Secretary of War to send a regiment of infantry to Dakota; that Belknap ordered General Sherman to send a regiment of infantry to Dakota; that Sherman ordered General Sheridan to send a regiment of infantry to Dakota; that Sheridan ordered General Pope to send a regiment of infantry to Dakota, and Pope designated the Sixth Infantry, of which Colonel Hazen happened to be colonel. That is all the connection Belknap had with that transaction, and there is the proof of it. [Holding up a bundle of papers.] We offer these papers.

Mr. Manager McMahon said:

We object, and I will state the ground of our objection. We have given no evidence on this point. We concluded the examination of General Hazen without asking him when or where he was ordered after he had given the testimony before the House committee. We did so because we did not desire to encumber this record or this case with any other question except the one legitimately before the Senate. We did it because we were aware of General Hazen's own letter from which we might have drawn our own conclusions, but we care to draw none now and have made nothing upon it; and, as I repeat to the gentleman, he is endeavoring in this case to try a side issue, that side issue being in the first instance whether General Hazen had told the truth about a particular matter; and in the second instance (which has no connection with this case) whether General Belknap sent him to the frozen country because General Hazen testified before the Military Committee.

The question being submitted to the Senate, the evidence was excluded without division.

2214. The Chief Justice held, in the Johnson trial, that a witness recalled to answer a question by a Senator might be reexamined by counsel for respondent.

The Chief Justice declined to rule finally that cross-examination of a witness in an impeachment trial should be concluded before his dismissal.

On April 13, 1868,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Gen. William T. Sherman was recalled as witness at the request of Mr. Reverdy Johnson, a Senator from Maryland, and was asked a certain question submitted in writing by Mr. Johnson, and admitted, after objection, by vote of the Senate.

The witness having answered the question, Mr. Henry Stanbery, of counsel for the respondent (in whose behalf General Sherman had been called originally as a witness), proposed another question.

Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler objected that, as counsel for respondent had dismissed the witness, he might not be examined again by counsel for respondent when brought back by a question of the court.

The Chief Justice[2] said:

The Chief Justice thinks it is entirely competent for the Senate to recall any witness. The Senate has decided that the question shall be put to the witness. That amounts to a recalling of him, and the Chief Justice is of opinion that the witness is bound to answer the questions. Does any Senator object?

[1] Second session Fortieth Congress, Globe supplement, p. 169.

[2] Salmon P. Chase, of Ohio, Chief Justice.

A little later Mr. Stanbery proposed another question to the witness, and Mr. Manager Butler objected again to the renewal of the examination by the counsel for the President.

The Chief Justice said:

Nothing is more usual in courts of justice than to recall witnesses for further examination, especially at the instance of one of the members of the court. It is very often done at the instance of counsel. It is, however, a matter wholly within the discretion of the court, and if any Senator desires it the Chief Justice will be happy to put it to the court, whether the witness shall be further examined.

Argument arising, Mr. William M. Evarts, of counsel for the President, said:

The question, Senators, whether a witness may be recalled is a question of the practice of courts. It is a practice almost universal, unless there is a suspicion of bad faith, to permit it to be done, and it is always in the discretion of the court. In special circumstances, where collusion is suspected between the witness and counsel for wrong purposes adverse to the administration of justice, a strict rule may be laid down. Whatever rule this court in the future shall lay down as peremptory, if it be that neither party shall recall a witness that has been once dismissed from the stand, of course, will be obligatory upon us, but we are not aware that anything has occurred in the progress of this trial to intimate to counsel that any such rule had been adopted, or would be applied by this court.

Mr. Manager Butler said:

Mr. President, on Saturday this took place. This question was asked:

"In that interview"—

That is, when the offer was made—

"what conversation took place between the President and you in regard to the removal of Mr. Stanton?"

That question was offered to be put, and after argument, and upon a solemn ruling, twenty-eight gentlemen of the Senate decided that it could not be put. That was exactly the same question as this, asking for the same conversation at the same time. Then certain other proceedings were had, and after those were had the counsel waited some considerable time at the table in consultation, and then got up and asked leave to recall this witness this morning for the purpose of putting questions. The Senate gave that leave and adjourned. This morning they recalled the witness and put such questions as they pleased, and we spent as many hours, as you remember, in doing that. On Saturday they had got through with him, except that they wanted a little time to consider whether they would recall him; they did recall him this morning, and after getting through with him the witness was sent away. Then he was again recalled to enable one of the judges to put a question to satisfy his mind. Having put his question and satisfied his mind of something that he wanted satisfied, something that he wanted to know, how can it be that that opens the case to allow the President's counsel to go into a new examination of the witness? How do they know, if he is not acting as counsel for the President, and there is not some understanding between them, which I do not charge—how can the President's counsel know that his mind is not satisfied? He recalled the witness for the purpose of satisfying his own mind, and only for that reason. I agree it is common to recall witnesses for something that has been overlooked or forgotten, but I appeal to the Presiding Officer that while—and I never have said otherwise—a member of the court who wants to satisfy himself by putting some question may recall a witness for that purpose, it never is understood that that having been done the case was opened to the counsel on either side to go on and put other questions. The court is allowed to put the question, because it is supposed that the judge wants to satisfy his mind on a particular point. After the judge has satisfied his mind on that particular point then there is to be an end, and it is not to open the case anew. I trust I have answered the honorable Senator from Maryland that I meant no imputation. I was putting it right the other way.

After further argument, the Chief Justice said:

The Chief Justice will explain the position of the matter to the Senate. The Senator from Maryland desired that the following question should be put to the witness (General Sherman): "When the President tendered to you the office of Secretary of War ad interim on the 27th of January, 1868, and on the 31st of the same month and year, did he, at the very time of making such tender, state to you what his purpose in so doing was?" To that question the witness replied, "he did" or "yes." That answer having been given, the Senator from Maryland propounded the further question, "The witness having answered yes, will he state what he said his purpose was?" The witness having made an answer to that question, either partial or full, the Chief Justice is unable to decide which, the counsel for the President propose this question: "Have you answered as to both occasions?" That is the same question which the Senator from Kentucky now proposes to the Chief Justice, and which he is unable to answer. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. Williams] objects to the question proposed by the counsel for the President upon the ground that General Sherman, having been recalled at the instance of a Senator, and having been examined by him, he can not be examined by counsel for the President. The Chief Justice thinks that that is a matter entirely within the discretion of the Senate, but that it is usual, under such circumstances, to allow counsel to proceed with their inquiries relating to the same subject-matter.

The question was then put to the witness.

Later, as the witness had concluded, Mr. Manager Bingham stated that the managers might desire to recall him on the morrow.

Mr. William M. Evarts, of counsel for the President, then said:

We must insist, Mr. Chief Justice, that the cross-examination must be finished before the witness is allowed to leave the stand.

After brief discussion the Chief Justice said:

Undoubtedly the general rule is that if the managers desire to cross-examine they must cross-examine before dismissing the witness, but that will be a question for the Senate when General Sherman is recalled.

2215. The Senate decided in the Belknap trial that a witness recalled, after direct and cross examination, to answer a question by a Senator might not be again subjected to direct examination.—On July 11, 1876,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Caleb P. Marsh, a witness for the United States, had been examined by the managers, cross-examined by counsel for the respondent, and had responded to questions put by Members of the Senate. Then Mr. Manager John A. McMahon proposed a question.

To this Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, objected, saying:

Both parties have made this case to the Senate as they have chosen to make it; and the court has gone through in its own way, seaching for facts, and, I understand, has rested also. Now, is it possible that the parties are to take this case up again and have any rights they would not have, arising from the examination as it took place on their part respectively? They can not go back with such a question certainly, unless it be on account of some questions that the court has put; and that certainly can not renew their right. They put this witness on the stand and exhausted him as far as they thought it was safe to do so; then we cross-examined him; both parties rested; and now the court has rested. Now we protest that the managers can not ask any more questions of this witness.

Mr. McMahon argued:

I understand even the order in which a witness is examined in a court of justice to be always a matter within the discretion of a court. A witness who has been fully discharged and gone may be called back and asked a question because something new has been developed in the case; and often—it is so laid down in the elementary books—you may recall a witness who has been absolutely discharged to ask him whether upon a certain occasion at a certain place he did not say so and so to A B, for the purpose of calling A B right there to contradict him. That is a very common practice.

Now, after the Senate has in the exercise of its discretion put further questions to this witness and eliminated a part of the truth from his bosom, what we want now is directly in the same line to put a question throwing light upon the very questions that have been put.

[1] First session Forty-fourth Congress, Senate Journal, p. 973; Record of trial, pp. 240, 241, 243.

Mr. Montgomery Blair, of counsel for the respondent, replied:

I know what the gentleman says to be true that a witness may be recalled at any time at the discretion of the court; but the court presides over the trial and looks after the interests of justice, and therefore it is within the competency of the court, as every lawyer knows, to allow a witness to be recalled. But I appeal to this court and to its discretion and ask this court to consider whether it is just to allow this witness to be recalled and reexamined in the manner that it is now sought to do when the gentlemen have made their case, exhausted the witness, turned him over to us and we made a very brief cross-examination, and now when the manager seeks to have the last word of this witness and to reiterate and ding-dong in the ears of the Senate every time he makes a speech denunciations of our client as if he was appealing on the last argument of the case? I appeal to the Senate and to the justice of the Senate to know whether such a course of examination ought to be tolerated.

The point having been raised that the question had been already asked in practically the same form, Mr. McMahon withdrew it.

But soon thereafter, the witness in the meanwhile having answered questions put by Senators, Mr. Manager McMahon proposed another question.

Mr. Carpenter said:

That we object to. Unless the court mean to say that the whole case may now be opened by the managers, that is an improper question. It is their direct proof, and they have gone over that.

The Senate, without division, sustained the objection and excluded the question

2216. In the Johnson trial the Senate declined to admit as rebutting evidence a document not responsive to any evidence offered on the other side.—On April 20, 1868,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, after the defense had concluded their testimony, Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler proposed to put in evidence the nomination sent by the President to the Senate on the 13th of February, 1868, of Lieutenant-General Sherman to be general by brevet, and the nomination of Maj. Gen. George H. Thomas, sent to the Senate on the 21st of February, 1868, to be lieutenant-general by brevet and general by brevet.

Mr. William M. Evarts, of counsel for the respondent, objected:

It does not seem to us, Mr. Chief Justice and Senators, to be relevant, and it certainly is not rebutting. We have offered no evidence bearing upon the only evidence you offered under the eleventh article, which was the telegrams between Governor Parsons and the President on the subject of reconstruction. We have offered no evidence on that subject. * * * It is very apparent that this does not rebut any evidence we have offered. It is then offered as evidence in chief that the conferring of brevets on these two officers is in some way within the evil intents that are alleged in these articles. We submit that on that question there is nothing in this evidence that imports any such evil intent.

To this Mr. Manager Butler replied:

I only wish to say upon this that we do not understand that this case is to be tried upon the question of whether evidence is rebutting evidence or otherwise, because we understand that to-day the House of Representatives may bring in a new article of impeachment if they choose, and go on with it; but we have a right to put in any evidence which would be competent at any stage of the cause anywhere. * * * In many of the States—I can instance the State of New Hampshire—I am sure the rule of rebutting evidence does not obtain in their courts at all. Each party calls such pertinent and competent evidence as he has up to the hour when he says he has got through from time to time; and in some other of the States it is so applicable, and no injustice is done to anybody.

The Chief Justice having submitted the case to the Senate, there appeared in favor of receiving the evidence, yeas 14, nays 35. So the evidence was not received.

2217. The question as to whether or not testimony in an impeachment trial might be taken by a committee of the Senate.—On March 25, 1904,[1] in the Senate, Mr. George F. Hoar, of Massachusetts, submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be directed to consider and report whether any amendment be desirable in the Senate rules relating to impeachments, and especially whether the rules may properly and lawfully provide for taking testimony in such cases by a committee in accordance with the practice of the English House of Lords in such cases, questions of the admission of material testimony and the final argument being reserved for the full Senate.

Chapter LXIX.*

RULES OF EVIDENCE IN AN IMPEACHMENT TRIAL.

1. Strict rules of the courts followed. Sections 2218, 2219.[1]
2. Must be relevant to the pleadings. Sections 2220–2225.
3. Best evidence required. Sections 2226–2229.
4. Hearsay testimony. Sections 2230–2237.
5. Testimony as to declarations of respondent. Sections 2238–2245.
6. As to acts of the respondent after the fact. Sections 2246–2247.
7. As to opinions of witnesses. Sections 2248–2257.
8. Public documents as evidence. Sections 2258–2274.
9. General decisions as to evidence. Sections 2275–2293.

2218. After discussion of English precedents, the Senate ruled decisively in the Peck trial that the strict rules of evidence in force in the courts should be applied.

Witnesses in an impeachment trial are required to state facts and not opinions.

Decision as to the limits within which expert testimony may be admitted in an impeachment trial.

On January 7, 1831,[2] in the high court of impeachment during the trial of the case of The United States v. James H. Peck, a witness, Robert Walsh, was examined on behalf of the respondent, and Mr. William Wirt, counsel for the respondent, asked this question:

> When you read the strictures signed "A Citizen," did they strike you as misrepresenting the opinion of the court in a manner calculated to awaken the contempt and indignation of the people of Missouri, and to impair the confidence of the suitors in that court in the intelligence and integrity of the tribunal?

Judge Peck was impeached for punishing for contempt the author of a letter signed "A Citizen" and published in a St. Louis paper, criticising an opinion delivered by Judge Peck in the case of Goulard's heirs.

Mr. Henry R. Storrs, of New York, one of the managers for the House of Representatives, objected to this question, on the ground that the witness was asked for an opinion instead of a fact. The question for the court to settle in this trial was this: Did the strictures misrepresent the opinion? That was a question which must be decided on facts. The witness was now asked his conclusion, but was that an evidence of fact?

Mr. Jonathan Meredith, counsel for the respondent, argued that the question at issue involved a knowledge of the obscure and intricate subject of Spanish titles and the application of Spanish laws in Louisiana Territory. The witness, from his familiarity with those subjects, was able to assist the court in forming its opinion. The managers had denied that professional knowledge was needed to show whether or not one paper misrepresented another; but Mr. Meredith held that in this case the court of impeachment could not be presumed to possess the requisite knowledge to enable it to form a correct judgment, unassisted by the opinions and conclusions of others. Therefore the proposed testimony was competent. Furthermore, the intention of the respondent in punishing the author of the strictures was a question of importance, and the proposed testimony would be pertinent to that branch of the discussion.

Mr. William Wirt, also counsel for respondent, elaborated the points outlined by his associate, but before doing so made remarks on the law of evidence as applied to impeachments:

In the well-known case of Warren Hastings, which occupied England so long, a most able and masterly protest was entered by Mr. Burke and the managers on the part of the House of Commons against the application of the rigid rules of evidence which governed the practice of the courts of law. It was contended before that tribunal that instead of the strict and iron rules of a law court, the field was broad and liberal, and to be controlled by no rule but the Lex et consuetudo Parliamenti. The protest is extended, very learned, and rests on numerous authorities; and if this court could have an opportunity to review it, they would not feel the least hesitation as to the fact that they are not to be trammeled and hemmed in by the rigid rules of evidence. I find that in the remarks of the Federalist respecting the high court of impeachment erected by the Constitution of this country, the writer lays it down as a conceded point that the strictness which prevails in the ordinary criminal courts does not apply here, nor is it required that the article of impeachment should be drawn up with all the rigid precision of an indictment. The proceedings in this highest court are to be more liberal and free, and nearer substantially to the course pursued by courts conversant with the civil than the criminal law. Mr. Rawle has the same idea. And the question would be, if the original view could now be before this court, whether this tribunal, which is not an appellate court on all questions of law, and is not, therefore, conversant with the strict rules of law, but whose whole jurisdiction has respect to impeachments alone, should or should not open itself to all lights which can be brought to bear on this decision, and whether more injustice would not accrue from narrowing the apertures through which light is to be received, than from opening them in all directions from whence a single ray can touch them.

In reply, Mr. James Buchanan, of Pennsylvania, chairman of the managers, argued at length in support of the objection, saying in the course of his remarks:

This question in four lines embraces the very essence of the respondent's defense—the very question to be decided by the court, and asks the witness to substitute his opinion for the judgment of the tribunal. I ask, Is there a court in the United States, however inferior its grade, which, on the trial of an indictment for a libel, would not, without an argument, overrule the opinion of a witness as to whether the matter charged to be libellous was or was not a libel, and what would be its effect on the public mind? Does it not strike everyone at the first blush that no such court could be found in any portion of this country?
